Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely.

Unless some gentleman desires further discussion——

Mr Cox rose.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield, of course, to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I have no desire to discuss this further than to say that so far as I could scrutinize the bill it appears to be a valuable supplement to the act of 1886. I think other members representing seaboard and commercial cities will cheerfully vote to sustain this proposition of the gentleman's committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. If there are no further inquiries in reference to the bill, and no desire to further discuss it, I will move that the committee rise and report it favorably to the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman to repeat in a few words the effect of the proposed change in the first section of the bill, being section 11 of the original act. The difficulty that we on this side of the Hall labor under is our inability to hear what the gentleman said. This seems to be an amendment to what was understood to be a very carefully considered bill, passed two years ago, and I would like to know the reasons for the change and its effect. The gentleman has no doubt explained it satisfactorily to those around him, but we were unable here to catch the explanation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman did not hear my explanation, as I dislike very much to occupy the time of the committee, unless there is a general desire that the explanation should be repeated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thought perhaps the gentleman might in a few of the crisp, terse sentences for which he is so distinguished, give the information we would like to have here.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman ought now, in view of that compliment, undoubtedly to repeat his speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I have simply to say, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New Jersey, that the amendment simply makes clearer what was the original intent of the act of 1886; and the practical effect, I may add—and that is perhaps all the gentleman desires—the practical effect is to notify foreign countries that in order to have the tonnage tax and the light-house dues removed from their vessels entering our ports they must first abolish such charges on American vessels in their ports, and not make the claim for exemption until they have done so.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did not my colleague draw the act of 1886; and is he not now proposing this new legislation in order simply, after the experience gained so far, to perfect the law and make it more definite and effective?

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely; that is the effect and the intention.

I now move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5728, had directed him to report it favorably to the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. I demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION, PARIS.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING REPORT OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HATCH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House what reason exists, if any, for the non-delivery of the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1886, which was ordered to be printed by a joint resolution, number 9, passed by the Forty-ninth Congress, and approved February 28, 1887.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill (S. 290) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Burlington, Iowa; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting revised urgent deficiency estimates for the Signal Service; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. O'DONNELL, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Andrew J. Williamson and William Smith, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. PHELAN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Francis Erricksen, without leaving copies, there having been no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, indefinitely, on account of domestic affliction.

To Mr. MOFFITT, for ten days, on account of important business.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC., WITHOUT INDORSEMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House will give its attention the Chair desires to make a statement, which is necessary, with a view to the correct management of business at the Clerk's desk. It appears there are eighteen private bills which have come to the Clerk's desk under the rule without indorsement of the names of the members introducing them. There are also thirty-one petitions without the names of the members presenting the same or any indorsement as to the reference desired. There are also forty-one petitions without the names of the members presenting them indorsed thereon, but with the committees marked to which it is desired they should be referred.

The Chair could not, of course, animadvert on or criticise the action or conduct of members of this House. But he would suggest for the proper dispatch of business that some memorandum of these bills and petitions should be put in the RECORD, so that members may read the catalogue, and if possible give the proper direction to those bills and petitions.

The Chair will ask the consent of the House to have these three different bundles examined by the Clerk carefully and catalogued for the RECORD, that members may read over the list and have the proper reference made. The Chair thinks that would obviate the complaints, such as that made to-day, as a question of privilege, and other complaints which may come hereafter. Is there objection to that disposition of these bundles? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The catalogue supplied by the Clerk is as follows:

A bill for the relief of Hiram N. Roberts, administrator.

Also, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to Anson Rudd, of the State of Colorado, certain real estate in the county of Fremont, in said State.

Also, a bill granting a pension to William B. Bishop.

Also, a bill granting a pension to James M. Page.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Augustus G. Wyeth.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Martin Haas.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Christian Kembeck.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Frederick P. Hardy.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Lyman D. Green.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Harriet E. Cooper.

Also, a bill for the relief of Willis N. Arnold.

Also, a bill for the relief of the Christian Church at Marshall, Saline County, Missouri.

Also, a bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. Commander Wilson McGunnegle.

Also, a bill for the relief of Frederick Ford.

Also, a bill for the relief of William Tabb.

Also, a bill for the relief of Aaron Botts.

Also, a bill for the relief of Daniel Bentley.

Also, a bill for the relief of Charles K. Remsberg.

Also, a bill for the relief of North German Steam-ship Company.

Also, a bill for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

Also, a bill to appoint Elijah J. M. Button apothecary at the United States Naval Academy, a warrant officer in United States Navy.

The following petitions were found in the box without the names of members presenting the same or the committees to which reference was desired:

Of William Green, for a pension; of James H. Prickett, for a pension; of Simon Haines, for a pension; of Cullen W. Green, for a pension; of Isaac Kisbaugh, for a pension; of Harris Fulford, for a pension; of Henry C. Richardson, for a pension; of Frederick P. Hardy, for a pension; of Charles H. Milbourn, for a pension; of Abraham Tyson, for a pension; of Daniel Batdorff, for a pension; of Jane A. Lusk, for a pension; of Daniel S. Bills, for a pension; of Abraham Van Assum, for a pension; of Nancy F. Jennings, for a pension; of Francis McKinney, for removal of charge of desertion; of Alonzo Koon, for removal of charge of desertion; of William H. Purseley, for relief; of F. N. Lang, on the currency; of Lewis Ratliff and others, on postmasters; paper in case of Malinda Vest; paper in case of Henry Glass; paper in case of Adolphus Goddin; paper against division of Idaho; paper from James F. Edwards; of G. W. Kinney, on postmasters; of William H. Jordan, for a pension; of George A. Bacon and others (Real Estate Tontine); of Aaron Botts, for relief; paper from Herbert Smith in case of George Barron; papers in case of Lewis Davis; paper relative to mail matter from Batavia, Ill.

The following petitions were unindorsed, but the committees desired to be referred to were marked thereon:

Of Eunice A. Pountain, for a pension; of Thomas O. Robinson, for a pension; of Mrs. Frances J. McCloud, for a pension; of F. B. Bickford, for a pension; of A. B. Chatfield, for pension legislation; of Joseph Nopinger, for removal of charge of desertion; of Frederick Brown, for removal of charge of desertion; of Jonathan C. Hoffman, for removal of charge of desertion; of Thomas Lindersmith, for removal of charge of desertion; papers in claim of Hugh J. Hewitt; paper in claim of James Allen, sr.; paper in case of A. H. Spicer; paper in case of James J. Dowling, war claim; paper in case of Mrs. L. L. Gilmer, war claim; paper in case of R. H. Jackson; papers in cases of William J. Rivers and others, war claim; paper relating to settlers of Yellowstone National Park; paper relating to Fort Buford military reservation; of citizens at Monroe, La., for public building; of Adolphus Goddin, war claim; of Baker A. Jamison and Tallmadge A. Lambert; of citizens of Seattle, Wash., on tariff; of Daniel Morgan, for relief; of citizens of Niagara County, New York, on pensions; of Charles H. Dexter, for relief; of canners and packers of Baltimore, for relief; paper in case of Nancy Newton, for relief; paper for anatomical science and against grave desecration; of citizens of West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, for prohibition in the District of Columbia; of citizens of Florida, Georgia, West Virginia, and Kentucky, for increase of pay of fourth-class postmasters.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WISE. A few days ago I introduced a bill to establish a permanent quarantine at Cape Charles. It was improperly referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I ask now that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, where it ought to go.

Mr. HATCH. I may state with reference to this bill that I was under the impression from hearing its title that its object was to establish a quarantine station for imported cattle, petitions for the establishment of which had already been referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I suggested, therefore, the reference to the Committee on Agriculture, and that disposition of the bill was made, whereas it should have been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The Committee on Agriculture was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CAUSES REMOVED FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. SENEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1709) to regulate the practice in causes removed from State courts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the plaintiff in a suit removed from a State court to a circuit court of the United States shall not be required to give security for the costs of suit if he be a resident of the State in which he brought his suit.

Mr. SENEY. The bill itself sufficiently explains its purpose. I do not propose to make any remarks, unless some gentleman desires I should.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is there a report accompanying it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is.

The report (by Mr. SENEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 1709, beg leave to report favorably thereon, and do recommend its passage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I understand the purport of that bill, I am very doubtful of the propriety of its passage; and if there is a report accompanying it, I should like to have it read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has just been read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to state the ground on which I think this bill should not be supported; but in the first place I should like to hear some explanation from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY].

Mr. SENEY. This bill received the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary. Its purpose is to remedy what is supposed to be the difficulty now attending the practice in the Federal courts in causes removed from the State courts to those tribunals. We have a class of litigation against foreign corporations who are incorporated by laws of other States than those in which they do business. For that reason they claim to be citizens of a foreign State, and when suits are brought in State courts against those corporations they invariably remove them to the Federal court, and when they reach that court they follow them up with the motion that the plaintiff give security for costs.

In many cases that amounts to a denial of justice. In many cases the plaintiff is unable to give security for costs, and his failure operates as a perfect and complete defense. It was to cure that evil and mischief that this bill was presented to the House and considered by the Judiciary Committee; and it has been reported back to the House with their unanimous approval.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to explain. I understood the result of this change to be precisely the reverse of what it is. I understood that it relieved the moving party from the responsibility of giving security for costs. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPAIR OF THE HARTFORD.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to move to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill providing for the repair of the war steam-ship Hartford, and to ask that the same be now placed upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to repair the United States war steam-ship Hartford, at an expense not exceeding $175,000, which sum is hereby appropriated and made immediately available, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of this bill, and to consider the bill as in the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I shall not object, Mr. Speaker, provided we can have order in the House so that we can know what is being done, but I do not want to be held responsible for the passage of bills that I do not hear anything about. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The report is a brief one, and I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. WHITTHORNE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1237) providing for the repair of the United States war steam-ship Hartford, beg leave to report thereon as follows:

First. That under existing law the repairs necessary to be done on the Hartford in order to fit her properly as a war ship will exceed the limit prescribed by law; that is, it will exceed the 20 per cent. of cost of the construction of a similar vessel.

Second. In view of this fact, under existing laws, the Hartford would be condemned and sold.

Third. But inasmuch as said Hartford can be repaired for a sum but little in excess of said limit, and forasmuch as around this ship brilliant historic events cluster, making the life of said vessel and its continuance a question of national and patriotic pride, in consideration of which the Secretary of the Navy has suspended the condemnation authorized by law, and submitted the propriety of the repair of said vessel to Congress.

Fourth. The cost and propriety of said repairs is shown in the report of T. D. Wilson, chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, which is as follows:

"One of the vessels of the Navy that is likely to be condemned, because the cost of her repairs exceeds the 20 per cent. limit, is the sloop-of-war Hartford, now at the navy-yard, Mare Island. The vessel was built in 1858 at the navy-yard, Boston. She is a screw steamer of about 2,900 tons displacement, 225 feet long, 44 feet wide, and draws 18 feet 6 inches of water. I have lately made a personal examination of this vessel, and find that her live-oak frames above and below water are sound. I am of the opinion that she can be repaired within the amount, $175,000, called for by the board of survey, and request that special authority for her repair be asked.

"She would then, apart from the claim she has upon the reverence of the American people as Farragut's flag-ship, be valuable for service as a cruiser for several years, and ultimately should be preserved as a monument to those whose blood was shed upon her decks, and as a reminder to the future that, wooden and old-fashioned though she may be called, she came out victorious in battles with both ironclads and forts."

In view of this state of facts, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

But in making this recommendation the committee desire to say that it is done solely on account of the historic associations surrounding the name of this vessel, and that they cordially approve the wisdom and policy of existing laws.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose it is necessary to add a word to that report, and I will not consume the time of the House in making an argument in support of it. I now demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 2131) for the relief of Joseph Cox, administrator of Charles Pasters, deceased.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 473) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be examined certain vouchers filed, or to be filed, by the State of Missouri, or her agent or agents, for sums claimed to be due from the Government of the United States on account of payments made by said State since April 22, 1862, to the officers and enlisted men of her militia forces for military services rendered to the United States in the suppression of the rebellion, as evidenced by the proper pay-rolls heretofore filed with, examined, and accepted by the Government of the United States, and to report to Congress;

A bill (S. 509) authorizing an increase in pensions in cases of deafness;

A bill (S. 418) granting to the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State;

A bill (S. 574) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apoline A. Blair;

A bill (S. 257) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary S. Logan;

A bill (S. 190) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits;

A bill (S. 28) to create a port of delivery at Port Angeles, in the district of Puget Sound, Washington Territory;

A bill (S. 25) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; and

A bill (S. 24) to extend the limits of the port of Portland as a port of entry.

WILLIAM P. THORNE.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of William P. Thorne be taken from the Private Calendar and considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to William P. Thorne, of Henry County, Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What is the claim?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The claim is for professional services rendered in the county of Henry, Kentucky, in defense of the United States marshal. They were rendered at the special request of the late Judge Ballard, district judge of Kentucky, and the late Col. G. C. Wharton, district attorney, whose letters are on file, but from whom affidavits could not be obtained, as they died before the claim was presented to Congress. The claim could not be paid by the Department of Justice because the district attorney had not previously obtained the consent of the Department to the employment, nor had Mr. Thorne, the claimant, taken the oath prescribed by law prior to performing the services. The report of the committee was unanimous in favor of this bill, and there was a similar report by the committee in the last Congress.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. All right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERMS OF COURT AT QUINCY, ILL.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1312) providing for a term of court at Quincy, Ill.

There was no objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. ADAMS. This is the southern district of Illinois. All the Representatives of the district have been consulted, except Mr. THOMAS, who is absent, and it meets their approval. It is a local matter about which all are agreed, and I now ask the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. ROWELL. I will ask the gentleman whether there has been a session of the court at Cairo in four or five years, although there is a branch of the court there?

Mr. ADAMS. On that point I will yield to my colleague [Mr. ANDERSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter affecting the southern district of Illinois. All the Representatives from that district have been consulted, so far as they could be, the only exception being my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] who is now absent. I believe the judge of the district has also been consulted. As I understand, it is agreed by all parties interested that this is a reasonable and proper bill. As it is a local matter, and as no objection comes from any person interested, I will not consume time in discussion.

Mr. ROWELL. I would like to ask whether there has been any session of court at Cairo for five years?

Mr. ADAMS. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] to answer that question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I will state that Judge Treat, the late district judge, had not held court there for a number of years, but Judge Allen, the present judge, has informed me that he intends to hold court there. Quincy is the largest city, by far, in the district, and Judge Allen, in a letter which I have, states there is more business in that part of the district than in any other; and he asks that this bill be passed.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not wish to oppose this measure, which is a local matter, but I do not like these peripatetic courts. In one of the branches of this southern district of Illinois, I understand, there has been no term of court held for ten years. But I will not object to the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. The statement of the gentleman might be a reason for abolishing the term of court at Cairo, but it can be no reason against holding court at Quincy.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to know whether there has been provided at Quincy any place in which to hold the United States courts, or whether this bill is preliminary to an appropriation of two or three hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of erecting a building for the accommodation of the courts and court officials.

Mr. ADAMS. My colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] will answer that question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there has just been built at Quincy, Ill., a new Government building in which a court room and offices for court officials have been provided and furnished; so that there will be no additional expense in that regard. As I have already stated, this measure is approved and asked for by the district judge himself.

Mr. HATCH. I only desire to say that this bill is eminently proper and ought to pass without challenge from any gentleman on either side of the House. It looks to the accommodation of a large and populous business community. The city of Quincy is one of the important cities in that section of the country, especially in that part of Illinois. There is already a Government building there, and this term of court at that place ought to be authorized.

Mr. ADAMS. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ADAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of business on the House Calendar. The Clerk will read the first business on the Calendar.

The following resolution, reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, was read:

Resolved, That Tuesday, February 21, 1888, after the hour for the consideration of bills reported from committees, be fixed for the consideration of such bills as may be indicated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the bills reported by said committee, and that this order shall continue from day to day until the House shall otherwise order, not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills or prior special orders.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the House had better adjourn. The resolution which has just been read might be construed as authorizing the consideration of measures for the erection of a thousand public buildings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to adjourn has just been voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been intervening business. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the reading of the resolution is to be considered as intervening business.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 75, noes 88.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 26, noes 135; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, only 26 members voting therefor.

So the yeas and nays were refused, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, there were—ayes 11, noes 138.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, tellers are ordered, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having put the question on the motion to adjourn). In the opinion of the Chair, the noes have it.

Mr. BLAND. I call for a division.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 14, noes 118.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the proposition read. I do not think it is understood.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the first resolution in the Order of Business.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, February 21, 1888, after the hour for consideration of bills reported from committees be fixed for the consideration of such bills as may be indicated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the bills reported by said committee, and that this order shall continue from day to day until the House shall otherwise order, not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills or prior special orders.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee accompanying that resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the gentleman from South Carolina understand that resolution to mean that it shall continue from day to day?

Mr. BLAND. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman's demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is the gentleman from South Carolina willing to limit it to one day?

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 111.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to ask the gentleman from South Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, whether he will accept an amendment to his resolution, not to exceed five legislative days?

Mr. RANDALL. Three is enough.

Mr. HATCH. I am willing to give him five. They have lengthy reports which will be more or less discussed, and I am willing to limit the time not to exceed five legislative days. Will the gentleman accept that?

Mr. DIBBLE. I am willing to accept the limitation to five days.

Mr. BLAND. I object; and demand a vote on my motion to adjourn over till Saturday, on which tellers have been appointed.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds realizes that sometimes filibustering methods are resorted to to prevent the passage of bills reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places, and the vote will be taken on the motion that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

A MEMBER. Who are the tellers?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 9, noes 154.

So the motion to adjourn over till Saturday next was disagreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move now that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point that dilatory motions, under the rule, are exhausted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from South Carolina on the point of order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point of order that the House is now engaged in determining a rule of its proceedings, and that the constitutional right of the House to determine the rules of its proceedings can not be destroyed by the repetition of dilatory motions.

Mr. RANDALL. I beg to call attention, also, to the rule which says that a motion to adjourn, or to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, is always in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state from what part of the Digest he quotes.

Mr. DIBBLE. From page 337, under the title of "Dilatory motions." It covers a decision cited in the Journal of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVI. A motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, a motion to adjourn, and to take a recess shall always be in order; and the hour at which the House adjourns shall be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, and entertains the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, which is that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Evidently the House is not in the humor for the transaction of business this evening, and I therefore move that we now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand a division on the last vote.

[Cries of "Too late!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman was in time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will not insist upon the demand.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, as I stated before, it is not the disposition of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who are simply the servants of the House in facilitating the dispatch of its business, to occupy more of the time of the House than the House itself desires it to occupy, or to take more of its time for the consideration of business from that committee than would fairly belong to it, considering the general dispatch of the public business. The only objection the committee could possibly have to a limitation of the time to a definite number of days is this: that it has been the experience of the past, whenever such a limit is fixed, that it affords an encouragement to dilatory motions, such as we have seen this evening.

The only purpose of this resolution in its present shape is, that when the committee gets this time it may be of some avail to it for the transaction of its business. A provision is made here, it will be seen, which has not been contained in similar propositions. Heretofore it was provided that the committee should proceed with that order until the business it had presented to the House should be disposed of. But this resolution is changed so as to provide that such order shall continue until the House itself shall otherwise order.

Mr. LONG. Would not the motion to "otherwise order" be made every five minutes?

Mr. DIBBLE. I think not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. Under this resolution, if adopted, when would this order expire?

Mr. DIBBLE. It will expire when in the course of its business the House determines that it should expire.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is as clear as mud.

Mr. BLOUNT. What other committee has that privilege, I would ask, or can have it?

A MEMBER. What other committee is packed with business as this is?

Mr. DIBBLE. I will state to the gentleman that other committees do have that privilege, and can come in at any time with their business. There are privileged committees which can come in and take precedence under the rules of the House. This committee has no such privilege. It only comes before the House in the time assigned to it by the House; and no more reasonable proposition could be presented to the House than to fix a day, as here proposed, when that business shall commence, to continue until otherwise ordered by the House.

The privilege is reserved to the House to discontinue that order at any time; and when that order is pending and being proceeded with a majority of this House, in its discretion, can terminate it when it sees fit. If it is to be limited, as contended on the other side; if a small minority of the House is to limit this committee to a fixed period of one day, why the same minority which is now interrupting the consideration of this resolution could defeat the passage of a single bill by similar proceedings.

Mr. LONG. If it be in the power of a small minority to interpose to stop the order proposed in your resolution, why do you not amend the resolution so as to fix some definite time when it may terminate?

Mr. DIBBLE. In answer to the gentleman I will state that it has been already suggested by the gentleman from Missouri to do so. I am willing to accept, on behalf of the committee, a motion that this shall be amended so as to provide that the order will not exceed five days.

Mr. HATCH. Five legislative days?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes; five legislative days. I would accept an amendment of that sort.

Mr. BLOUNT. That would be a bill for every ten minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Six an hour. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLAND. Certainly, under the resolutions as offered, it would give this committee——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion is pending to adjourn, and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLAND. Consent has been given to discuss this matter, and I ask a moment to reply to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The discussion could only proceed by consent. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from South Carolina as the Chair understands it. The gentleman asks consent to modify the resolution so that it shall provide for five legislative days. Is that the proposition?

Mr. RANDALL. When is the time to begin on each day?

Mr. HATCH. The resolution fixes that.

Mr. DIBBLE. After the second morning hour.

Mr. LANHAM. I would like to have Fridays excepted from the operation, that being private bill day.

Mr. McMILLIN. A legislative day could by recesses be made to extend over an indefinite period.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from South Carolina consent that an hour be fixed, say 5 o'clock, each day for adjournment?

Mr. DIBBLE. The only trouble there is——

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that question in good faith, and not for any purpose of delaying action.

Mr. DIBBLE. The only trouble about that is that if gentlemen propose to filibuster against a bill I would not like to be committed that they should have 5 o'clock as a convenient point at which they could stop every day and exhaust my five days on the one bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think if the committee is reasonable there would be any such procedure as the gentleman apprehends.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think it is a rather violent presumption to suppose that the committee would ask or the House would second the committee in anything that is unreasonable.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire to know the position of the question; whether a demand was not made for a division on the motion to adjourn, and whether that was not withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was; but the Chair had not announced the result. On the motion to adjourn the noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. What is the question now pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion now pending is that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLAND. That is the motion I made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. During the pendency of that motion a motion was made to adjourn. That has just been voted on and the result declared. Now the question is on the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOGG. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOGG. I submit that a motion to adjourn till Monday is a motion to adjourn for more than three days, and is therefore not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Sunday is not a legislative day. Dies Dominicus non est juridicus.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn over until Monday next, there were—ayes 106, noes 83.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 39, noes 112.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] had made a motion to adjourn before the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a motion of higher privilege than the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LONG. But the yeas and nays had not been ordered when the motion to adjourn was first made, and the motion to adjourn is always in order. I ask the Chair to look at the authority on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read clause 4 of Rule XVI, as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motion shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is certainly right.

Mr. HATCH. Pending the call of the yeas and nays on the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, I moved that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The other motion has precedence.

Mr. BLAND. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. The gentleman from Missouri can not make that motion, because he did not vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The record does not show that.

The question being taken on Mr. BLAND'S motion, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division.

The House divided: and there were—ayes 96, noes 60.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would not decide that motion to be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. When the House finds itself without a quorum there is no motion in order except a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can determine from the vote—ayes 96, noes 60—that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HATCH. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that whenever the House finds itself without a quorum there are but two motions in order, to adjourn or for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would hold that as less than a quorum has appeared on the ay-and-no vote, two motions only are in order, a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] now makes the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER pro tempore stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for a division.

Mr. NELSON. I rise for a parliamentary question. What is the effect of this motion if carried? Will it be to adjourn until to-morrow or until Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Until to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. I understood the Chair to decide that the motion to adjourn over was carried.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays had been ordered on that motion, and the gentleman from Missouri moved to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first announce the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn. The ayes are 143 and the noes 96.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, which I should like to have answered before the vote is taken. If we adjourn now, will the House meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. DIBBLE. The inquiry which I desired to address to the Chair was this: Was not a motion to reconsider pending when the want of a quorum was discovered? That was a motion to reconsider a motion, which was carried, that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLAND. Upon which motion the yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] will observe that the vote upon the motion to adjourn over was not completed; by reason of the motion to reconsider, it remained uncompleted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. There was a demand for the yeas and nays. On the motion to reconsider there was no quorum. There were only two motions in order. The Chair put one, and the House is now voting upon one. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] now demands the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and 31 members voted in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

Several MEMBERS. Count the other side.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 112.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the question of taking the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, the ayes are 31 and the noes 112. More than one-fifth have voted, and the question is on the motion to adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays are ordered.

YEAS—81.

So the House refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following additional announcement was made of pairs on all political matters for the rest of the day:

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. OATES with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. BURROWS.

Mr. KILGORE with Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. RYAN.

Mr. HARE with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. VANCE with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. BACON with Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. MCCULLOGH.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan, with Mr. HOPKINS, of New York.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. LODGE.

Mr. LAGAN with Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] is detained at his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the House now adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order at this time. The Chair will state the question. A motion was made that when the House adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday. On that the yeas and nays were ordered. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on that motion is now pending. On that motion tellers were ordered. No quorum appeared, and then a motion to adjourn was made. Now, the proposition is to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. BLAND. Tellers were ordered upon that motion. I insist upon tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] will resume their places as tellers.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to adjourn until Monday; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 11.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. DUNHAM. The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF AMERICAN PORK IN FRANCE AND GERMANY.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask, by unanimous consent, to present a resolution of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, and to ask that the letter of Mr. Stone, its secretary, and the accompanying letter of the United States consul at Havre, France, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LANHAM. I will not insist on the demand for the regular order of business, if it is understood the gentleman does not ask for the reading of these papers.

Mr. DUNHAM. Of course I would like to have them read, but under the circumstances will now merely ask that they be printed in the RECORD, so that they may be read by members.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not object to that.

There was no objection, and the papers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

They are as follows:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Havre, France, December 28, 1887.

To the President of the Chicago Board of Trade, Chicago, Ill.:

DEAR SIR: It being most likely that Congress during its present sitting will take up the revision of the revenue tariff, it may not be amiss to call the attention of your honorable body to the prohibition of the importation of American salted pork, etc., still existing in France.

In the course of the many changes which have taken place in French ministries since 1881, we find that quite lately Mr. Tirard, the originator of the prohibitory edict, has turned up as prime minister, and as it was he who, under the vain plea of its unwholesomeness, by a stroke of his pen struck at a most important article of American export, it is but proper that he should be called upon to repeal this most odious edict of unjust and unfriendly discrimination.

Among the most zealous advocates of repeal have been the population of the city of Havre. The Journal du Havre of the 14th instant published an article on this subject, of which I beg to inclose a translation. A concise sketch of another paper is addressed to you under a separate cover.

I am of opinion that a majority of the laboring classes, who have been deprived of a wholesome and cheap article of nourishment, would hail with delight a thorough discussion of this matter in Congress, threatening, if advisable, with retaliation, if the prohibition is not repealed.

If there is one article which may be mentioned as unwholesome amongst French exports to America, it is wine, the greater part of which is doctored and adulterated. France, from having been an exporting country of wine, has turned to be an importing country. Enormous quantities of low-priced Spanish and Italian wines are being imported, manipulated, doctored, decorated with high-sounding labels, and drank in the United States and elsewhere as selected vintages.

Nothing but retaliation will bring French legislators, now strongly imbued with protectionism, to their senses; the plea that American hog produce is unwholesome has been abandoned long ago.

I have the honor to be, sir, yours, most respectfully,
F. F. DUFAIS, United States Consul.

BOARD OF TRADE OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO,
Chicago, January 10, 1888.

Upon the receipt of a communication from F. F. Dufais, United States consul, resident at Havre, a copy of which is herewith submitted, the board of directors of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the prohibition of the importation of American salted pork by the French and German Governments, upon the pretext of its unhealthfulness, is an act of great injustice to the Government and people of the United States as well as to the inhabitants of France and Germany, who are to a great extent deprived of a wholesome article of food at moderate cost.

"Resolved, That the United States Government should no longer tolerate such an insulting discrimination against American commerce without an indignant protest and the enactment of vigorous retaliatory measures.

"Resolved, That there ought to be such legislation regarding our commercial relations with those countries as will comport with the dignity of the nation and unqualifiedly denounce the unfounded charges against one of the great and beneficent industries of our country.

"Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be forwarded to Representatives and Senators of the United States Congress."

GEO. F. STONE, Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of private bills.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I call for the regular order. I suppose the first thing in order would be to vote on the bill H. R. 7211, which comes over from a former private-bill day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first thing in order at this time would be the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LANHAM. But this bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole two weeks ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be considered after the Committee of the Whole rises.

Mr. LANHAM. It comes over as unfinished business. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Those bills are taken up after the Committee of the Whole rises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. Those bills will be in order after the committee rises.

Mr. LANHAM. I think I am entitled at this time to ask the previous question upon that bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that the bill can not come up until after the Committee of the Whole rises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair apprehends the point made by the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman has the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not raise the question of consideration; but the rules of the House provide that the order of business at this time shall be going into Committee of the Whole House to consider the Private Calendar. At this time unfinished business is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No motion has been made that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. But that is the business in order. The House must either go into the Committee of the Whole now or refuse to do so.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not know that there is any such rule as that.

Mr. SPRINGER. It has been the universal custom of the House for unfinished business to come up after the Committee of the Whole rises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no doubt as to what is the custom of the House. The gentleman from Texas can call up this bill after the committee rises.

Mr. LANHAM. Do I understand the Chair to hold that this motion is not in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the gentleman's motion.

OWNERS OF STEAMER I. N. BUNTON.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7211) referring the claim of the owners of the steamer I. N. Bunton to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] demands the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it in order, pending the motion the gentleman from Texas has made, to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order at this time. It will be subsequently.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole; which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the eighth line strike out the words "as a court of admiralty jurisdiction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it in order now to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would not be in order on the question that the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will it be in order on the question for the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the passage of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. LANHAM. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Pending that motion I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the legal owner or owners of the steamer I. N. Bunton, her cargo, freight, tow, and personal effects, alleged to have been sunk by collision with the pier of the Davis Island Dam, in the Ohio River, on or about the 2d day of January, 1884, be referred to the Court of Claims, to hear and determine the same to judgment, with the right of appeal as in other cases: Provided, That no suit shall be brought under the provisions of this act after six months from the date of the passage thereof.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. On the motion to refer I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Would it be in order to inquire whether the damage to this steamer occurred when the Government was in possession of the works or not?

Mr. LANHAM. It was the Government's agents who were constructing the works.

Mr. RANDALL. Not contractors?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir; not contractors, as I understand.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The damage was done at a time when there is no proof that any Government agents were there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 47, noes 15.

So the motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, was rejected.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. CLARK.

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. VANDEVER.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. ARNOLD.

Mr. MOORE with Mr. DARLINGTON.

Mr. WISE with Mr. KEAN.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. MCCOMAS.

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. ROCKWELL.

The following were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. SPINOLA with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. TRACEY with Mr. DE LANO.

Mr. CARLTON with Mr. WEST.

Mr. STOCKDALE with Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio.

Mr. COCKRAN with Mr. WILBER.

The following were announced as paired until Monday, January 30:

Mr. RUSK with Mr. FITCH.

Mr. ELLIOTT with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia, with Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut.

Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. MOFFITT were announced as paired until February 7.

Mr. MCCORMICK and Mr. PENINGTON were announced as paired on all political questions until the 28th of January.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I had voted no, but I find that I was paired, so I have withdrawn my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 47 members voting in the affirmative.

YEAS—130.

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. BRIGGS with Mr. FELTON on all political questions for the rest of the day.

Mr. MILLIKEN with Mr. DIBBLE on all political questions for the rest of the day.

The following pairs on this vote were announced:

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. MCRAE with Mr. STRUBLE.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF IOWA.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6051) regulating the times for holding the terms of the United States courts in the northern district of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

A bill (H. R. 6336) for the relief of Martha J. A. Rumbaugh, administratrix of George H. Rumbaugh.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to invite the attention of the Chair for a few moments to a point of order upon this bill and an objection to its consideration, which it seems to me are tenable and ought to be insisted upon, and perhaps may apply to some, if not all, of the succeeding bills on this part of the Calendar, which contains a list of cases reported from the Court of Claims at a former session of Congress.

Now, this bill, which has been read by its title, was introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress by Mr. Bragg and was reported in that Congress by Mr. Geddes. These gentlemen are no longer members of Congress; at the end of the Forty-ninth Congress their official career ceased. And it seems to me, upon a more thorough examination of the rules which ought to govern in cases of this sort, that these bills and these reports died with the expiration of the Forty-ninth Congress. In other words, when that Congress expired all the bills introduced and reported in that Congress which had not been finally acted upon went into the waste basket of legislative history.

It is true that in the Bowman act it is provided in the seventh and last section that—

The reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be acted upon.

Reports from the Court of Claims "shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress;" but does this statutory provision, Mr. Chairman, give any authority to revitalize in this Congress an unconsidered bill and an unconsidered report of the Forty-ninth Congress? It is proper, perhaps, that these cases reported from the Court of Claims should be upon the Calendar for appropriate reference by the House.

When was this bill, the title of which has just been read by the Clerk, introduced in this House? It appears by the Calendar that it was "introduced March 1, 1886, read twice, and referred to the Committee on War Claims." That bill has not been introduced in this Congress at all. I submit, therefore, that it is a mere fugitive paper and can not be the basis of a legislative appropriation in the Fiftieth Congress.

We are now entering upon the work of considering some forty-four bills and reports coming over from the last Congress, involving, in the aggregate, an appropriation of nearly a quarter of a million of dollars, yet no committee of this House has passed upon these questions in the Fiftieth Congress. No member of this Congress has introduced this bill now called for consideration. This bill has never been read twice—it has never been read at all—in this Congress.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is it not true that these several bills have been placed upon this Calendar by the direction of the House? I understand that the Speaker directed these bills to be placed on the Calendar. And I will say to my friend that I ask the question because one of these bills, the second on the list, has been reported favorably to the House a number of times; it is for salaries due to employés of the Government for twenty-four years, and I feel a little solicitous that the bill should pass. I would have urged its being placed on the Calendar if I had not been under the impression that it was upon the Calendar by order of this House.

Mr. LANHAM. I will answer the gentleman. A parliamentary question was asked of the Speaker with reference to this bill; and on page 469 of the RECORD you will find this language:

The SPEAKER. The bills will be taken up in the order in which they appear on the Calendar.

Under the provisions of what is known as the Bowman act, all reports from the Court of Claims upon matters referred to that court by the committees of the House, and not disposed of, are continued from Congress to Congress, and go over, standing first, as a matter of course, on the Calendar.

But the distinction I make is this: Here are reports from the Court of Claims for appropriate reference, it seems to me. I do not believe that the Speaker held, or that he would have held if this question had been pointedly made, that a bill introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress by a member whose term has now expired, and a report submitted in the Forty-ninth Congress by a committee of that Congress, could properly be considered a bill and report in this Congress.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend will agree that these bills were placed on the Calendar by direction of the Speaker during the session of the House.

Mr. LANHAM. That seems to be the fact.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And no objection was made.

Mr. LANHAM. Well, sir, there was a parliamentary inquiry raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], but this precise point was not suggested to the Speaker. I went myself to him and asked him about these bills. His idea seemed to be that they ought to be placed upon the Calendar; yet the particular point which I now make was not, I think, made to the Speaker. Gentlemen well know the fact that under the rules all bills have to be introduced and have to be read a specified number of times.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman whether these bills now on the Calender have been reported from any committee of this House?

Mr. LANHAM. I have endeavored to state the exact facts in reference to this matter. Here is a bill, No. 6336, introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress by Mr. Bragg; here is a report, No. 1556, from the Committee on War Claims, by Mr. Geddes, in the Forty-ninth Congress. The terms of both these gentlemen have expired. This bill has never been introduced in the present House, so far as I am advised, nor has a report ever been made upon the bill from any committee in this, the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that these bills have been placed on the Calendar under the order of the Speaker at the beginning of the session. That is the point I wanted to get at.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will suspend for one moment. The Chair will state to the committee that this is a very important point of order submitted for his decision, and he will be obliged to gentlemen of the House if they will preserve order on the floor before he is called upon to decide it.

Mr. BLAND. The question is whether that was done by order of the House. I am not informed particularly about it, but my impression is that there was some order of the House about it.

Mr. LANHAM. I am not able to say whether there was any order of the House. The matter was called to the attention of the Speaker by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], as stated in a parliamentary inquiry submitted on the 14th of January.

Mr. LANHAM. Page 469.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that it was not on the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the Speaker made his ruling, but it was on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]; but it was afterwards referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and on that occasion the Speaker repeated the ruling he had made on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maryland. The ruling of the Speaker on the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois was made subsequently to the ruling on the point raised by the gentleman from Maryland, and I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the ruling of the Speaker on the point raised by the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it.

Mr. LANHAM. I had not seen that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, and then the Speaker repeated the ruling he had made on the application of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]. The ruling on the point of the gentleman from Illinois was made subsequent to the ruling on the point of the gentleman from Maryland.

It will be found on page 103 of the RECORD, in the proceedings of the House of the 19th of December, which were published in the RECORD of the 20th.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORTED CLAIMS ON THE CALENDAR.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The Bowman act, chapter 116, volume 22, of the Statutes at Large, in section 7, provides:

"That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon."

Now, in order to give effect and force to that continuance from Congress to Congress, my question is, will not claims thus reported back from the Court of Claims to the last Congress and then reported by its committee to the Forty-ninth Congress with an accompanying bill standing on the Calendar of the last Congress—will not those claims, under the force of the terms of the section which I have read, be placed upon the Calendar and be the first claims in priority on the Calendar for consideration during the present Congress? I send to the Speaker's desk the act to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair remembers the terms of the act. The practice in the House has been when a report is received from the Court of Claims it is referred to the committee which had original jurisdiction of the matter, the Committee on War Claims or the Committee on Claims, as the case may be. If that committee during that Congress reports the claim back again to the House, the Chair thinks that the section of the act to which the gentleman from Maryland refers requires the report to be continued on the Calendar, and the Chair has so instructed the Clerk in the present session to place on the Calendar in regular order all the reports made by committees on reports from the Court of Claims. That will be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that he will be kind enough to speak to the point of order he submits.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say in response to what has been read that the Speaker did not, I think, hold that these claims should be considered in the House on bills and reports introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will in a moment. The point of order could be well taken if it depends upon the fact that there is no bill on the Calendar or none introduced in the Fiftieth Congress making appropriation to pay the claims mentioned on the Calendar coming over from the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is none, so far as I know. Under that statement I submit the gentleman is mistaken. On the 4th of January I had the honor to introduce into this House a bill which provides appropriation in each one of these cases so reported in the Forty-ninth Congress favorably.

Mr. LANHAM. This case?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not speaking of this case; I am speaking of the cases from the Court of Claims. If the gentleman wishes to make a point of order to apply in all cases, I hope he will except out of his point of order those to which I have referred.

Mr. LANHAM. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Your point of order went to those cases.

Mr. LANHAM. I am making the point of order on this particular bill, and incidentally have mentioned the fact that there were other bills on the House Calendar that might be subject to the same objection.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas what has come over the spirit of his dream? What has induced him to make this objection to this bill after he had successfully put through the House a bill in the same position?

I want to ask the gentleman another question, and he may answer them both at the same time. Please tell the House for what purpose bills referred to committees go upon the Calendar or are referred to the Committee of the Whole House. Is it not that they are to be taken up and acted on? And when the Speaker decided that these bills should go upon the Calendar, he meant that they should go there for the action of the House, or for the action of the Committee of the Whole upon them. Is not that so?

Mr. LANHAM. I will to the best of my ability answer the question of the gentleman from Kentucky. He asks what change has come over the spirit of my dream. Now I wish to say that I have never claimed any superior parliamentary knowledge. I called the attention of the Speaker to these cases on the Calendar early in the session, under the impression that they were not properly on the Calendar. I went to the Speaker before the first private-bill day and called his attention to these cases from the Court of Claims.

I have been studying the question since, and these special objections, I will state to the gentleman, did not occur to me until after we had entered upon the consideration of the other bills. I had charge of but one of them; but upon a more thorough investigation of the rules of the House bearing upon the subject, my opinion is, and is decidedly, that this bill and others of like character now upon the Calendar can not be considered here unless they had been introduced into the House at the present session, and properly reported from committees.

Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky will be kind enough to state his last question again.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The last question was in substance a request that the gentleman would state to the House why these bills are put upon the Calendar at all. The Speaker has ordered, as we have seen, under the statute and the rules of the House, these bills to go upon the Calendar.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman contend that that ruling simply meant they should go there and then be referred to the committees? Do I understand that to be his construction? If that is the position he takes, it is wholly untenable, because bills are placed upon the Calendar of the House to be considered by the House, and not to be referred to the committees for reports.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand the gentleman's point of order to be so broad as that. If I understand the gentleman from Texas, his point of order does not apply to a case where a bill is now pending in the Fiftieth Congress of the same character as the one upon the Calendar coming over from the last Congress.

Mr. LANHAM. I am not making a point of order at present beyond the bill to which I at first referred.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the point of order applies only to where no bill is pending, as I understand the gentleman.

Mr. LANHAM. As a matter of course I am taking the case in the order I find it here.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to suggest to him, the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas will include all that class of bills which have come over from a former Congress and are now upon the Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not so understand it. I understand him to state distinctly that his point of order applies only to those cases where no bill in the present Congress is pending.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman from Kentucky asks why it is that these cases, reported from the Court of Claims, are now upon the Calendar. In answer I will state, I presume they are placed there in pursuance of the seventh section of the Bowman act, which provides that reports from the Court of Claims, not bills of a former Congress or reports of a former Congress, but judicial ascertainments of fact reached by the Court of Claims and transmitted to Congress, shall be considered from session to session and from term to term until finally acted upon.

Now, what was the exact purpose of that section I am not prepared to say. It may be that these matters should not be again referred to the Court of Claims; that having found the facts once, they should be transmitted to Congress for its action, upon proper bills being introduced and proper reports being made from the committees, and to avoid reconsideration of the same matters by the Court of Claims.

I do not understand that there is any rule of the House to be found which perpetuates and holds over a bill of the Forty-ninth Congress, which has expired, and a report of a committee of that Congress which is no longer in existence, and makes action upon both obligatory in this Congress.

Mr. CATCHINGS. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

Mr. LANHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. CATCHINGS. What does the gentleman from Texas understand the Speaker's ruling to be? Under his ruling what is to go upon the Calendar, the report of the committee of a former Congress, or the report of the Court of Claims?

Mr. LANHAM. It is perhaps not very clear what he did mean in that respect. He may have meant that the bills and reports of a former Congress should be put upon the Calendar, but not that they should be considered in the order in which we now find them. He did not mean to say that General Bragg's bill in the last Congress, and the report of Judge Geddes in the Forty-ninth Congress, should be made the basis of legislative appropriations in the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him further? It is clear the Speaker intended to rule that some reports should go upon the Calendar. Now if it was a report from the Committee on Claims, it is manifest that the ruling of the Speaker not only had reference to the findings of the Court of Claims, upon which the report was predicated, but to the bill reported at the time which accompanied the findings of the Court of Claims, and which bill is properly upon the Calendar under that ruling for consideration.

Mr. LANHAM. I maintain that reports from the Court of Claims are distinct and independent of bills introduced and reports submitted from committees of a former Congress; and the statute says that reports from the Court of Claims shall be continued, but not that these bills of a former Congress shall be revitalized and perpetuated for future Congresses.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that it seems to me the Speaker has already decided upon that law and its effect; and under his decision these cases are upon the Calendar by consent of the House. No appeal was taken from that decision, and hence it has the force of a construction of law placed upon it, and assented to by the House. These bills are on the Calendar therefore by consent of the House, and the committee can do nothing but consider them under that order of the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Precisely.

Mr. LANHAM. In response to the gentleman, I will say that these bills were upon the Calendar when the Speaker made his ruling as stated here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is mistaken in that. The Calendar was not published until after the 1st of January.

Mr. LANHAM. But the Speaker said that he had directed them to be put upon the Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That he had directed the Clerk in making up the Calendar to put them upon it. But that decision was made on the 19th of December and the Calendar was not published until the 1st of January.

Mr. LANHAM. But did the Speaker of the House intend by that decision to hold that these bills could come up for consideration in Committee of the Whole House, even if the point of order is raised to the effect that we are predicating an appropriation of public money upon a bill of a former Congress?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The Speaker, I think, has indicated very clearly what was to go on the Calendar. I call the attention of the Chair to what appears on page 469 of the RECORD, which I will read:

Mr. LANHAM. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that motion is submitted I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. As our Calendar is paged it contains two lists of private bills. One of these contains the bills coming over from the last Congress, reported from the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman act, and the other such bills as are reported from the committees of the House at this session. What I wish to inquire is which class of bills will take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The bills will be taken up in the order in which they appear on the Calendar.

Under the provisions of what is known as the Bowman act, all reports from the Court of Claims upon matters referred to that court by the committees of the House, and not disposed of, are continued from Congress to Congress, and go over, standing first, as a matter of course, on the Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. But as the Calendar is printed the bills reported from the different committees of the House are put first.

The SPEAKER. Then the Calendar is wrong. These bills which came over from the last Congress will take precedence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken in saying that they come first. They are printed upon one page of the Calendar; but those which came over from the Forty-ninth Congress are under a separate heading on another page.

Mr. SPRINGER. Read further what the Speaker said.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH (reading):

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true; but I always read a book from left to right. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. On page 5 of the Calendar, as printed, the bills reported from committees of the House at the present session appear in the order in which they were reported to the House, and on page 6 will be found the bills which come over from the last Congress. This order of paging should be reversed. The reports which come over from the last Congress should be first considered.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It thus appears, in confirmation of what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has said, that the House understood, in pursuance of the first ruling of the Speaker, that these bills should go upon the Calendar, to be disposed of in the ordinary course of business. For what other purpose they should go on the Calendar it is difficult to conceive. That ruling was reaffirmed, as is shown by what I have just read from the RECORD, in the presence of the House, and the House, in the regular course of business, took up, considered, and passed two or three of those bills, thus recognizing and affirming its former action, which was in accordance with the ruling of the Speaker, and we have acted upon that order of things ever since.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] that it is true those bills are first on the Calendar. The directions of the Speaker have been carried out literally. But has the point been raised before the Speaker that is now raised here? Will the gentleman be candid enough to inform me if he thinks that if the Speaker were now in the chair he would hold that Mr. Bragg's bill of the Forty-ninth Congress could be properly brought up to be passed now?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I hold it is in the power of the House to consider any bill upon that Calendar, however it may have been reported to the House, so long as it comes before the House in pursuance of its order.

Mr. LANHAM. A further effect of the consideration of these bills will be that this House will devote the most of its time for perhaps several months of this session to the consideration of bills reported by the committees of the former Congress.

Now, what opportunity will there be to reach for consideration the measures which we investigate at this Congress—the reports we make from the different committees—if we are charged with passing upon the action of a former Congress, the bills introduced and the reports made therefrom?

I submit the point of order that this bill can not be now considered, but that its appropriate treatment would be to make a reference of it to the Committee on War Claims, from whence it came, which committee could report the bill back to the House, when it would be placed on the Calendar, and it might be given the same priority, if it is entitled to that, when it shall come back from that committee.

I submit the point of order that the bill can not be appropriately and properly considered at this time. I will reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon a point of order the debate is not governed by the rule limiting debate. The Chair will listen to gentlemen who desire to express any views upon the point of order.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I desire only to reply to one point made by the gentleman from Texas, as I think his argument has been clearly met by the remarks heretofore made, except the last point, when he said there was no rule of this House that gave these bills preference on the Calendar. I hold there is a rule of the House, and it grows out of this state of things, that there is a law under which these bills have been referred to the Court of Claims. They went there under the Bowman act. That same law goes on to say what shall be done with those bills when they are returned here. When they were returned and the question of what should be done with them was raised in the House, the Speaker gave his decision, and that makes a rule until the Speaker's decision is reversed. His decision was that these bills should go upon the Calendar.

The gentleman from Texas refers especially to a bill as a bill of General Bragg, who was a member of the last House, and not a member of this House; but that bill goes upon the Calendar as a report from the Court of Claims, made by one department of this Government to the lower House of the legislative department of this Government.

Then, by a ruling of the Speaker, it goes upon the Calendar. That creates a rule for the House under which we are operating; and the statement that there is no rule of the House can not be maintained, I think, because this state of facts does exist, and this House can not make a rule that will set aside a law of the Congress of the United States. The enactment of a law requires, besides the action of the House, the concurrence of the Senate and the approval of the President; and while the power to do both these things, to make the rule and to enact the law, is derived from the same source, the House of Representatives can not make a rule that will set aside a law.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAND. I hardly concede the proposition of the gentleman that this House has not the power to make rules to govern itself, even though those rules may be in conflict with some law which undertakes to regulate its proceedings. But, sir, that is not the question here. The real point is that this Committee of the Whole has no power to deal with the question, and the point of order can not be raised in committee, but only in the House. These bills have been sent to the Calendar by the order of the House and the ruling of the Speaker, and this committee has no power over them except to consider them, and if any point of order is to be made with reference to them we must first go back into the House. The House of Representatives has full control of its own rules and its own order of business, and the point of order, if made at all, must be made in the House.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I fully agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] in what he has said upon the point which he has just stated, namely, that we can not make a rule in Committee of the Whole to govern this question, and that it can only be done in the House. But upon the point of order as raised by the gentleman from Texas, I do hold that the positions taken by him are altogether untenable, because the Speaker of this House had made a rule by which these bills were placed on the Calendar, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] never has refuted the proposition which I presented in order that he might refute it if he could, namely, that when we found these bills on the Calendar the only thing we could do with them was to take them up and dispose of them like other bills on the Calendar, because we find bills upon the Calendar only for the action of the House and not for reference to committees. Therefore, sir, I hold that the point which the gentleman from Texas makes comes too late, because we have already gone into this class of legislation under the rules of the House. His point comes too late, and the only effect that the maintaining of his position can have upon legislation will be to hinder and retard it, to throw all of these reports from the Court of Claims back into the Committee on War Claims and other committees, adding nothing to the carefulness with which they are examined, but hindering and delaying action upon them.

Mr. LANHAM. Does not the point of order embody the idea that when a bill is upon the Calendar and objected to, the committee shall rise and report the fact to the House?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I do not know what the gentleman intended upon that point.

Mr. LANHAM. I simply raised the question of consideration and stated objections. That was the object.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to say a word with reference to the point made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], because my convictions are not sufficiently clear upon that subject. I have not the slightest interest in the question involved here except to have a correct determination of the point of order sought to be enforced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], and I want to supplement that, if I can, with the view which I entertain with reference to the position of these bills and their right to be placed upon the Calendar. We have a rule of this House, adopted at the present session of Congress, the eleventh rule, which contains this provision:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rules.

Then it goes on to designate the subjects and the committees to which "proposed legislation" shall be referred. No one, I take it, will controvert the idea that the bills now sought to be considered in Committee of the Whole are "proposed legislation" within the meaning of the provision which I have just read, because they are propositions that are now presented to the House to be enacted into laws, which makes them "proposed legislation." There is a provision of the Constitution of the United States which tells us that each House—each House, not both Houses, but each House—may determine rules of its proceedings.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Wait a moment; let me proceed in my own way. The provision of the Constitution is that each House may determine the rules of its own proceedings; not that the Senate and the House by a concurrent resolution, or by a resolution signed by the President, may make rules for the guidance of this House or of the Senate——

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit a question at that point?

Mr. ROGERS. I must decline to yield now. I want to be courteous, but I can be more logical if the gentleman will let me proceed without interruption. Each House is to make its own rules of proceeding. There is a principle of the common law which tells us that acts in derogation of the powers of a future Parliament bind not. So I hold, Mr. Chairman, that the Congress of the United States, acting in concert with the President of the United States, can pass no law that can bind this House in the regulation of its proceedings. "Acts in derogation of the powers of a future Parliament bind not;" so that if the power exists in each House of Congress to prescribe rules for its own proceedings no legislation that Congress may enact can deprive this House of that constitutional power.

We have another rule adopted by the present Congress which prescribes what bills shall go upon the Calendar. That rule does not say that bills reported to this House in a former Congress shall go upon that Calendar; but it does say that bills reported from the committees of this House shall go there, and prescribes upon which of the Calendars they shall go, for we have three Calendars under the present rules.

Another point: Judge Story, in his Commentaries, lays down this maxim touching the construction of the Constitution—that you can not construe one provision of the Constitution so as to nullify another; all its provisions must stand together, if possible. Now, if I am correct upon these two propositions—and I think there can not be any very great doubt on this—what did Congress undertake to do when it passed the Bowman act? Did it undertake to say that the reports of the Court of Claims to Congress shall go upon our Calendars? Not at all. There is no such provision as that. It does not say what disposition shall be made of these reports, except that they "shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon." What is the fair construction of that provision of the Bowman act? Why, Mr. Chairman, I take it to mean this, and it could not mean more than this, because if it did it would be in derogation of that provision of the Constitution which I have read, giving to each House of Congress the right to prescribe the rules of its own proceedings—it simply meant that it would not be necessary for the Court of Claims to certify these claims to each Congress, but that the certification of them to one Congress would necessarily place them before a succeeding Congress, if they should not have been disposed of. This, I think, is all that can be fairly construed as being required by the provisions of the seventh section of the Bowman act, that "reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall have been finally acted upon."

Whatever is embraced in the reporting of these claims to Congress is meant to be continued from Congress to Congress without any additional action on the part of the court; that is, they shall remain here as reported to this body from Congress to Congress, requiring no additional action on the part of the court until they have finally been disposed of. This seventh section, I maintain, can embrace no broader, no wider, no more far-reaching construction than that with reference to the procedure of our body without nullifying that provision of the Constitution which gives us the power to prescribe our own rules of procedure.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, waiving the point made by the gentleman from Missouri, I wish to say that no question is raised in any proposition before the House as to the right of this body to prescribe rules for the government of its own proceedings. The only question is whether the House has in this case exercised that right. No one will contend that the Bowman act could, for one moment, control the right of this body to prescribe how or in what manner the reports from the Court of Claims should be dealt with by this body, if at all. But has this House, in the exercise of the right which the gentleman from Arkansas claims for it, provided for the case in hand? We think it has. The Bowman act provides that these reports shall be considered as before Congress from session to session. Now, clearly, it is perfectly competent for this House to provide that the bills to which these reports relate or in connection with which they were made should be placed upon the Calendar for consideration by this body. Can there be any doubt about that? Can there be any doubt that it was competent for the Speaker to place a bill upon the Calendar with the consent of the House, regardless of Rule XI? That is precisely what was done in this case.

The Speaker is the mouthpiece of this House; and when this question was presented to the House, he directed, without a trace of dissent, and hence with its approval, that these bills with the reports should be placed upon the Private Calendar. When the attention of the House was again challenged to this matter, upon the point of order being raised as to the place these bills should occupy upon the Calendar, the position was reaffirmed that they were rightfully upon the Calendar, and to be considered by the House; for they are only upon the Calendar for the purpose of being considered, and for no other purpose—that is, for such disposition as this legislative body may order.

Now, I will not undertake to dispute the position of my honored friend from Texas, that a point might have been properly made as to whether these measures should go upon the Calendar without reference to a committee. But the House has made its order in this matter. The Speaker directed that these bills should go upon the Private Calendar; the House assented to it, and hence, with the unanimous approval of the House, this thing has been ordered to be done; and no rule of the House can stand in the way of any act which this body, acting as a unit, may by unanimous consent decide to do. And I insist it having made that order—whether it might have properly been objected to or not, it was not objected to—it was made a rule, or rather an order of the House, and the bills under it are rightfully on the Calendar.

I need hardly say it would work a gross injustice to a great many to disregard that order of the House, for beyond question it is an order of the House, made with the assent and approval of every member—at least there was no dissent, which amounts to an affirmation—and bills were from time to time considered in pursuance of the assignment and were passed; and whether or not my friends here might have insisted on sending those bills to sundry committees is not the question, but whether the House, in the exercise of its power under the Constitution, had the power to make the order under which we are proceeding. The Speaker as the organ and mouthpiece of the House directed this Calendar to be made up. There was no objection. Attention was subsequently called to the matter, and the arrangement of the bills on the Calendar was changed by the House, through its Speaker, in open session, and bills on the Calendar, as rearranged, were taken up and considered and passed. Now, and for the first time, the authority of the House to do this is questioned. Mark, the power of this body to make rules and regulations for the government of its proceedings is in no wise questioned, but what we claim is that in the exercise of its high prerogative the House has made this order by which we are bound until this body shall otherwise order.

The action of the Senate had nothing to do with it; the action of the Forty-ninth Congress nothing to do with it, except in so far as the Bowman act presented the necessity of an early adjustment of these claims. It was the action of this body.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I think if we will take into consideration some primary rules of construction it may avoid all difficulty here; the first of which is to so construe all laws as to carry into effect the object which the legislature had in view in enacting the law. All gentlemen who were here when the Bowman act was passed will agree the purpose Congress had in view in the enactment of that law was to get rid of the biennial reintroduction and reconsideration and reinvestigation of these claims. They were put through the mill once every two years and they remained here. The purpose Congress had in view was to provide a tribunal for the consideration of those measures and for the purpose of getting an ascertainment of the real facts in each case. Then the law provided when the Court of Claims shall have made its report that the bill which brought the claim in, and was the vehicle which took it to the Court of Claims, should cease, and the report of the Court of Claims thereafter should remain until Congress acted upon it.

Mr. SHAW. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHAW. Has not the Speaker of this House the power to decide questions of order; and has not the Speaker and the House already passed upon the question before this committee? Would it be competent for this Committee of the Whole to reverse that decision?

The CHAIRMAN. That is one of the things which the Chairman of this committee is called upon to decide, and he will decide it when the argument has been concluded.

Mr. DUNN. Therefore the report of the Court of Claims remains, and there is one of the difficulties the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] falls into. He is desirous of proceeding with the reintroduction of these bills, but the law itself dispenses with that necessity. The bill has become functus officio when it carries a claim to the Court of Claims. The language of the statute is that the reports of the Court of Claims shall remain until they are disposed of by Congress. The report against any claim by Congress is the final disposition of it; and in my opinion the point of order may be made against any bill which may be attempted afterwards to be introduced in behalf of some claim which Congress has once rejected. When Congress has once rejected any of these reports of the Court of Claims, that is the final disposition of it within the meaning of the statute. Those reports remain here, and Congress must deal with them.

Now, the point made by my colleague [Mr. ROGERS], that no law in derogation of the right of each House to fix its own rules is allowable, is very good law provided it fits the premises. But this rule is made under the statute on the subject of these reports. These reports are sui generis. They are not included in any other measure or class of measures which comes before the House. The language of Rule XI, which says "proposed legislation," means legislation proposed in the way provided by the rules of the House. You must introduce the bills, resolutions, petitions, and so on, with reference to committees, etc. The rule goes to that extent and no other. We have no rule in this House as to these reports. What, then, must govern? These reports stand alone. They stand sui generis. Then the statute must govern in the absence of a rule. The statute must govern where there is no rule to govern the particular matter in question.

The point made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole can not decide the point of order, is not tenable. There are certain contingencies which may arise in Committee of the Whole which under the rules may require the committee to rise and report to the House for a decision. But it is not a parliamentary question as to whether the House will consider the proposition or not.

Mr. BLAND. Let me interrupt the gentleman to state the point I made. It is that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole can not of himself decide the point of order as to a question of consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman can not decide whether the Committee of the Whole will consider a bill upon the Calendar or not. To determine that question we must first go into the House. The bills are upon the Calendar by order of the House for consideration, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole can not vacate that order of the House by deciding that any bill shall not be considered. He must get the authority from the House to do so.

Mr. DUNN. That applies to one single condition in the category, which is familiar to all the old members of the House; that is, that when we shall have gone into Committee of the Whole and it is desired to pass by without consideration a certain measure for the purpose of reaching one lower down upon the Calendar, then, of course, it is necessary that the committee shall rise and go into the House, and the motion is made in the House to dispense with the consideration of that particular bill in committee. But that is not such a question as is here presented. This is not a bill which it is sought to pass over. This is not a question as to whether or not we will consider one or the other of these reports. Not at all. But the question is, finding these measures upon the Calendar, shall they be considered at all? Who shall decide that point except the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole? The Speaker will tell you if you go into the House that it is a question for the Committee of the Whole and not for the House to deal with. The Speaker has already made his ruling upon it, and has placed the reports upon the Calendar. They are upon the Calendar to be dealt with. We have no rule except that statute which places them before the present Congress; and hence they are before it for consideration.

Mr. KERR. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Can any bill be passed by this Congress to carry out the recommendations of the Court of Claims, in any given case, without first having that bill introduced and properly referred in this Congress?

Mr. DUNN. No bill can be; but this statute has provided specially that when a bill has been heretofore introduced in another Congress, and has, under the statute, been referred, not to a committee of the House, but to the Court of Claims, that when that report comes back to the House it shall remain until it is disposed of by Congress, either at that term or some succeeding term. That is the condition of things existing now; and that is the condition with which we have to deal.

Mr. WARNER. As I understand the language of the Bowman act, it is substantially this: that the reports, if not disposed of at the first session——

Mr. DUNN. No, not the first session.

Mr. WARNER. When not disposed of, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until finally acted upon.

Mr. DUNN. That is the language.

Mr. WARNER. That is, until they are finally acted upon by Congress.

Mr. DUNN. That is it.

Mr. WARNER. Then, how can Congress finally act upon a report of the Court of Claims save by the introduction of a bill, with reference to that report, and that bill acted upon by a committee of the House as other bills are acted upon? The statute does not continue the bill of the Forty-ninth Congress from session to session or from Congress to Congress, but only has reference to the decision of the Court of Claims—its report—so as to provide against the necessity of that court reporting from Congress to Congress upon the same claim on which the report is already predicated. It is that report which is continued from Congress to Congress.

Mr. DUNN. Undoubtedly. But it does not require or contemplate a reintroduction of the bill as an enabling measure to empower Congress to deal with the subject. The law perpetuates the substance of the bill, but deals with it afterwards as a report.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will permit an interruption——

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman holds, as I understand, that a bill introduced in the last Congress is a proper foundation for an appropriation of money in this Congress to carry out its provisions?

Mr. DUNN. If it has taken the course directed by the Bowman act. The bill was originally the proper vehicle to bring the claim before Congress; but the Congress having expired, the statute perpetuates the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. Perpetuates the report; but what about the bill?

Mr. DUNN. It is immaterial. The bill is functus officio when the Court of Claims acts upon the case.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, if that be correct, if the bill is functus officio, on what do you base your appropriation?

Mr. DUNN. On the report of the Court of Claims.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then you will have your legislation upon the statute-books headed as reports instead of bills?

Mr. DUNN. Why will the gentleman not read the Calendar here?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have read it.

Mr. DUNN. Here it is styled a "report." That is the language all the way through.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that. But each report is accompanied by a bill. What I ask the gentleman is this: The bill being, as he states, functus officio, upon what does he propose to base his appropriation? Because the report is not in that form upon which to predicate legislation providing an appropriation of money.

Mr. DUNN. Why, sir, Congress, in appropriating, must use the necessary language for that purpose, and designate the claim to be satisfied. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the gentleman from Arkansas admits there is nothing before the House that would do this in the Rumbaugh case? I make these suggestions because this is a new question and an important one.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman's rule was good, the Appropriations Committee could never make up a bill, because there is not a bill pending for each item.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Arkansas can not switch me off on that line, because the Appropriations Committee brings in a bill in form, which the Court of Claims does not propose to do and has not done, and we would necessarily have to legislate without a bill in form.

Mr. DUNN. That can be all provided for.

Mr. McMILLIN. It has usually been customary to put bills in form before they are passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must insist on better order in the committee. Business will be suspended until conversation ceases on the floor. It is necessary that the committee and the Chair should hear the discussion.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman from Arkansas permit me a question?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that this report, submitted April 6, 1886, and committed to the whole House, is a part of the finding of fact or a part of the report of the Court of Claims, filed January 25, 1886?

Mr. DUNN. That is a matter that I do not know about, nor do I understand how much the gentleman's question covers. I suppose when the report is made by the Court of Claims it is a complete report, and that the court sends back here all the papers connected with the case in their entirety.

Mr. LANHAM. In this particular case the court, on January 25, 1886, found the facts and transmitted them to Congress; then on the 6th of April, 1886, the Committee on War Claims made a report upon the findings of fact by the Court of Claims. Now, does the gentleman from Arkansas go so far as to hold that this report of the Committee on War Claims is a part of the report of the Court of Claims contemplated in the Bowman act?

Mr. DUNN. I will say to the gentleman that I am not familiar with the details of any particular case. I am dealing with the question of the effect of this law and its obligation on this House in the absence of any rule of the House governing these particular cases. I take it for granted that the Clerk in placing these bills upon the Calendar obeyed the order of the Speaker of the House and placed them there in their entirety as they came to the House in accordance with the Bowman act; and I take it for granted that there is in those reports everything pertaining to the particular case that originally came into Congress, with the findings of the court superadded.

Mr. LANHAM. But in this particular case, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. DUNN. I am not talking of a particular case.

Mr. LANHAM. In this case the bill was introduced in March, 1886, reported by the committee in April, 1886, while the report of the Court of Claims was filed January 25, 1886. All this could not be part and parcel of the same matter.

Mr. DUNN. If they are disconnected in any way, that may be ground for special objection in that case.

Mr. ADAMS. Has the gentleman from Arkansas completed his remarks?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir; I have been simply answering questions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is this point which I wish to submit. The report made by the committee to which this finding of the Court of Claims was made is based upon the finding of the Court of Claims after they had examined that finding, and they submit the finding with their report in each case. Of course they may bear different names, but one relates to the other.

Mr. LANHAM. But the report of the committee is not a part of the report of the Court of Claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is based upon the finding of the Court of Claims in each particular case.

Mr. ADAMS. I believe gentlemen who have discussed the supposed contradiction between these propositions on the Calendar—whether you call them reports or bills—and the rules of the House have overlooked the fact that when these propositions—whether reports or bills does not matter to my mind—were placed upon the Calendar for the consideration of this House, this House of the Fiftieth Congress was not acting under any rules whatever, but was acting under the general parliamentary law.

The order to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] referred, or rather the announcement which the Speaker made of that order, occurred on the 19th of December; but the Committee on Rules did not make its report until two days afterward. Accordingly, when this order was made by the Speaker, without objection from any one, placing these propositions on the Calendar, this House had not adopted the rules of the Forty-ninth Congress, or any other rules, but was acting under general parliamentary law. Under general parliamentary law there is no reference to a committee that I know of; there is no rule that a bill shall be read once, twice, or thrice.

There is no rule that a proposition to be voted on by the House must be introduced in written form by any particular member or in any particular way. It is enough that the Speaker announces to the House some proposition on which the House is to act yea or nay; and for a House in that condition of affairs, acting not under specific rules but under the general parliamentary law, I believe it is perfectly competent to take up any proposition or any set of propositions and place them on any Calendar which it chooses to place them on, and in that manner make such limitations on the action of the House in regard to those propositions as it sees fit.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman if the Speaker of the House, on a point raised during this session, has not ruled that this House, previous to the adoption of the rules, was acting under the general parliamentary law as modified by the practice of the House of Representatives, and I wish to read from page 436 of the Digest this:

While the question as to the binding effect of the rules of the preceding upon the existing House has been frequently raised at the commencement of each Congress, it has been almost uniformly decided that the rules of the preceding House remain in force until otherwise ordered by the existing House.

Mr. ADAMS. That may have been a convenient rule for the Speaker to adopt in passing upon any question of order in the House of Representatives of the Fiftieth Congress, but it is just as incompetent for the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress to bind this House by rules as it is for the legislative power of the Forty-ninth Congress to bind this House by a statute. Undoubtedly, questions of parliamentary law arising at the beginning of a Congress must be settled according to principle. Undoubtedly, in settling such questions, it is convenient and proper for the Speaker to consider what the practice of the House has been. But when it is proposed or when the Speaker of the House proposes that certain propositions shall be placed upon the Calendar instead of being referred to a committee, it does not follow that any rule of any preceding House providing for consideration by a committee, or by any other method of procedure, shall render that action incompetent or improper.

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. HOOKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi later. The Chair is under obligations to recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] at this time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, it is important for us to get at the true condition of the Calendar and to ascertain the exact facts before we undertake to determine the proper disposition of the question now being discussed. To illustrate, there is on the Calendar, designated as a "report," a bill for the relief of Martha J. A. Rumbaugh, administratrix of George H. Rumbaugh, which was introduced by Mr. Bragg in the last Congress. Accompanying that bill is the report of a committee of the last Congress made by Mr. Geddes, of Ohio. That bill and that report are put upon the Calendar. This is not the report of the Court of Claims at all. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has already stated that the report of the Court of Claims simply finds conclusions of fact.

The committee in the last House took up the whole question, investigated it and reported a particular bill, and that bill, with the report, is on the Calendar—not the report of the Court of Claims, but the report of a committee of the last Congress.

Mr. LANHAM. The finding of the Court of Claims was precedent to the report of the committee and the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; the finding of the Court of Claims and the report of the committee are two distinct things. I do not mean that their subjects are different, but I mean that one of them is the product of the Court of Claims, while the other is the action of a committee of the last Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, that that is the status of the matter. But whether that be correct or not, Mr. Chairman, I hold that now for the first time this question of order has been brought distinctly before the House. For the purpose of illustration I will read from the RECORD what took place here on a former occasion:

Mr. LANHAM. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that motion is submitted I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. As our Calendar is paged it contains two lists of private bills. One of these contains the bills coming over from the last Congress, reported from the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman act, and the other such bills as are reported from the committees of the House at this session. What I wish to inquire is which class of bills will take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The bills will be taken up in the order in which they appear on the Calendar.

Under the provisions of what is known as the Bowman act, all reports from the Court of Claims upon matters referred to that court by the committees of the House, and not disposed of, are continued from Congress to Congress, and go over, standing first, as a matter of course, on the Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. But as the Calendar is printed the bills reported from the different committees of the House are put first.

The SPEAKER. Then the Calendar is wrong. These bills which came over from the last Congress will take precedence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken in saying that they come first. They are printed upon one page of the Calendar; but those which came over from the Forty-ninth Congress are under a separate heading on another page.

The SPEAKER. On page 5 of the Calendar, as printed, the bills reported from committees of the House at the present session appear in the order in which they were reported to the House, and on page 6 will be found the bills which come over from the last Congress. This order of paging should be reversed. The reports which come over from the last Congress should be first considered.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, sir, it would appear from the RECORD that the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was not whether these bills came over from the last Congress, but whether they took precedence of the bills reported in this House, and that is the question that was decided by the Speaker. The question of order raised this morning was not raised there, and was not passed upon by the House or by the Speaker. The only question upon which the Speaker passed on that occasion was the question as to the right of precedence of these bills upon the Calendar.

Mr. COBB. Not the question of their right to be on the Calendar at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not, as suggested by my friend from Alabama, not the question of the right of these bills to be upon the Calendar. If that question had been raised and decided by the Speaker, the decision might have been excepted to and the House might have reversed it, but that question never was raised at all.

Are we in such a condition that in this way, without any deliberate action of this House and contrary to its rules, we must accept this as the action of the House?

Mr. DUNN. I would like to read to the gentleman from Georgia a portion of the Bowman act to show him that the very report which he describes is here in exact accordance with the Bowman act; that it is such a report as the statute contemplates:

When the facts have been found by the Court of Claims, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

Then section 7 provides that the reports of the Court of Claims—meaning, of course, the report made to the committee—"shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress." There is a perfect and absolute description of this report in the terms of the law.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend discussed that point for some time, and I suppose his idea now is simply to interject it into my remarks. I have no objection to recurring to that question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist that in the face of the rules of this House prescribing that bills of different character shall go to different committees for consideration and report to this House, we ought not to accept a construction not debated which has the effect of upsetting those rules. My friend from Arkansas seems to think that his reference to the Bowman act relieves this situation entirely.

Mr. LANHAM. My friend from Georgia will allow me to state in this connection that the report of the findings of fact in this particular case by the Court of Claims was previous to the introduction of the bill and the report of the committee. Hence the bill and the report of the committee can not be considered in any sense as a part of the findings of fact by the Court of Claims which were transmitted to Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Arkansas undertakes to draw a distinction between a report of the Court of Claims and a bill. Why, sir, in the very nature of a legislative body there can be no such distinction as he is attempting to make. There can be no appropriation of money except by the joint action of the two Houses in the form of a bill. The distinction sought to be made is one which I can not perceive at all.

It is a matter of great importance, sir, whether we are to preserve the right of this House to make its own rules. We have never by any deliberate action indicated any disposition to abdicate that authority. On the contrary, we have deliberately, as have all former bodies, determined emphatically upon our rules of procedure, and amongst other things we have determined upon a rule as to claims, directing specifically to what committees they shall go.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, my friend will not deny that when these bills have been reached in their order and are called up for consideration upon the Calendar under the order made, there is a sanction by the House of the order assigning them to the Calendar. Can the gentleman get away from that proposition? Bills upon the Calendar under that order have been reached, the House has proceeded to their consideration from time to time, and has passed one or two, I think, which were advocated by my friend from Texas. This, I submit, is not only a recognition of and acquiescence in the order which authorized the making of this Calendar, but is an approval of that order. So that, if there has been any disregard of the rules, the suspension has been by the order of the House—by its deliberate act.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not so understand the case. The question has never been raised until now as to what course should be taken in reference to these bills. They were, it is true, directed to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why, my friend knows the question was raised as to the place they should occupy on the Calendar.

Mr. BLOUNT. And nothing else. That was all the question raised.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, if a bill has no business on the Calendar, the House, through its Speaker, will hardly direct where it shall be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seeks to fasten upon this House a ruling by inadvertent action when the House has deliberately declared what shall be the course taken with reference to all these matters. In the face of our rules, does the gentleman, knowing that if all he says is true it has been inadvertently done, ask us to affirm such action as a rule of the House?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only ask that those who have been placed in a certain position by the action of the House shall not be wronged by other action of the House. Let these bills be disposed of in accordance with the action already taken, and then, if you choose, suspend or rescind the rule, if you think it has been adopted through inadvertence.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman asks that no one shall be wronged by the reversal of inadvertent action on the part of the House. Sir, there are many hardships arising in matters of this kind. Bills of very great importance are often in such a position that they can not be reached under the rules. But that does not touch the question whether the rules shall be construed as of binding force. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this House is not going to hold deliberately that a class of claims which have never been investigated by any committee of this House, the present committee entertaining perhaps entirely different views from the committee of a former House, shall be brought up for consideration in such a manner that the House is denied the benefit of the usual machinery which looks to proper precaution in matters of legislation. They are ex parte claims any way, and if there is any direction in which caution should be observed it is in the mode of the consideration of these claims.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The gentleman says these are claims which have never been investigated by any committee of the House. Now does he not consider the reference of these claims to the Court of Claims under the statutes constitutes the Court of Claims in the nature of a committee with power to investigate and report upon facts?

Mr. BLOUNT. That is a different question. This House does not shut its eyes blindly to the action of that court. On the contrary, it ought to consider it, and it was contemplated it would take it into consideration in reference to these claims. We have done it in reference to some cases at this session of Congress.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia what is the object of sending bills to the Court of Claims, if Congress, after the Court of Claims has investigated the facts and given the result of their investigation to this House—this House is going through the same examination and investigation of them it would if they never went to any court and were never investigated by any court?

Mr. BLOUNT. It may seem unreasonable to my friend from Maine that Congress should not shut its eyes blindly to the conclusions of the Court of Claims, but it has never done so, and I trust never will do so.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is not the question I asked. Why send them there at all?

Mr. BLOUNT. The action of the Court of Claims is merely advisory; they find the facts in the cases referred to them and report their findings to Congress for its action.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If I understand my friend from Georgia, he asks for advice which he will never take.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not help my friend's understanding, but I do not think that those who have listened to me believe I had any such idea in what I said. It has never been in the contemplation of the act of Congress as the argument of my friend from Maine would seem to suggest. I have not said so. Why do you shrink from your logic when your attention is called to it?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I prefer to draw my own conclusion rather than to let the gentleman from Georgia draw it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know the gentleman would, because he is enthusiastically for the consideration of these claims; I do not mean improperly so.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I prefer to draw my own conclusions.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know you do, as I see the gentleman is pleased with himself.

Mr. HOOKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Texas is that these bills which have not been reintroduced in this Forty-ninth Congress are not the subject of consideration properly by this Committee of the Whole House in the order of business under which it is now proceeding; that at the head of the Calendar which you are now considering are the following "Court of Claims cases reported in the Forty-ninth Congress, and brought forward;" that on the Calendar which you are now considering the question arises when each case is called whether or not the committee has proper jurisdiction to consider that case. I take it, under the Bowman act, if there is a report from the Court of Claims upon a specific bill or subject-matter pending before the House or any committee of the House, which under the Bowman act had been referred to the Court of Claims either by the House or by a committee of the House for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and reporting back to the committee or back to the House, then under that act which we passed in 1883, and by which all matters pending before the House by bill or resolution were referred to the Court of Claims for the purpose of reporting on the facts—I say that ever since the passage of that act these matters reported on by the Court of Claims would come forward naturally from session to session and Congress to Congress until the subject-matters were disposed of.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Would Congress be compelled to act upon a bill introduced in a former House?

Mr. HOOKER. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. It has been said by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], to whose judgment I defer, that when a report from the Court of Claims comes to the House or the committee the bill or resolution referred to it becomes functus officio and can not again be introduced or referred. It seems to me the act of 1883 ought to keep alive the subject-matter referred to the Court of Claims, and that it does keep it alive till it is acted on and disposed of.

Mr. DUNN. What I meant to say was that the reintroduction of that bill into this Congress is not necessary.

Mr. HOOKER. I agree entirely with the honorable gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. DUNN. And so far as the bill formed a part of this report and in its entirety it is here.

Mr. HOOKER. I think the true construction under this act is that when a bill is referred to the Court of Claims for ascertainment of the facts of a case, and reported back to the House or to a committee of this House, that keeps the case alive until it is disposed of.

But the very purpose and object of the Bowman act, the motive in question, was that we should have a reference to the Court of Claims of the legal questions involved, for the purpose of ascertaining through the proper legal machinery of that court the actual facts on which each given case was predicated and on which the House was called to act. Having that finding of the Court of Claims before us, it enabled the House, being then in possession of the subject-matter upon which it desired to be informed, to shape its legislation in accordance with those findings.

For instance, if the Court of Claims should report back that there is no foundation in fact for the recognition of a given claim referred to it by the House of Representatives, the House would probably determine that, under the finding of the Court of Claims, there is no foundation in fact for this claim, and we recommend that it do not pass. But if, on the other hand, the court find the existence of a given state of facts upon which they are not allowed to pass judgment, they report their findings in that event—assuming it to be a question of loss or damage to property—back to Congress, and that report keeps alive, ex necessitate rei, the subject-matter which had been referred to the Court of Claims to pass upon. I think there is no other construction, in the absence of any rule, of which the Bowman act is susceptible, except that it keeps alive the subject-matter and the facts upon which the court has been called to act.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, as I stated at the outset of my remarks, I do not understand that the question presented here is one which this committee can dispose of. We find these bills and reports upon the Calendar by order of the Speaker of the House, with the consent of the House. Whether they are put there for the consideration of the committee or not, seems to be a question; and a question has arisen whether this committee of the House shall consider the bill in a given case, or the whole of them as a class; and that being the case, it seems to me we must first rise and go into the House before we can dispose of that subject. It is manifestly a question for the House to determine whether the committee shall consider them or not.

How do these bills happen to be upon the Calendar and called up for consideration? If they are upon the Calendar and have been called in their regular order for consideration in Committee of the Whole, what disposition will the committee make of them? Is it for the Chairman of the committee to decide what bills the committee shall consider, or is it not rather a question for the House to determine? If the ruling of the Speaker in placing bills upon the Calendar is not in harmony with the regular order in which they shall be considered, it is the function of the House to determine a different order. Hence in any event, to dispose of the subject, it is necessary for the committee to rise and go into the House, and let the House determine whether it shall consider them upon the Calendar; and if so, when, where, and how. If they are not to be considered, and it is so determined by the House, we will understand that they are to be referred to a proper committee, and that committee can report them back for reference; but we have no power here to refer them to a committee. We have no other power in the premises than to consider them here in committee and make some order, either reporting them to the House for further consideration or recommending that they shall not pass. It is not for the Chairman of the committee to determine whether or not the committee shall consider them. We are bound to consider them if upon the Calendar and called up for consideration. What consideration they shall have is another question. If the committee desires to return them to the House for its determination, it is in order; but it is not in order for the Chairman to say that the committee shall not, under any circumstances, or for any purpose, consider the bills.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident, as this discussion has progressed, that the question is not a point of order against this bill, but the question, as stated by the gentleman from Texas at one time during his remarks, is the question of consideration. The question is whether or not we shall consider this bill. And I want to call the attention of the House to one state of facts that has been developed by the discussion.

It was said in the outset of this discussion, with reference to the consideration of these claims now, that because they had been considered by no committee since the report of the Court of Claims, that it was not in order to consider them now by a committee of the House.

Mr. LANHAM. The point was that they had not been considered by a committee of the present House.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. But in answer to a remark of the gentleman from Georgia, awhile ago, the gentleman from Texas developed the fact that this very bill on which the question of consideration has been raised had been referred to the Court of Claims, the facts found, and they had been reported back to the Forty-ninth Congress, and upon that finding of fact the bill was drawn and the committee to whom it was referred reported it back to the House.

Mr. LANHAM. I think the gentleman from Kentucky misapprehends the suggestion in reference to this particular bill being referred to the Court of Claims, because I find the Court of Claims, antecedent to that reference, had made a report in that case.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. That is just what I have said. The court made its findings in the case, and based upon the findings the report was made and the bill introduced.

Mr. LANHAM. In the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. In the Forty-ninth Congress.

Now, what was the object of this Bowman act? It was simply to facilitate the consideration of claims against the Government. What is the result of the action of this House to-day upon this question? It is to retard the consideration of claims. It is to pile back upon the committees this immense amount of work that they have gone through before. I should like the members of this House just to look into the correspondence, of the Committee on War Claims especially, and there hear the heart-rending appeals of people all over this country that are coming up to the Congress of the United States to grant them relief in the small sums of money asked for in these bills. Yet here we come and, like a set of children, quarrel over the consideration of a bill which has been placed on the Calendar, and thereby say to these people, "We are too dignified; we must have too much order in our proceedings to enable us to do justice to you who are starving for bread all over the country."

Mr. LANHAM. Are we not met by the same appeals and importunities in this Congress as in former Congresses?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. We are met by the same appeals; and that but adds force to the argument. If you turn these people back who, the Court of Claims has said, have just claims against the Government, you force upon them again the necessity of appealing to the members of this House and the Committee on War Claims for help from the dilemma in which they are placed.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] took the position that this House had a right to make any rule it chose or set aside any law of Congress. Does the House have that right? I deny it. I deny that we have a right to make a rule that will deprive any class of our citizens of their rights under a law made by Congress for their benefit.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman from Kentucky declare that Congress may legislate against the right of this House to make rules of its own procedure?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I hold that a law of the United States made in the interest of any class of its citizens is supreme, and must govern the action of this House until a law is passed repealing it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then do I understand the gentleman to say that the act must control where admittedly it is in conflict with a rule of this House as to how these claims should be considered?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I hold that the rule of this House can not set aside the law made by the Congress of the United States. But if the position of the gentleman from Georgia is tenable, that this House has a right to abrogate any law of the United States——

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend will not mistake me. I never took the position that this House had the right to abrogate any law of the United States.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to ask me if I did not believe that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will state the question again, so that the gentleman may not misconceive me. Does he hold that Congress can pass any law which shall abrogate the mode of procedure in the House of Representatives, and that the House can not change that?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. No, sir; nor does anybody else that I know of hold that sort of an idea. But I do hold that a law of the United States, made by the Congress of the United States and approved by the President, is supreme over a rule of this House until abrogated by a law of the same kind.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman say it would not be competent for the House to declare that these bills should go before a committee while that law is in existence?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I say it may be competent for the House to do so, but this House has not done it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman say the House has not the power to do it?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. We are not dealing with suppositions, but we are dealing with the facts in the case. And the fact is, the result of the action of this House to-day is to retard legislation and prevent the execution of a law that was made in the interest of a worthy class of the people of the United States. Its operation is to prevent them from getting justice, and it acts against them in every way. That is what I say in regard to the action to day and the rule of this House.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me a question?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States decided that wherever Congress by a law creates a tribunal for the purpose of adjusting a claim against it, and the case is submitted to that tribunal and is decided, the decision is binding upon the Government?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes; the Supreme Court has made a decision exactly of that kind. It has been said here that these findings of the Court of Claims were on ex parte evidence. Why, sir, the action of the committees of this House is on ex parte evidence in a great measure.

The court has the attorney of the Government upon one side, who is confronted by the attorney for the claimant upon the other, and thus the facts are more definitely brought out and justice is more surely done to the claimant. Those who oppose this order which has been made by the Speaker, oppose the execution of a law which was enacted to give relief not only to claimants, but also to Congress. All around these corridors, and all over the country, you will find people who have been waiting for twenty years and more for the consideration of their claims. In the poor-house of the District of Columbia to-day there are people who came here twenty years ago with just and legal claims against the Government that have been put off by this sort of action from Congress to Congress, until at last their little accumulations have been exhausted, and they find themselves pensioners upon this District.

Mr. Chairman, while the effect may not have been intended—and I would not charge my friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] with having taken action here to delay the consideration of just claims or the transaction of the business of the House—while that was not his intention, I state that it was announced to me on this floor this morning—this being Friday, the only day in the week that is given to the consideration of private claims—it was announced to me on this floor this morning by a prominent member of this House, that the consideration of claims was not to be entertained by the Fiftieth Congress. Now, I want to say to this House right here, that I am in favor of the passage of bills for the allowance of the just claims of the people of this country. I believe that if we had taken these claims up in the order in which they come, and had proceeded with them to-day, we could have been half through with them by this time.

But they have been delayed in this manner, and I for one protest here and now, and so long as I have a seat upon this floor I shall protest, against this dilatory action which prevents the public business from going forward and justice from being done to these people. [Applause on the Republican side.] I appeal to members of the House to stand by the people in this matter, and let it go out to the country that the Fiftieth Congress is willing to go forward in the transaction of its business and to do justice to this worthy class of people from all parts of the country who have been so long kept out of their rights. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] to state definitely and specifically his point of order.

Mr. LANHAM. It is this, sir. I objected to the consideration of this bill and raised the point of order that it was a bill introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress, and that the report upon it was from a committee of that Congress. It is not a bill of this Congress, nor a report of this Congress. It never has been introduced or considered in the Fiftieth Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in deciding the point as now presented by the gentleman from Texas. It is not within the province of the Committee of the Whole to determine the question of the consideration of a bill. The question of consideration being raised, or a motion made to pass over a bill, it becomes the imperative duty of the committee to rise and report that fact to the House.

Mr. LANHAM. Then, sir, I move that the committee now rise——

The CHAIRMAN. It does not require a motion. The committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had under consideration bills upon the Private Calendar, and had reached the bill H. R. 6336, entitled "A bill for the relief of Martha J. A. Rumbaugh," whereupon the question of consideration was raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], and the committee rose and instructed its Chairman to report the fact to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole reports that they have had under consideration bills upon the Private Calendar, and that on reaching the bill (H. R. 6336) for the relief of Martha J. A. Rumbaugh, the question of consideration was raised upon that bill; whereupon the committee rose and instructed its Chairman to report the fact to the House.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have objected in the Committee of the Whole House to the consideration of bill No. 6336, introduced at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, March 1, 1886. Accompanying this bill is a report from the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, April 6, 1886. This bill, as I am advised, has never been introduced in the Fiftieth Congress, and no report in writing has ever been made upon it by any committee of the present Congress. I maintain that we have no jurisdiction in the Fiftieth Congress to pass upon a bill of the Forty-ninth Congress and a report coming from a committee of that Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to decide the question. After hearing attentively the argument in the Committee of the Whole, the present occupant of the chair would decide that the class of bills of which the bill referred to is one were reported to the Forty-ninth Congress with accompanying reports from the Court of Claims. They were, by direction of the Speaker during the present session, ordered to be placed on the Private Calendar for consideration on Fridays. In the opinion of the Chair, it does not follow that these bills of a former Congress are here for passage by the present House without the formalities contemplated by our rules. They are on the Calendar for appropriate action. What is that appropriate action? It may be the reference of them to a committee; it may be to lay them on the table. The reference of the bills to the Calendar does not necessarily import that they are to be passed or are to be considered with a view to their final disposition. Even messages of the President are often directed to be placed on the Calendar; but no one would suppose because a President's message is placed on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole that that committee should at once consider, for instance, the question of a tariff presented by that message without such preliminary steps as the rules contemplate.

The Chair therefore holds that these bills of the Forty-ninth Congress are before the House for appropriate action, but not for final disposition, inasmuch as under the rules certain preliminary steps are indispensable. There is nothing in the Bowman law, as the Chair conceives it, which antagonizes this view.

The present occupant of the chair, holding this place only temporarily, has some diffidence in deciding this proposition, and would be glad if some gentleman who differs from this ruling would take an appeal from the decision, so that the House may determine the question.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The language used by the Chair was in the plural. I desire to know whether this decision is to be considered as applying to more than one bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair spoke of this bill as one of a class.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the ruling will be considered as applying to this bill alone.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. One moment. I understood my friend from Texas to refer to cases in which no bill had been introduced in this Congress. Now, a number of these cases do not come within that category at all. For instance, the next bill on the Calendar is accompanied not only by the report of the Court of Claims, but by the report from a committee as well; and I have introduced a bill in the same form as that introduced before——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state——

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to move that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order, but the Chair desires to state that he has made this ruling with reference to only one bill. That point will distinctly appear of record. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should sustain the Chair in this ruling, will this bill still remain in the Committee of the Whole House, or will it, under the ruling of the Chair, be referred to a committee of the House for its action before it can be taken up on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not answer a question as to the future.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. SPRINGER. In other words, I desire to ask the Chair what will be the status of this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be guided by the opinion of the House.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry in order that we may know exactly how to vote on this proposition. Has the Chair decided that this bill which has been reached in the Committee of the Whole House could not, in its present status on the Calendar, be considered by the Committee of the Whole and reported to the House? Does the Chair so decide?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not decided that.

Mr. BAYNE. Then as I understand——

Mr. BLOUNT. The motion to lay the appeal on the table is not debatable.

Mr. BAYNE. I am making a parliamentary inquiry. We want to know how to vote on this proposition. Would it have been competent, in the opinion of the Chair, for the Committee of the Whole House to consider this bill and report it to the House for action by the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would think that the Committee of the Whole could not consider the bill by amending it or recommending its passage to the House. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 115, noes 37.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21.

So (one-fifth not having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to, and the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. LANHAM. I move the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6336, and it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to amend that?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BLAND. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider bills in the order in which they were reported by the committees of this House.

A MEMBER. That is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not germane. It is not in order.

Mr. MCCREARY. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] so as to include all bills of the class affected by the decision of the Speaker so that they may be reported back to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. LANHAM. I accept it as a modification of my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to amend so as to make it applicable to bills not yet reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can not be made applicable to bills except as they are reached.

Mr. MCCREARY. I wish to avoid the necessity of taking the question on every bill.

Mr. BLAND. The ruling has been made, and I ask it be applied to all the bills of the class referred to under the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do not some of the bills belong to other committees than the Committee on War Claims?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. MILLIKEN. In the case of the gentleman from Kentucky——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas modifies his motion.

Mr. LANHAM. I have accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised they go to other committees than the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand my friend to refer now to bills, or rather to cases where bills have not been introduced into this Congress and referred. That is the case to which the honorable gentleman from Texas refers.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But I refer to bills reported by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well?

Mr. MILLIKEN. And now upon the Calendar.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The Speaker ruled on one bill. It appears that there is no such bill before the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It would apply to every bill of that class.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But the Speaker ruled these bills were properly on the Calendar. Now, it may be it is not competent for the House to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill before this Congress and consider it, looking to a report of the Court of Claims to a former committee of this House. If there is such a bill, I do not want it referred. One of these bills, the second on the list, has been reported favorably to the House a number of times. It is for salaries due employés who have waited for twenty-four years and whose children have gone supperless to bed for lack of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have risen to a point in which there is great pertinency.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt the gentleman thinks so.

Mr. LANHAM rose.

Mr. TAULBEE. I trust the gentleman will allow me to ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of a resolution which I introduced on the 16th instant, which I think will solve all the difficulties under which we now labor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to every request which does not apply to the bill under consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on referring this bill to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has not this bill been introduced into this House under the rule? How can the House refer a bill not before it in the ordinary way?

Mr. DUNN. It can refer any paper.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the paper is not here under the rule.

Mr. LANHAM. It is like any other petition or bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is to refer the papers in this case to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and they were so referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

A bill (H. R. 6203) for the relief of Peter March, Thomas J. Wright, administrator, and others.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I object to the consideration of that bill, for the reason that it appears also to be a bill of the Forty-ninth Congress, and a report submitted from a committee of that Congress. I make the point of order that this bill has never been introduced into this House, or considered or reported by a committee of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas raises the question of consideration.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want, with the permission of the Chair, to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to this fact. While it is true that this particular bill was not introduced and referred to the Court of Claims by this House, the same bill has been reported upon time after time by committees of the House, and it has been again introduced and is now pending.

Mr. LANHAM. Has it been reported by any committee?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There is no report from any committee of this House; but according to the decision of the Speaker of the House, this bill is on the Calendar for such disposition as the House may order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has indulged the gentleman from Ohio to make a statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to make a statement in behalf of the parties interested in this bill, and appeal to the gentleman's bowels of compassion, if he has any, to permit a word in their behalf.

That bill has been reported, as I have said, time after time, and once since this report from the Court of Claims. It refers to the salaries of the men captured upon the steamer Prima Donna, and who were kept in Confederate prisons for months. The money due to them has been unpaid for all of these years. For more than twenty-five years they have been deprived of what is due to them. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

What I want the House to do is to instruct the committee to pass the bill. It appeals to us by every sense of justice, and does not infringe in any way the right claimed by my friend from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the committee will rise and report the objection to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar having reached the consideration of the bill H. R. 6203 of the Forty-ninth Congress, objection was made thereto, whereupon the committee rose, and he was instructed to report the objection to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House direct the committee to consider the bill?

Mr. LANHAM. I think that this bill and report are subject to the same objection made to the preceding bill, No. 6336. It has not been reported by any committee of this House, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SCOTT. Pending that motion I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 23, 1888, information concerning the progress made in examining the claim of the State of Massachusetts for expenses paid and incurred at the request of the President and the Secretary of State during the war in protecting the harbors and strengthening the fortifications on the coast, stating, on the report of the Third Auditor, that the act of June 27, 1882, section 4, required examination at the earliest practical time of the claims of several States for the reimbursement of expenses incurred in Indian hostilities, etc., and the available force of the office has been employed in making such examination, which has suspended the investigation and settlement of the claim of the State of Massachusetts under the act of July 7, 1884, and further stating that unless an unforeseen contingency arises the claim will be taken up and adjusted during the present session of Congress, and in time for an appropriation, should a balance be found due; which was read.

Mr. DAWES. The statute under which that inquiry was made was passed in 1884. It is to be regretted exceedingly that Congress has not furnished the Secretary of the Treasury with sufficient clerical force to carry out the provisions of that act earlier. I have no disposition to criticise the Secretary. I am at this moment disposed to suggest that if he has not force enough it is the duty of Congress to furnish him with sufficient clerical force to discharge the duties which we impose upon him.

I have no doubt of the Secretary's desire to carry out that statute at the earliest possible moment. I am glad to know that he feels that he is working his force fully. He has not asked for any increase that I know of. If he had represented that he could not carry out existing law with his force on hand, I have no doubt that Congress would have furnished him with additional clerks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition shall be made of the communication and the accompanying papers?

Mr. DAWES. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 17, 1888, certain information as to the per cent. of money paid the States and Territories on the sales of public lands; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of January 27, 1887, the results of an investigation of the salmon fisheries in the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest, as the accompanying report is voluminous and accompanied by a large number of photographs, evidently intended for engraving, which would probably involve considerable expense, that the communication and the accompanying report had better be referred, perhaps, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DOLPH. I call the attention of my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] to the fact that a letter has come in from the Secretary of War, transmitting his report and the report of the local engineers upon a resolution which I think was introduced by my colleague and reported from the Committee on Commerce by myself, in regard to fish-traps and obstructions in the Columbia River. I understand the report is very voluminous and accompanied with photographs and maps, and it is suggested by the President of the Senate that the papers should be referred to the Committee on Printing before an order to print is made.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope that will be done. I think it very advisable that the report should be printed. It is a very valuable report.

The communication and the accompanying report were referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of December 13, 1887, a report from the Adjutant-General regarding the military reservation of Fort Canby, Washington Territory; which, on motion of Mr. MITCHELL, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 20, 1887, certain information as to whether persons are being ejected at the instance of the Interior Department from lands purchased of the Chippewa and Muncie Indians in Kansas, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting his annual report for the year 1887; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 245) to investigate the issue of fraudulent land warrants, and to protect soldiers and sailors of the United States from loss therefrom, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. The Committee on Public Lands instruct me to report back adversely the bill (S. 232) for the forfeiture of the land granted to the State of Florida for the construction of certain lines of railroad in that State, and to move its indefinite postponement, and in place of it to report an original bill as a substitute.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the bill adversely reported be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (S. 1708) to provide for the judicial determination of the rights of the United States in lands granted to the State of Florida for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads under an act of Congress approved May 17, 1856, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 196) to cancel certain reservations of lands, on account of live-oak, in the southwestern land district of the State of Louisiana, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 747) granting aid in the construction of a railroad from the town of Titusville, Brevard County, Florida, to the Bight of Canaveral, with a branch to Banana River, in said State, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. From the Committee on Public Lands I report adversely the bill (S. 1469) for the relief of the settlers upon the lands along the Des Moines River, above the Raccoon Forks, in the State of Iowa.

I will say about this bill that it is only the alternative expression of the committee, the committee having already dealt with another phase of the question, which has been considered by the Senate. The time may come when the committee may feel favorably disposed to the bill which they now report adversely, but they desire that it may go on the Calendar to meet the views of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], who wished to have it considered by the Senate in connection with the bill which the committee have heretofore reported on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 761) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a State constitution and State government, for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 957) to establish a public park at Pagosa Springs, in the State of Colorado, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 217) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Jacksonville, Fla., reported it with amendments.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4911) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James H. Ayres, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1707) to provide for the issue of patents to certain persons for donation claims under the act approved September 27, 1850, commonly known as the donation law, reported a bill (S. 1709) to provide for the issue of patents to certain persons for donation claims under the act approved September 27, 1850, commonly known as the donation law; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1080) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. R. 13) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I shall ask the Senate to-morrow morning to take up the joint resolution and deal with it. It has passed the Senate once without objection, I think, and it is quite desirable that it shall go to the other House as soon as possible, in order that, if that body concur, it may be submitted to the States at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1516) to provide for inquests under national authority, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1054) to incorporate the Rock Creek Railway Company of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 186) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes, relating to details of Army officers to educational institutions, etc., reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1164) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes, concerning detail of Army officers to educational institutions, etc., to report it adversely; and I move its indefinite postponement, an equivalent bill having been recommended by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1696) for the relief of Lewis J. Cundiff, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 239) confirming titles to certain lands in Columbia County, State of Florida, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2974) for the relief of John Snoddy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr., reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 20) to provide for the construction of a public building at Portland, Oregon, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 601) for the extension and repair of the public building at Newark, N. J., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1627) to amend section 25 of the act of March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

ANDREW J. LINDSAY.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 455) for the relief of Andrew J. Lindsay, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its consideration. It is a bill removing political disabilities, containing only five lines.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

PRINTING OF PENSION BILL.

Mr. MANDERSON. From the Committee on Printing, I report back the motion to print 1,000 copies of the bill (S. 181) granting pensions to ex-soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors, as amended by the report of the Committee on Pensions, and I ask that the printing of 1,000 copies be ordered by the Senate. The cost will be trifling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the motion to print 1,000 extra copies of the bill?

The motion was agreed to.

ANNUAL REPORT OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the letter of the Public Printer transmitting his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and to ask that the usual number be ordered printed—no extra copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

POWELL'S REPORT ON ALASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of Major Powell to the Secretary of the Interior in relation to Senate bill No. 1907, Forty-ninth Congress, "to facilitate the settlement and develop the resources of the Territory of Alaska, and to open an overland commercial route between the United States, Asiatic Russia, and Japan," be printed for the use of the Senate.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR LOGAN.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back with amendments the bill (S. 191) to make additional appropriation for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the late John A. Logan, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert the words "or as much thereof as may be necessary;" and in line 4, after the word "moneys," to insert the words "in the Treasury of the United States;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $450, or as much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of printing portraits for additional copies of the eulogies delivered in the Congress of the United States upon the late John A. Logan, said portraits to be printed in accordance with "An act to authorize the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late John A. Logan," approved March 3, 1887.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That 2,500 additional copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy for the year 1887 be printed and bound in paper covers, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for the use of the Senate members of that board.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed 20,000 copies of the first annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the appendices thereto, of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the commission.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE RATES.

Mr. SAWYER. From the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I report back adversely the following resolution, with the recommendation that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be indefinitely postponed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into the advisability of reducing the rate of postage to 1 cent on all mail matter now known as first-class which does not exceed 1 ounce in weight, and a proportionate reduction on all excess of 1 ounce, and report to the Senate by bill or otherwise as soon as practicable.

Mr. BECK. I suppose the committee have a good reason for that recommendation; but I should like to have the resolution placed on the Calendar so as to call it up and see what reason they have for their adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads whether the committee have made any report as to the reasons why they desire adverse action on the resolution.

Mr. SAWYER. No; but we do not think it is prudent at the present time to attempt to reduce the rate of letter postage.

Mr. BECK. There is no report accompanying the resolution.

Mr. SAWYER. No, sir; we have made no written report to accompany it. When the Post-Office Department is running behind we thought we ought to wait until such time as it was self-sustaining before we attempt to reduce the rate of postage further.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to put upon record at this time my belief that it is the duty of the Government and the interest of the people that postage on letters through the entire country should be reduced to 1 cent. I believe that very rapidly the Post-Office would become self-sustaining at that rate, and that the indirect benefit to the people by binding the country closer together and facilitating intercourse between different parts would, even if that were not true, compensate us for all the deficit which would be caused, even if the deficit which was occasioned at first should continue.

Mr. BECK. The recommendation of the committee was to indefinitely postpone the resolution, but it has been placed on the Calendar, has it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, with the adverse report of the committee, has been placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. I only wanted to say in addition to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, if I may be allowed, that if the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads think this Government can afford to carry, at 1 cent an ounce, bonnets and harness and merchandise all over the country, it might be able to carry the letters of the people at the same rate.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to put on record my dissent to the proposition that the rate of postage ought to be considered with reference to the question as to whether the Post-Office is self-supporting or not. I believe that the people of this country desire the best service and the cheapest service possible, and I do not think they insist upon it that the Post-Office Department shall be self-supporting.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say, as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, that when the subject came up in the committee we were not prepared to advise a reduction of postage on letters, because we knew that it would involve a very considerable amount of money to be appropriated by Congress to sustain the Post-Office Department. That was the judgment of the committee, and I believe it to be a correct judgment. I do not believe that, simply because we have a surplus in the Treasury, we ought to be devising ways and means to dispose of that surplus improperly. We ought to reduce the taxes of the people rather than to waste the accumulated sum in the Treasury, for all these schemes to take money out of the Treasury furnish an argument, and a strong argument, to the men who are opposed to a reduction of tariff duties why the tariff should not be reduced. I am opposed myself to any depletion of the Treasury upon any of these schemes until we have the taxes of the people reduced.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I introduced the resolution, and it was not a scheme, nor is it intended merely to deplete the Treasury. The United States are carrying to-day the newspapers of the country for a cent a pound; they are carrying all other publications at the rate of 4 ounces for a cent. They are carrying merchandise in 4-pound packages, no matter what it is—as I said, such as parts of harness. There are houses in New York to-day which are making fortunes by putting up 4-pound packages of merchandise to be carried at a cent an ounce all over the United States. And why the letters which go from one person to another can not be carried at the same rate at which merchandise is carried I am not able to say.

But I rose only to have the resolution put on the Calendar, and I think we can show a good reason why a rate of 1 cent on letters should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1778) for the relief of Philip Loney; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 1779) for the protection and administration of the forests on the public domain; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. This bill covers the same ground as a bill a few days ago introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but it is much more carefully drawn and has received the attention of eminent citizens throughout the country who are practically devoted to this subject. I send the names of some of these to the Secretary's desk that they may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Henry P. Walcott.
Robert Manning.
Joseph S. Fay and 45 others, of Boston, Mass.
Judge Charles P. Daly and 25 other officers and members of the New York Academy of Science.
Horace Jayne.
J. F. Rothrock and 8 other professors in the University of Pennsylvania.
R. W. Stevenson, superintendent of public instruction, and 35 others, of Columbus, Ohio.
Hon. Moses Hallett, United States district judge; Hon. Henry W. Hobson, United States district attorney, and Hon. Joseph C. Helm, judge supreme court, Denver, Colo.

Mr. HALE. I also present a memorial signed by these gentlemen, together with other papers, to go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Whatever is done about the protection of forests ought to be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and through the medium of the General Land Office. I think it will be impossible to do anything effective that is not done through these agencies, which have charge of all the public lands. There will be for a long time timber lands that are to be sold, as well as other timber lands that are to remain unsold, perhaps, and the care of which ought to go to the authority that has charge of the whole public domain. The general subject is always to remain within the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, not that that committee cares to burden itself with any more bills than it now has, but because the subject can only be intelligently considered in connection with other measures for the disposal of the public domain which are before that committee and of which that committee has proper jurisdiction.

I think it will be found that a good deal of the zeal of the people whom the Senator has mentioned, and whose names he has given to the public through the medium of the RECORD, will be found to grow out of a desire to have a commission entirely apart from all the Departments of the Government and having independent authority of its own. However that may be, it is essentially a public-land question, and it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think there is considerable force in what the Senator from Kansas has said in reference to any subject dealing with the public lands. Of course that committee has the general jurisdiction, and reports mainly the legislation touching the public lands.

I suggested that this bill, which I have offered, should go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, because the other bills touching the subject have gone there, and it would seem as if any measure relating to forestry (a subject that is growing in importance with the American people, and which is exciting more and more the attention of thoughtful men) should go to the committee newer than the Public Lands Committee, and entitled "The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry." I fancy that that committee would feel that in any agitation of this subject of forestry and the treatment of our American forests, it would be passing over them to refer a bill distinctively relating to it to any other committee.

I am not a member of either committee, and have no feeling whatever about the matter; but I suggest to the Senate that as other bills on this subject have gone to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, this bill go there, and that there should be, as in other cases, some action striving to reach co-operation of the two committees. There are other bills before the Senate where two committees are considering the same subjects and will undoubtedly co-operate. The bills for subsidies to commercial ships, which involve construction upon plans submitted by the Navy Department, are an apt illustration of a subject that two committees may consider, and I hope, under the circumstances, that this bill may go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which will confer with the other committee, or the other committee confer with it; but I have no feeling about it.

Mr. BLAIR. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. PALMER] is not present. I understand he is ill. As a member of that committee, the very title of which seems to make it proper to send this bill to it for its consideration, and also as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I can have no sort of preference personally as to which committee the bill shall be sent to; but unless it is to be sent by general consent of the Senate to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I would ask Senators to wait until perhaps to-morrow morning, when probably the Senator from Michigan can be present. I think he would have some feeling with reference to the disposition of this bill. If there be no objection to sending it to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of course I do not care to interpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no particular preference on that subject, but it is a very easy way of doing nothing to have bills scattered all around, when all subjects relating to the public lands should go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BLAIR. We have a Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Here is a bill that covers the whole subject of forestry, and it would seem to be one great wing of the jurisdiction of that committee, and it appears to me that in the absence of the chairman of the committee another committee should not be pressed.

Mr. HALE. I think there will be no further objection to the reference I proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1780) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 1781) to authorize the President of the United States to place upon the retired-list of the Navy Pay Inspector Luther G. Billings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1782) to authorize the leasing of the school and university lands in the Territory of Wyoming, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1783) to establish the Sundance land district, in the Territory of Wyoming; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 44) authorizing and directing the Commissioner of Labor to make an investigation as to the cost of producing leading articles of consumption in the United States and competing countries, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 298) for the erection of buildings for the exclusive use of post-offices of the first and second class; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1237) providing for the repair of the United States war steam-ship Hartford;

A bill (H. R. 1312) to provide for a term of court at Quincy, Ill.;

A bill (H. R. 1406) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. 1477) to subdivide the western judicial district of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. 1709) to regulate the practice in causes removed from State courts;

A bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of William P. Thorn;

A bill (H. R. 5728) to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes; and

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4271) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2131) for the relief of Joseph Cox, administrator of Charles Pasters, deceased; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PUBLIC LANDS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution which I introduced some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there resolutions, concurrent or other?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have a resolution to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate—

First. The original number of acres of public land in the State of Nebraska.

Second. The number of acres thereof surveyed, the number of acres thereof sold, and the amount received therefor up to June 30, 1887.

Third. The number of acres of public land in said State contained originally and June 30, 1887, in Indian reservations; the number of acres contained in said reservations sold and the amount received therefor, and whether the State has been allowed 5 per cent. of the proceeds of such sales, the number of acres of public land in said State contained originally and June 30, 1887, in military reservations; the number of acres thereof sold and the amount received therefor, and whether the said State has been allowed 5 per cent. of the proceeds of such sales.

Fourth. The number of acres of public land in said State of Nebraska located with military land-warrants up to June 30, 1887; and whether the said State has been allowed and paid 5 per cent. on the value of said lands so located, and the amount paid on that account.

THE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas there have been for many months serious complaints as to the inefficient character of the mail service, especially in the West and South, and the same continue, indicating that the trouble is of a permanent character:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to make thorough inquiry into the cause of such inefficient mail service, and report to the Senate their conclusions thereon, with suggestions as to remedy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rules.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the objection be withdrawn for a moment in order to enable me to present some matters bearing upon the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Secretary to read in this connection the article which I have marked, being an extract from a leading Kansas paper, the Daily Capital, of Topeka, and which appears also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 22d of this month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the paper, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE MAIL SERVICE OF KANSAS.

Never at any time in the history of Kansas has there been in the United States mail service such an utter disregard of the rights of the people as at this time. Notwithstanding the great increase in population, the stupid attempt on the part of the Administration to make a record for economy has cut down the clerical force necessary to properly distribute the mails at large offices and in the mail trains, and it is consequently too small to do the work. Tons of mail matter pass through Kansas on the trains westward that can not be disposed of by the force allowed by the Post-Office Department. The result is that it is carried past the towns where it belongs, and brought back after two or three days' absence in Colorado or New Mexico. It is not the fault of the railway clerks, because the Department asks of them a task that it is not possible for them to perform. The people of Kansas have been patient, and the press has been lenient over this Democratic folly. Mails going west are so heavy that men working to the extent of their strength, doing more than double duty, can not handle them.

Appeals to the Department at Washington for adequate help to take care of this important public service are unheeded. The railway mail service through Kansas has become criminally neglected, and it is time this attempt of the Democratic party to make capital by a show of false economy should be brought to the attention of Congress. In reply to continued appeals for the Department to send a man to examine the railway mail service in Kansas, a man came, and overlooking the tons of mail that could not be distributed in time to be thrown off at the towns where it belonged, he succeeded in having two or three clerks fined for not having the regulation gold-lace band on their caps, and thus civil-service reform was indorsed and the record of the party for economy maintained.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer also a letter received a day or two since from the secretary and business manager of the Kansas City Journal, one of the leading daily papers of the West, on the same subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., January 25, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Is it possible to bring to bear such pressure, by means of a Senate committee on investigation of Western mail service in Missouri and Kansas, as will rectify the present demoralized condition of said service?

Our relations to this service are such that we suffer more perhaps than any other line of business and know more of its delinquencies than those engaged in other vocations.

I can say after eighteen years' continuous labor in this one office, with full facilities for learning as to general efficiency of the mail service, that it was never so bad nor so badly administered as during the past year, and that the tendency at this time is toward a down grade. Can you give this attention and bring it before the people in such manner as to lead to a reform?

Very respectfully,

J. A. MANN,
Secretary and Business Manager Kansas City Journal.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PLUMB. To meet the possible suggestion that the information contained in the newspaper article already read and the letter from the business manager of the Journal may be colored, being from Republican sources, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an article from a paper claiming to be the leading Democratic paper of Kansas, and the official organ of the party in that State, which will show that complaints are not confined to Republican sources. The article is from the Abilene Gazette, a daily paper published at Abilene, Kans.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The time has come, in fact it came long ago, for the United States postal authorities to do something for the Western mail service. We do not know whether the rank service which we have been receiving is due to incompetency or lack of sufficient help, but one thing we do know, and that is it is about as weak as the people are going to stand by and accept without kicking vigorously. Day after day, week in and week out this office has received numerous and repeated complaints of failure to receive papers. We have traced the matter down and find that it is due to the rotten mail service. We are possessed of ordinary patience, but the time has gone by for us longer to remain silent. Yesterday morning at 3.30 the greatest outrage that has ever been perpetrated upon a daily newspaper in Kansas since the State was admitted into the Union was served the Gazette by the route agent who worked the mail going west on train No. 203, either through ignorance, drunkenness, imbecility, or maliciousness, we know not which.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, these are only samples of what is appearing in the press of Kansas and the West generally in regard to the mail service, which, as is well stated in the letter from Mr. Mann, has been on the down grade for some time. The people of the United States pay for this mail service. They have always demanded that it be good without reference to its cost, and that the first thing to be taken into account should be its efficiency.

The very estimable gentleman who has recently retired from the Post-Office Department, and under whose administration the business of that Department has come into the present deplorable condition, failed, I think, to take into account the fact that the first need was for good service, and that parsimony was out of place. He has seemed to be possessed with a frantic determination to make revenue meet expenditure, regardless of the results to the service. He has saved some money, but in doing so he has deprived the people of that efficient mail service which their interests require and which they have had until within the last two years.

As a result the mail service of the country, and especially in the West, is utterly demoralized and fails to answer to even the most ordinary demands upon it. The editor and publisher of the Wichita Eagle, a leading daily paper published at Wichita, Kans., stated to me a few days since that for months he has not sent his papers to their destination through the mails, but has used the express on the same trains which carried the mails, because when he deposited papers in the post-office to have them carried by mail they were certain to be so miscarried or otherwise delayed as to wholly defeat the purpose for which they had been printed and mailed. He therefore preferred to pay the greater charges necessary and have them carried safely and speedily by express.

That of itself would be enough to indicate the disgraceful condition of the service. Whether the reason of this is to be found wholly in the failure to employ a sufficient number of suitable persons to transact the business in post-offices and on postal cars, or whether it is partly due to the discharge of competent officials and employment in their stead of those less competent I will not say, though I have been informed on authority, which I do not vouch for, however, that within the last year or two the maximum rating of postal clerks in the examinations which are required to precede their permanent appointment has been lowered about 30 per cent. I do not say that is true. I do not know it, but I have been told so. I have no doubt most of the trouble is due to the fact that there are not sufficient clerks and route agents employed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me one explanation there?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator's information in regard to the grading of clerks must be a mistake. I knew a young gentleman, belonging to a most excellent family, who was appointed partly on my recommendation, and he failed at the end of six months and was discharged, and I know his grading was over 60 per cent., but I did not have influence enough to keep him in the service.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me to make a suggestion in that connection, I will say that in my State the same chief clerk is discharging the service that has been for years past, and there can be no sort of doubt that he would require the same degree of efficiency he had been in the habit of requiring under former administrations.

Mr. PLUMB. He may not have had as good material to work with as before. The responsibility for this condition of affairs must necessarily rest with the head of the Department. It is in his power to vitalize this service, and it is his duty to do it. Congress has appropriated every dollar he asked for, and he can not plead lack of funds. No portion of his responsibility can be placed on a route agent, or on a division superintendent, or elsewhere. The responsibility must finally come back to the Postmaster-General himself. He appoints every subordinate, makes every contract—all that is done is with his authority and by his direction.

I have no doubt the late Postmaster-General did what he believed his duty required, but he simply carried his idea of economy to an extent which ruined the service which it was his duty to keep up and constantly improve.

I do not care to ask that the resolution be adopted now. I wanted to present these facts in order that they, in connection with the resolution, may be considered to-morrow, or at such other time as it may properly come before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rules.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, 1. That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what communications have been made with the Dominion of Canada since the abrogation of article 30 of the treaty of Washington, and what agreements have been arrived at touching the transportation of goods across the boundary line in bond and otherwise.

2. What methods have been taken to protect the revenue derived from bonded goods passing the frontier both ways and American goods transported coastwise.

3. What, if anything, has been done to enforce the second clause of section 6 of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. FRYE. I offer another resolution, and I simply desire to say in regard to it that it calls for exceedingly important and valuable information, and, in view of the fact that serious commercial questions are liable to arise between Canada and the United States at any time, the necessity for the information will be apparent.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized and directed to prepare for the use of the Senate a statement showing—

1. The political organizations of the Dominion of Canada and of the several provinces of which it is composed, and the relations sustained by the same to the United States, as well as to Great Britain.

2. The several treaties, commercial and otherwise, that have been made between the United States and Great Britain in behalf of the Dominion of Canada, or any of the several provinces composing the same, and the present condition or status of said treaties.

3. The commercial relations established by the statutes of the United States between the United States and the Dominion of Canada or any of the provinces composing the same.

4. The amount and value of the commerce and trade subject to duty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada or the provinces of which it is composed.

5. The amount and value of the "transit" trade, or commerce, of the Dominion of Canada not subject to duty passing through the territory of the United States between said Dominion and countries other than the United States.

6. The amount and value of the commerce and trade between the Dominion of Canada and the provinces of which it is composed and all other countries, including the United States.

7. The area of the Dominion of Canada and of the several provinces that compose it, and the population of the same, including Newfoundland.

8. The amount of the funded and floating debts of the Dominion of Canada, and of the several provinces of which it is composed, and the objects for which they were created.

9. The revenues, from whatever source, of the Dominion of Canada and of the several provinces comprising the same, including Newfoundland, and the current charges against the same.

10. The several railroads that have been constructed in the Dominion of Canada and within the provinces of which it is composed, including Newfoundland, the mileage of the same, the cost of the same; the share-capital, funded and floating debts of the same; the guaranties or undertakings of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada, or of the several provinces composing the same, including Newfoundland, on account of such railroads, the tonnage, earnings, and operating expenses of the same.

11. The several canals constructed by the Dominion of Canada or the provinces composing the same, the size of the locks on the same, the cost of such canals, the number of vessels navigating the same, the tonnage transported on the same, whether of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada, the revenue therefrom, and the cost of maintenance, and the average number of days in each year in which they are navigable.

12. The dates for a series of years of the opening and closing of navigation of the St. Lawrence.

13. The subsidies granted by Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada to lines of steam-ships or railroads for the purpose of developing the trade and commerce of the British North American provinces.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over under the rules, and will be printed.

THE SWENSON PATENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, directed to communicate to the Senate, as soon as may be, any report or reports made to the Department of Agriculture by Professor Swenson on the subject of sugar making which have not already been transmitted to Congress.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 1312) to provide for a term of court at Quincy, Ill.;

A bill (H. R. 1477) to subdivide the western judicial district of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 1709) to regulate the practice in causes removed from State courts.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of William P. Thorn; and

The bill (H. R. 5728) to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 1406) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 1237) providing for the repair of the United States war steam-ship Hartford, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RAILROAD RECEIVERS.

Mr. CALL. I gave notice last week that at the close of the morning hour to-day I should ask the Senate to take from the Calendar a resolution submitted by me on the 12th of December, 1887, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to report what is necessary for the correction of the existing evils in regard to receivers appointed by the courts of the United States. The hour of 2 o'clock being nearly at hand, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, desiring to call up an appropriation bill, I now give notice that to-morrow morning at the close of the morning business I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution for the purpose of submitting some remarks before its reference.

AGRICULTURAL-EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up Order of Business 136, being House bill 4881, an appropriation bill for agricultural experimental stations, a deficiency for this year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 4881) making an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experimental stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. ALLISON. As the hour of 2 o'clock has almost arrived, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered until completed. I think it will take only a few moments.

Mr. BLAIR. Without displacing the unfinished business?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, without displacing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill, laying aside the unfinished business informally until its completion. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill called up by the Senator from Iowa is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There was heretofore reported a bill providing that appropriations for this purpose should be placed under the control of the State Legislature. I desire now to state that I should be very glad that this bill should be sent back to the committee and held back until some amendment can be made to the original act, which provides for the money going directly into the hands of the governing boards of the various agricultural colleges. In my opinion, at least one-half of the agricultural colleges are so situated that no practical value whatever to the agriculture of the country will be obtained by the appropriation of the money in the manner now provided. Those concerned in the interest of agriculture in the several States ought to have an opportunity to present their views. I am satisfied the money will in many instances go into the hands of those who will pay but little attention to what the interests of agriculture require, and so it will be of no practical use to the agriculturists of the country. My desire is that some action should be taken on the original law so that this appropriation may go into the hands of the State Legislatures, so that they may control the disposition of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The Committee on Appropriations reported the bill with an amendment, in line 9, after the words "thereto the," to strike out:

following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States, proceeding from the sales of public lands, and in full compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, $585,000.

And to insert:

sum of $585,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural-experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States, under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," the sum of $585,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, this is the third occasion on which I have been called upon by my sense of duty to discuss this measure, or measure svery similar to it. I could excuse myself, and I think legitimately, from entering on a further discussion of it if it were not that this matter has undergone a considerable amount of investigation in my State and in other Southern States, and the people there seem to have a desire for some further explanation of the provisions of this bill, and of the foundation upon which it rests, and the results to which it will likely lead in the event of its final enactment.

The bill also has had quite an extensive growth since it came first into the Senate; and that growth has been in the direction of further centralization of power, further usurpation of power by Congress, further encroachment upon the reserved powers of the States, and a departure in some very material particulars from the method of disposition of this money amongst the States which was originally contemplated when the bill was introduced into the Senate by its author, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

I have looked through this bill with an earnest desire to understand it. I can not say that I approve of the policy of the bill, because I think it belongs to that class of intensive legislation which, like intensive agriculture and a great many other intensive things that we do, recoil upon us; and after a while there is a collapse instead of a steady, healthy, permanent growth in the matters about which we are concerning ourselves.

I should be very glad, indeed, inasmuch as the Southern States are supposed to be very largely the gainers in the amount of money that is to be distributed through this bill, to gain my own consent to the wisdom of its policy, and also to the proposition that it has a legitimate foundation amongst the powers of Congress; but in neither respect have I been able to overcome those objections which arise in my mind, not from political training so much as from the studies that I have been able to give to constitutional questions as they relate to the distribution of powers between the United States on the one hand and the States and the people on the other.

In my efforts to ascertain the foundation upon which this bill is rested, while I have discovered that there has been a good deal of diversity and divergence and opposition of opinion and argument in its support by its most active friends, my conviction has at last settled upon the proposition that the bill really was intended to rest and does rest upon what is termed the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. So I shall treat it; in that regard I shall argue it, devoting a portion of my remarks to the question whether or not "the general welfare" in respect of this particular subject is in the keeping of the Congress of the United States, or whether it was left by the framers of our constitutional system of government in the keeping of the States and amongst their reserved powers.

Finding no express power given to Congress to deal with the subject of schools in the States in the Constitution, and finding no allusion in that instrument to education or schools, I conclude that the builders of that great and new system of organic law did not intend to include the fostering of education or the establishment of schools in the States among the Federal powers that were to be given by those States to Congress. When I say "given by these States," I mean given by the people of the States through their local government organization that was then the State as much as it is now. That body of wise men knew what they were doing, and were not thoughtless or inconsiderate about so important a subject as education.

It was then a grave problem, as it is now, whether any government ought to have the power to tax one man to educate the child of another who is able to educate his own child, any more than it should have the power to tax him to feed and clothe such child or provide for its cure when it is sick.

That problem had been decided by some of the States before the Constitution of the United States was formed, and in other States it was still in doubtful debate. The States that established this power placed it in their constitutions as part of their State governments, as I will presently prove by reading those parts of their organic laws.

These domestic, municipal, State powers, in the grasp of these States, were boldly displayed in the constitutions of the States of the very men who were engaged in delegating certain powers to a new government they were then forming, and they did not attempt to touch one of them. They left them severely alone. They did not dare to touch them or attempt to confer them upon the National Government. Some of the States had not yet reached the conclusion that education should be made a subject of compulsory duty on the part of their own State Legislatures. They would scarcely incorporate a power to control education in a national constitution that they had not been willing to intrust to or to make compulsory upon their own State Legislatures.

The States that had fixed these powers in their own constitutions would not have been willing to intrust them to Congress, whose enactments, whenever they are valid, are supreme.

I therefore conclude that the power to establish, or provide for, or to control education is found among the powers reserved to the States, and can not, therefore, be among those delegated to Congress.

If the Constitution says anything with unequivocal meaning, it is that the powers of government not therein expressly granted to the United States are reserved to the States or to the people.

In order to turn this barricade the astute minds of the friends of this measure resort to the fact that the Constitution expressly gives to Congress the power to appropriate money. They read that power in the broadest light of discretion, and insist that any disposition Congress may choose to make of public money is lawful, because the money in the Treasury is subject to their power to appropriate it.

If this is true it is a shocking assault of logic upon the moral sense of the people of the United States. We can appropriate money for our salaries, but if we should conclude that they should be raised from $5,000 a year to $1,000,000, the power to appropriate the money would scarcely be admitted as justifying a purpose in making it that would be mere robbery of the Treasury.

It is the purpose of the appropriation that must limit the power to make it in every instance, or else the most conservative and necessary check on the licentious abuse of the power to vote away the money of the people would be removed. It was for this reason alone that the general-welfare clause was imposed as a restraint on the taxing power, so as to limit that power by confining its exercise to the purposes of the general welfare of the United States, meaning by that phrase the Government of the United States and the people of the United States so far as their rights and interests are expressly put in the keeping of that Government.

This "general-welfare" clause is perverted from its true office as an express limitation upon the power of Congress in taxing the people, and is turned into a grant of power to Congress which makes it as absolute as is the British Parliament, and that perversion of the Constitution is made the foundation of the power to enact this bill into a law.

That false conception of the Constitution is thus stated:

First. That the general welfare of all the people of the United States, whether they are found in the States or in the Territories, is intrusted to the care of Congress;

Second. That power to tax the people is given to Congress for the purpose of promoting this general welfare;

Third. That education promotes the general welfare of the people and of the Government;

Fourth. That Congress can declare that education does promote the general welfare; and Fifth. That such a declaration gives Congress the power to include education among the subjects of its care, and the power to raise money and apply it to that purpose.

They stop this current of false logic, flowing from false premises, just at this point, and the bill makes a pretentious effort to cease its invasions of the Constitution at this line; but its failure to do so would be ludicrous if it were not so dangerous.

A sixth proposition that belongs to this series is that the laws of Congress are supreme wherever they operate, and the power to promote the general welfare includes the supreme power to deal with, regulate, and control absolutely the subject to which that welfare relates.

In the eager desire to use the general-welfare clause of the Constitution to advance a measure that has such hold upon them they seem to forget the boundaries of the jurisdiction of Congress fixed in the distribution of the powers of government between the States and the Federal Government, and that these limits confine the care of the general welfare intrusted to Congress, even in the wide interpretation which they adopt, to that field of legislative activity to which Congress is confined by the Constitution.

The misinterpretation of the true meaning of the general-welfare clause could not do much harm if Congress does not use it for the dangerous purpose of invading the rights reserved to the States. Where it passes that boundary, as it does in this bill, nothing could be more dangerous to the entire scheme of the Government which was ordained for us a hundred years ago.

Broad as these powers are claimed to be, under this misinterpretation of the purpose of the general-welfare clause in the Constitution, they may be admitted to exist, in the full latitude claimed for them, in all places that are under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of Congress, and over the whole country within our boundaries, in cases where the subject is one as to which Congress has the exclusive right of legislation.

Congress can legislate over the District of Columbia and the Territories on any subject that is within the control of legislation, but even in those places its power is not absolute. It can not touch the question of religion; it can not destroy the free press, or prohibit free speech; it can not destroy the obligation of a contract; it can not invade a home in the country in time of peace, without the authority of a judicial warrant; it can not cause a person to be executed for murder, until a grand jury and a petit jury have sat on the case and a verdict of guilty, in due form of law, has been pronounced.

I could name many other things that Congress can not do, even in those localities where its legislative powers are exclusive, although it might fill our legislative records with acts and resolutions declaring that it was necessary, to promote the general welfare, that these things should be done. The courts come in and cut down and cast out all such growth of usurpation when we attempt to fasten it upon the country. In the Territories and the District of Columbia Congress has the legislative powers that belong to the State and Federal Governments. In the States Congress can exercise only the powers expressly delegated to it or to the Federal Government.

I will content myself with citing only one of many cases I could present to illustrate these points.

In the last Congress we enacted a law to suppress polygamy in Utah and to disestablish the Mormon Church and repeal the charters, granted by the Territorial Legislature, on which this criminal pretense of a religion was founded. In that act we used the Federal power as including the local municipal power of legislation, but we did not encroach on the freedom of conscience in religion, though millions of people believe that the general welfare of the people of the United States required that we should. The power of Congress is supreme and exclusive in legislating for Utah, but it is not absolute, even under the general-welfare clause.

There are two Mormon churches in Philadelphia, regularly organized, with pastors and houses of worship. One of them is polygamous in faith and the other is not, just as many Mormons in Utah are anti-polygamists.

Congress has no more power over polygamy or the Mormon church in Philadelphia or over any crime that such a church might foster than it would have in London. It is the place, the locality, and the presence in Pennsylvania of another sovereign, having rightful and therefore exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of polygamy and Mormonism, that put a barrier before Congress that it can not surmount and forbid us to encroach upon that jurisdiction, though we should claim the right to declare that the general welfare is in our keeping and that it requires the suppression of Mormonism in Philadelphia as it does in Utah. We are required to show something more than our own declaration of our absolutism before we can enter a State to reform its institutions and adapt them to our notions as to the best way in which to promote the general welfare.

What is it that stops us on the border of Pennsylvania when we wish to follow Mormonism into Philadelphia and punish it there with disfranchisement, with confessions extorted from women claiming to be wives and the lawful mothers of children born in lawful wedlock, and with imprisonment, as we did in Utah?

It is the statehood of Pennsylvania and the rights reserved to her when she came into the Union that prevent us. It is not the absence of the necessities of the general welfare that thus disarms us of our alleged high powers. It is not the want of power to appropriate money that stops us. That is as easy to do as it is for any discretionary trustee to break his faith with his principal in applying his money.

It is the want of power to apply the appropriation in Pennsylvania to a subject over which that State has sovereign and exclusive control, reserved to her in the Constitution, within her own borders, that stops us. Where do we find this reserved right of Pennsylvania recorded or declared? Nowhere, unless it may possibly be in her constitution. Where do we find it denied to Congress? On every page of the Constitution it is denied to Congress, because it is nowhere enumerated among the powers granted or delegated to Congress.

Every power of statehood that is consistent with a republican form of government belongs, of right and necessity, to every American State, whether such powers are mentioned in their laws or not, unless they are expressly delegated to the United States, or are such as arise, by necessary implication, from the powers so delegated.

Every subject of legislation to which these reserved powers apply is placed beyond the reach of Congress, unless there is an express grant of power to Congress to deal with that subject, or unless, by necessary implication, the right to deal with the subject belongs to a power so expressly granted to Congress.

Without reserving to the States, as parts of their autonomy, the plenary and undefined domestic and municipal powers and jurisdictions that belong to sovereignty (after the powers that were found necessary for their political union with other States had been delegated to the United States), the States would have perished of imbecility. As it is, they will never perish. No State of this Union will ever die. They will survive every other form of government on this continent, it makes no difference what the exigencies of our condition in the future may be. Without these reserved powers, over these reserved subjects of legislative control, the States would not now have the care of all the vital interests of their people, including their rights of life, liberty, and property.

In the highest sense, and also in the most exact and correct sense; in the most general way, and also in the most particular way, the States have charge of the general welfare of their people, with the most ample power to promote it in respect of every matter that is local and domestic. The States regulate the ownership and conveyance of real and personal estate, wills, successions, trusts, and distributions of intestates' property; the relations of parent and child, husband and wife, and guardian and ward. They define and punish crime. They regulate the highways and all vehicles of State commerce. They build hospitals and asylums, and take control of all schools and institutes that are supported under their authority. The morals of the people and the protection of individuals and communities against vice are under the charge of the States.

The Supreme Court has but recently declared that a State may prohibit the production and sale of intoxicating drinks within its borders, although Congress has granted a license to produce or sell such liquors within such State. All these matters relate to the domestic general welfare of the people, and are confided to the care of the States. The maintenance and control of the public schools is as much a part of that general welfare as is the control of the production or sale of whisky. Can Congress control the general welfare of the people of a State by compelling the introduction of whisky when the State prohibits its introduction? And yet the collection of taxes on whisky is for the general welfare of the United States, as Congress declares when it passes the laws relating to internal revenue. There is a general welfare also of the United States which Congress must regard—a welfare of that Government which Congress must respect; a limitation on the taxing power that is a sacred check upon a power that it is easy to abuse, and when abused is sheer tyranny. This general welfare has not wrapped up in it a single reserved power of the States, and when it touches the subjects of these reserved powers, there can be nothing but usurpation in the movement.

Not only is the power to establish, control, and regulate common schools among the reserved powers of the States, but they were ancient rights and liberties in every colony and in every State when Congress was created by them and invested with its limited powers.

These powers over schools were so highly valued by the States that they declared them and provided for their enforcement in their State constitutions, thereby making them, expressly, a part of their organism—the autonomy—of their State governments.

The powers usurped in this bill, as well as the subject to which they relate, and the control the bill attempts to exert over this subject, belong to the domestic affairs of the States and always have belonged to their reserved powers, with which Congress is positively forbidden to interfere.

The power claimed in this bill, drawn in part from the general-welfare clause, in part from the consent of the States purchased for a price, in part from a refinement on the power to appropriate money, making it analogous to the power to misappropriate it, or to throw it away, or to destroy it, is too uncertain and frail to stand for a moment, opposed to the injunction of the Constitution that Congress shall exercise no power that encroaches upon the rights and powers reserved to the States.

To show what sort of reservation the States made of the power to educate their children, I will read from some of their ancient constitutions.

The constitution of Connecticut provides, in section 2 of article 8:

SEC. 2. The fund called the school fund shall remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which shall be inviolably appropriated to the support and encouragement of the public or common schools throughout the State, and for the equal benefit of all the people thereof. The value and amount of said fund shall, as soon as practicable, be ascertained in such manner as the General Assembly may prescribe, published, and recorded in the comptroller's office; and no law shall ever be made authorizing said fund to be diverted to any other use than the encouragement and support of public or common schools among the several school societies, as justice and equity shall require.

That provision of the constitution followed out one of the ancient regulations made by Connecticut for the disposal of that fund which arose from the sale of what were termed the fire lands in the Western Reserve of Ohio, I believe it was. A large fund was accumulated, which the State of Connecticut took under her charge during the time of the Confederation, and when she came into the American Union that fund had accumulated in her treasury, and she, by a regulation of her Legislature, provided for the management and application of that fund to the subject of common schools, thereby exercising in the most plenary way the right and power and duty reserved to herself to manage this fund according to her own will.

Who will say that when Connecticut consented to come into the American Union she thereby agreed to place her common schools in any sense whatever under the control of the National Union?

Georgia had a similar provision that dates back to 1777, as follows:

ART. LIV. Schools shall be erected in each county, and supported at the general expense of the State, as the Legislature shall hereafter point out.

North Carolina had a similar provision:

XLI. That a school or schools shall be established by the Legislature, for the convenient instruction of youth, with such salaries to the masters, paid by the public, as may enable them to instruct at low prices; and all useful learning shall be duly encouraged and promoted in one or more universities.

That was the constitution of 1776, following that wonderful declaration of independence made at Mecklenburgh, which was the precursor, the vanguard of the independence of the United States.

Maine had a similar provision in the eighth article:

A general diffusion of the advantages of education being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, to promote this important object the Legislature are authorized, and it shall be their duty, to require the several towns to make suitable provision, at their own expense, for the support and maintenance of public schools, and it shall further be their duty to encourage and suitably endow, from time to time, as the circumstances of the people may authorize, all academies, colleges, and seminaries of learning within the State.

Massachusetts had a similar provision:

SEC. 2.—THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE, ETC.

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them, especially the university at Cambridge, public schools, and grammar schools in the towns; to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immunities for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, and a natural history of the country; to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity and general benevolence, public and private charity, industry and frugality, honesty and punctuality in their dealings, sincerity and good humor, and all social affections and generous sentiments, among the people.

New Hampshire had a strong provision of the same kind:

ENCOURAGEMENT OF LITERATURE, ETC.

SEC. 83. Knowledge of learning generally diffused through a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government; spreading the opportunities and advantages of education through the various parts of the country being highly conducive to promote this end, it shall be the duty of the Legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this government, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries and public schools.

I will read from the ancient act of organization of the State of Pennsylvania what that great State did upon this subject, and show how far back this power had its origin. This was in 1683. The frame of the government of Pennsylvania which was begun at that time, in the tenth article provides:

X. That the governor and provincial council shall erect and order all public schools, and encourage and reward the authors of useful sciences and laudable inventions in the said province and territories thereof.

As I observed awhile ago, there were some of the States that had not got to this advanced ground. There were some of the States in which it was still held in serious debate at the time the Constitution of the United States was being formed as to whether it was a legitimate duty of a State government, or any government, to incorporate into its constitution compulsory requirements upon the legislature that they should embark in the project of education, free of expense, to the children of the country. They believed in the private school, the academy, the college, the old-field school, if you please; and whether they were right or whether they were wrong, their convictions upon that subject at that time were just as honest as ours are now.

Here, then, were the thirteen States met in convention and ordaining a general National Government, some of which had adopted the common-school system in their States and others had not reached that point of public opinion and had not public schools. How were these States to be reconciled together in the conferring of power upon the National Government that should have the discretion to break down their constitutions or put measures of legislation into the body of their statutes for the encouragement of common schools? No, sir, that idea was no more entertained in that constitutional convention than the idea of the dissolution of the Union is entertained in this Senate at this very moment; and we do serious injustice to history when we undertake to assume that those delegates from the different States organized the Government of the United States with the slightest reference to common-school education in the States. They organized it with as much reference to State penitentiaries, and State public roads, and State lunatic asylums, and State poor-houses, as they did in reference to State public schools. These matters were left where they rightfully belonged then, in the hands of their natural guardians, the local governments of the various States, wherein they have been successful beyond human expectation, and from whose attention the most beneficent fruits have been yielded.

I am opposed to breaking up that arrangement. I am opposed to usurping that power. I am opposed to interfering with each State in the exercise of its rightful reserved powers. I know mischief will come from it, not merely in the importation into our systems of legislation of features of violent usurpation, but I know that the retroactive effect upon the schools themselves will be to cause them to rely upon the strong arm of the Government of the United States, and to dissociate them entirely from a reliance on that home and domestic government to which they rightfully belong; which inspires them with all their strength and will be the cause of all their usefulness.

In Alabama education is made a part of the State government, an element of its autonomy, and I do not feel disposed to enter upon any legislative experiment here which requires the people of my State to alter their State constitution before they can avail themselves of its advantages. I think the people of Alabama, in convention, understood better their constitutional needs, to say the least, than I do. I think, moreover, that in the affections of their noble representatives in their Legislative Assembly they have quite as warm a feeling for the rising generation, quite as generous an impulse for their former slaves, quite as wise a discretion as I might be able to exercise through the powers, if I had them, as a United States Senator, to regulate common schools in Alabama. I defer to the Legislature of Alabama as being the tribunal best fitted to accomplish the great result of the education of the people. I did not come here with an idea that my commission included any such opportunity or power as this, and I am loth to attempt to exercise it. I read from the constitution of Alabama:

SECTION 1. The General Assembly shall establish, organize, and maintain a system of public schools throughout the State, for the equal benefit of the children thereof between the ages of seven and twenty-one years; but separate schools shall be provided for the children of citizens of African descent.

SEC. 2. The principal of all funds arising from the sale or other disposition of lands or other property which has been or may hereafter be granted or intrusted to this State, or given by the United States for educational purposes, shall be preserved inviolate and undiminished, and the income arising therefrom shall be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations.

Our State constitutional convention, doubtless with a view of establishing confidence amongst the people of the United States that were looking at them with interested curiosity to see what they would do with negro education, put it into the body of their organic law that all the funds which might come to them from the United States should be held as a sacred fund, the increase, interest, or accumulations of which alone should be applied to the purpose of common-school education.

Now, I take your gift here—for that is what it is called—before the Legislature of Alabama and ask them to accept it, and instead of reserving it to the State as an endowment fund I ask them to go on and distribute a gift from year to year during eight years amongst the children of that State. The question arises at once, what authority have they to do it? Congress can not confer upon them powers as legislators within the State. This law does not help their powers in the slightest degree. What are they to do with it? Our constitution, that they are sworn to support, commands them that it shall be made a permanent fund, and only the interest and accumulations of it shall be expended for the benefit of education.

I solemnly believe, sir, that this gift, should it ever unfortunately reach the hands of the Legislature of Alabama to be disposed of, would be considered money or property given by the United States for educational purposes, and that our legislators would find themselves constrained to preserve that fund inviolate and undiminished, and that the income arising therefrom should be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations. I believe they can go no further than this until the State constitution is amended.

On examination I find a similar provision in the constitution of Mississippi, and of Florida, and of South Carolina, and Georgia, and perhaps other States.

It is a gift, or it is not. The honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] who has been a warm supporter of this bill, and I might say, without the least flattery to him, its ablest supporter on the floor of the Senate, in a debate held with me during the last Congress upon this subject announced that the bill made a pure gift from Congress to the State, but upon condition-subsequent. Therefore it is a gift, a gift of money, and the constitution of the State of Alabama, whenever that gift comes within the reach of her legislative power, provides and requires that it shall be held as a capital fund of which alone the interest shall be used. That provision of the State constitution evidently had no reference to a gift like this, to be followed up and administered under the direction of acts of Congress.

I find another difficulty of a legislative character in the administration of this measure. The fiscal years in the States differ from those of the Federal Government; our fiscal year in Alabama, in respect to the school fund, I believe, commences on the 1st day of October and runs to the last day of next September. Unless we should change that we can not keep pace with the requirements of the act which requires that the expenditure of the money, and all concerning it, shall have that periodicity which belongs to the fiscal years of the Government of the United States.

Nor is this difficulty removed by the fact that each State must enact this bill as a law of the State. And, by the way, I will remark, in support of a statement I made at the outset, that in the growth of this bill I have found that, until it was put in the bill that was introduced at the last Congress, there was no provision in any of these bills, or in any of the reports made by any of the committees that have acted upon them, requiring that the States should adopt this legislation by a bill or otherwise. This provision never appeared until it came up in the last Congress. In the bill (S. 151) introduced December 5, 1883, and the bill (S. 194) introduced December 8, 1885, this provision was not found. These earlier bills were reported back and discussed and passed by the Senate, and did not contain the provision that I refer to. None of these bills until December 8, 1885, contained the provision which I will now read:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act, and such acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

I spoke of the growth of usurpation here; I spoke of the march of invasion against the rights of the States. Here we find that the authors and the promoters of this bill had it in their hands from 1881 until 1886, and reported it back to the Senate three times, omitting the provision to which I have referred. How did it find its way in, then, and who moved it? It came in because those men who believe that the general-welfare clause in the Constitution gives to the United States Government the right of supreme control of education in the States found it necessary to their purpose to support their position by putting that provision in the bill. What have we got to do "by bill or resolution?"

Your State Legislatures have got to accept what? The gift of money under the provisions of the bill. These provisions must receive State indorsement and State acceptance. You must re-enact this bill in your State Legislatures, and after you have thus re-enacted it you have a new law for your State, and that new law is this bill, and whatever antecedent law there may be in the State that stands against the principles of this bill or against its provisions is repealed by the enactment of this bill into a law. I thought there was humiliation enough in the fact that the State must have a system of free schools in order to receive this money, and that was all that was required until the bill of 1886 was brought in. Then it was required that the State Legislature should, by bill or resolution, re-enact this bill and make it a law of the State. I contend that Congress, in doing that, has invaded the rights of the States beyond question and in the most serious manner. It has presented a fatal alternative to the States.

More than that, there is coercion in the diversion of their money, collected by taxation out of their people, to another State in the event that any of the States refuse to receive what belongs to them under this bill. Why should it have been deemed necessary to compel the States to accept the provisions of this bill by acts of their Legislatures? It was that there might be absolute security that whatever law might be found in the legislation of the State that was in the slightest degree antagonized to the provisions of this bill should perish and be repealed by this superior act. This law foists the will of Congress upon thirty-eight States, without invitation, consideration, or debate on the part of any of them, and thrusts into their statute laws provisions that are repugnant to many of their enactments. It puts up $79,000,000 as a reward to the States that submit to this intrusion, and punishes the non-conforming States by depriving them of all benefit under its provisions.

We appropriate money to a State on condition that it will accept the law giving the money, by a legislative act, and upon condition that it will apply the money in accordance with the act, failing in either the money is taken from that State and is given to other States.

If such appropriation is made in pursuance of a power of Government, and if the purpose is governmental, can we make the execution of the law to depend upon some act to be performed by the State, or upon the decision of an executive officer, the Secretary of the Interior?

If we can do this in the instance which this bill provides, where our power is at least doubtful, why may we not do so when the power of Congress to deal with the subject is clear? Could we deny the mails to States that would refuse to build post-offices, or national banks to States that refused to pay their revenue taxes, or to pass laws exempting their officers from militia duty or from working the roads?

Could we refuse Federal courts to States that would not furnish them houses to sit in, or that would refuse to pay the costs of judicial proceedings instituted to preserve the peace, or to improve the morals of the people or the security of property?

Our power in legislation can never be complete when the consent of a State is necessary to the operation of a law within its borders, unless the Constitution has so provided.

Our power is supreme, and it is either capable of perfect execution or else the power does not exist. When we give to the Secretary of the Interior the power to suspend the law, to declare that its purpose is not accomplished in a particular State, that the law shall not operate there, but is suspended until Congress shall otherwise direct, our thoughts naturally revert to the Star Chamber. We give to him a power to suspend the laws that the President can not exercise in virtue of his office.

The Secretary by this bill is required to do certain acts by which and under which, on an ex parte examination, the money is either to be paid to a State or diverted from a State, and the school system, though it may be in the full tide of successful operation and expanding so that it would consume more than $2,000,000 annually in the State of Alabama, can be stopped at the mere pleasure of the Secretary of the Interior, he determining that the State has not done its whole duty in compliance with the provisions of this act. That suspension continues, beyond the power of the President to remove it, for the Secretary of the Interior reports, not to the President, on these matters, but to the Congress. That suspension continues, and the State is deprived of her rights until Congress shall otherwise order.

Now, sir, I happen to be one of those Americans who believe that a great and sacred part of our Constitution consists in the fact that no power is given to any officer of the United States Government, even to the President, to suspend the laws. Our fathers when they met in convention remembered the Star Chamber; they remembered that the King of England and his council took upon themselves the authority to suspend the laws of the realm; and so remembering they did not delegate to the President or to Congress the power to suspend the laws otherwise than by a repeal or suspension of them in due form, according to the Constitution, by a legislative act. Here we give to the Secretary of the Interior in this bill the power to suspend the operation of this statute in one or more States, or in all, as he pleases. He can thwart the will of Congress; he can prevent this money from finding the children who are starving in a moral sense, as it is said, for the want of education. The power of suspending the law is given to him in this bill, and I have never yet seen the exigency where I would vote for such power as that to be lodged in the hands of any man.

Why, Mr. President, I do not see why you have not the right to say to me on this floor, "Your State shall not enjoy any part of this money unless you vote for this bill," just as much as you have a right to say to the State of Alabama, "You shall not receive and enjoy your part of this money unless you accept this bill by an act of the State Legislature and make it the law of the State."

When we give to the Secretary of the Interior the power to suspend the law, to declare that its purpose is not accomplished in a particular State, that the law shall not operate there, but is suspended until Congress shall otherwise direct, we give him a power that militates against State independence. There is nothing remaining to be done to get up a war of extermination, as you may call it, between the Federal and State governments.

A State refuses to receive the gift; what is that? It is not nullification, perhaps, for a State to stop the enforcement of the law within her borders, because the law itself provides for the annulling of the act in certain contingencies.

It is an admission by Congress that it has not power to enforce the supreme law against the consent of a State.

Suppose a majority of the States refuse to receive this gift, you then load in this enormous appropriation upon a minority of the States; and what does the refusal amount to? Not only a suspension but a repeal of the law as to the particular State, for if a State does not give its legislative consent to this bill, it is not entitled to receive any of the money, and that is made a condition-precedent to its receiving any money under the law. If, therefore, a majority of the States of this Union refuse to accept this gift and refuse to make the law that it is provided here that they shall enact, what becomes of your measure? Either the law is abrogated or a minority of the States get the whole of the $77,000,000. Suppose they all refuse except Rhode Island, what becomes of it then? Rhode Island would have more money voted to her here, if it were paid in the dollars of our fathers, than would cover the soil inch by inch.

If the gift is refused by States, the bill confers the money on those States that consent to take it. Is that legislation in conformity with the spirit and principles of equity that belong to the exercise of the delegated powers given by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States? It is a shameful perversion of that spirit; it is legislation which makes it not only possible, but entirely probable that this law, instead of educating the children of the country, will be found a fruitful source of discontent and strife amongst the States.

The Secretary of the Interior, for reasons inscrutable, we may say—certainly not subject to examination by any human being—refuses to Alabama her share of the money in a given year and gives it to Georgia. How could there be anything else than bitterness and heartburning between Georgia and Alabama? The Secretary of the Interior, who wants to make a State Democratic that is now Republican, refuses to give to another Republican State, that he does not think he can convert, its share of the money for reasons that he need not state until Congress assembles. Your law says he can do it between now and November, and Congress does not meet until December, and by that refusal he can pile the money into the doubtful State through the agency of the schoolmaster, and convert that State politically. Such an unlimited, unrestricted, unguarded, unjust power was never before vested in any man to control such sums of money as are placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior by this measure.

Sir, it was a desperate strait which drove these gentlemen to this attitude in order to get some method of executing this measure which would compel the States to accept it. This option of the States to withdraw consent to this act of Congress is more nearly like secession than anything I have seen since that unfortunate event passed away. When the States by their mere silence, and without even a declaration on their part, can thus defy the law of the United States, eleven of them, or twenty-two of them, or thirty-seven of them, and thereby compel the law to be abandoned throughout their territories, it looks strangely like secession by masterly inactivity. Under this bill the States, any of them, can snap their fingers in the face of Congress and say to us, "You claim that you have got legislative power over this subject; you claim that your legislative power, wherever you exert it, is supreme. What becomes of your supremacy when we, by refusing merely to enact a law, can defeat your law absolutely, not its purpose merely, but destroy the whole legislation?"

I am not willing, Mr. President, to offer the inducement of a large sum of money out of the Treasury to influence and compel Alabama to accept this bill and to enact it into a law. It has been said that Alabama has virtually accepted this measure in advance. I deny it. Alabama has passed no law or resolution which looks to the acceptance of this measure. I do not believe that Alabama will ever accept it. I will state some of the reasons for this belief.

The bill consolidates the school funds of the State with the contribution by the United States as to its administration. It does not expressly do so in the body of the act, but that is a necessary result. Are we to have two administrative systems in Alabama, two sets of teachers, two sets of schools, a separation of accounts, or is this money to go into that State to be used in common with her State funds? Which is it?

Your bill does not provide for a separate administration. The State by accepting this bill does not commit itself to a separate administration. Therefore your school fund is consolidated with the Alabama school fund, and both must be executed in accordance with the will of Congress. Whatever differences may have existed or may exist in the opinion of Alabamians and their Legislature in respect of the proper administration of money taxed out of their own people for the education of their own children, when they accept this bill they give up these differences and they agree that the entire fund shall be administered as a consolidated fund under the laws of Congress. Thus in the sweep of its aggression it wipes out the State laws without leaving a mark upon the record to show where a State statute regulating the education of the children of the State had survived this invasion.

In Alabama there is no discrimination between the races in the school system, but there is a difference in the rates of salaries paid to teachers—a very small difference, and one that is entirely just. I will illustrate this. In Dallas County, for instance, which happens to be the county of my residence, $1,843.30 was paid to the teachers of white schools and $11,043.76 to teachers of colored schools in 1885–'86. The number of schools was 19 white and 81 black. The school attendance was: Whites, 460; negroes, 2,746. The average length of school days was: Whites, 64; negroes, 73. The instruction is:

|---|---|
| Orthography: | |
| White | 536 |
| Negro | 3,321 |
| Reading: | |
| Writing: | |
| Arithmetic: | |
| Geography: | |
| Grammar: | |
| Negro | 695 |
| Algebra: | |

It will be seen that the comparison runs through until you get to grammar, when the whites have 254 and the negroes 695, and in algebra the whites have 69 and the negroes none. Why does that occur? I suppose because the ambition of the negroes in Alabama has not led them into the study of algebra very largely. It is therefore entirely natural that the teachers of the white children, who have a different kind of ambition, should be paid a little higher salaries, because they are able to teach algebra.

The enrollment in Dallas County for the same year is whites 532, negroes 4,891, total 5,423. Attendance, whites 460, negroes 2,746, making the total 3,206, leaving only 1,685 children of both races between seven and twenty-one—the school age in this bill is ten and twenty-one—who did not attend school. This deficit is accounted for by the girls who marry at sixteen years and upwards, the children under ten years of age, the sick, and those who are compelled to work in the service of their parents, who generally leave school between twelve and fourteen years of age.

Evidently Alabama could only use double the sum now employed in common schools in Dallas County, either to double the length of the school term, making it one hundred and forty-six days, or to double the salaries of the teachers, making them $25,774.12, instead of half that sum. Seventy-three days out of a crop is a large item in a cotton country. One hundred and forty-six days would ruin a crop. With twenty school days to the month, seventy-three days are three months and two-thirds, and one hundred and forty-six days are more than seven months.

I state these figures to show the equality of races under our laws in the use of the school fund as it is distributed in Alabama, and that increased taxation is not necessary in the maintenance of public schools in that country, or the preservation of the health or the morals of the country, or the saving of "the life of the nation."

I believe further that Alabama will object to the increased State taxation this bill will force her to impose upon her people; and here I beg leave to state it as my firm conviction, drawn from speeches made in this debate as well as from the text of the bill itself, that one of its main objects is to compel the States to tax themselves more than they are doing now for the purpose of educating the negro race.

Gentlemen who think they know the negroes better than we do would do well to inform themselves in regard to this matter. Those who, having been strangers to them through their lives, fancy that some sudden spurt of emotion or springing up of affection more nearly allies and endears them to the negroes, or the negroes to them, than we who have grown up with them, who have been nursed by them and who have had them in our families, are making a very serious mistake. Those who suppose that the white people of the South have not that benevolence and charity which is requisite to bring up any population among them into civilization and enlightenment simply do not understand our people.

Those who undertake to coerce us into higher taxation than we are now enduring, surely have not understood, they surely have never read the bitter histories of the past twenty years. They have not contemplated those people prostrated by devastating war, struggling to their feet and building up their institutions with such sacrifices of comfort, such diligence and attention and self-denial as no people in this world were ever called upon to practice before, and as none have ever had the courage to practice as we have done.

If they could but read the record of the dawning light which comes upon our Southern States from the dismal recesses of the past, and if they could see how, with expanding and Christian benevolence, we took in hand these people who have been turned free by the changes in political events, they would begin to realize that the men and women who have been engaged in the restoration of the South to its present condition are, of all the people who have existed in the annals of time, to be most commended for their courage and for their generosity. They had better let us alone, if they are the real friends of negro civilization. If they feel that we are not treating the negroes properly, we will bid the negroes an affectionate, hearty good-by, and tell them to go to New Hampshire or any other Northern State and find homes among people who are willing to tax themselves and undergo what we have had to undergo in order to build up their civilization to its present standard. I commend them, if they are benevolent, to be benevolent at their own expense and not with money taxed out of my people to gratify their whims and caprices. Nor is it an inflated, unnatural, and empty benevolence that the negro needs, expressed in words of pretentious sympathy, or in advice to attempt to rule where he is scarcely qualified to obey with intelligence. He needs friends who understand him.

Let us see how this plan will work in Alabama during the eight years that the bill is to operate. Alabama now expends $527,319.88 for school purposes. The first year under the bill the State tax will be $527,319.88, the figures I have just stated; the United States funds received will be $486,240.84, making the aggregate $913,560.72.

The second year the State tax will increase to $694,598.81, the United States funds will be the corresponding amount, making a total for school expenses, $1,399,197.60—quite double all the other expenses of State government in Alabama, including the payment of interest on her public debt.

The third year, the culminating year, the State tax will be $1,041,876.55; the United States will give the same amount, and the total expended for educational purposes in that State in the third year of the reign of this bill will be $2,083,753.10; and that in a State which finds itself comfortably off and well officered and well cared for by an expenditure of less than $600,000 a year in the payment of all its State expenses, including the interest on the public debt. What a spectacle of benevolence for the reformers to shout over, the State of Alabama conducting all of her great enterprises and managing her government with an expenditure of less than $600,000 a year and expending within her borders $2,083,753.10 for education!

Mr. HARRIS. In that connection I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if the people of Alabama will not be compelled, in order to obtain the third installment, to more than double their own taxation?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; it runs up from $527,319.88 to $1,041,876.55 in the third year.

Mr. HARRIS. And failing to increase their own taxation, would they not forfeit under the bill all of the surplus over and above the amount they did so collect?

Mr. MORGAN. That is the express provision of the bill; nobody can doubt it.

Now, we have here established a national grand standard of education in the State of Alabama which requires the expenditure in that State from some source or other of $2,083,753.10 annually, or else that we shall relapse into the disgraceful condition of a people who, having been assisted up to this high plane, find themselves unwilling to supply the taxes to keep the schools up to the standard, and commence sinking and retrograding. Of course, having once accepted this law, the States would be bound in honor, and by their own enactments, to tax themselves to keep up to that plan; and how would it run then?

The fourth year the State tax in Alabama would be $1,180,752.97, the United States fund being $903,000.13.

The fifth year the State tax would be $1,319,672.73, the United States fund being $764,080.37.

The sixth year the State tax would run up to $1,458,592.50, the United States contribution being $625,160.60.

The seventh year the State tax would be $1,597,512.26, and the United States fund would decrease to $486,240.84.

The eighth year the State tax would be $1,736,475.37; the United States fund would have shrunk then to $347,277.73.

The ninth year the State taxation of Alabama would be $2,083,753.10, and the United States fund would simply be wanting—no help—and then what would become of your system? So on to the end of the chapter, unless by that time the bill shall have produced the millennium, as it evidently is intended to do.

Upon the United States standard of school support thus applied to Alabama she will pay by State taxation to schools $9,556,801.07, and the United States will pay $5,348,475.87 in these eight years; and other States will be quite as much under the strain of heavy taxation as Alabama.

Georgia will have to increase her State taxation as follows: The second year she will have to increase it $183,605, the third year $602,337, the fourth year $438,844, and so on down, making an increase of $1,591,994.

Louisiana, the third year, will have to increase her State taxation $318,486.

North Carolina, in the third year, will have to increase her State taxation $584,754.

South Carolina, in the third year, will have to increase her taxation $464,332.

The increase of taxation in the five States I have mentioned, to enable them to secure the allotment for each year, will be as follows:

| Year. | Alabama. | Georgia. | Louisiana. | North Carolina. | South Carolina. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|

These are matters about which I did not propose to concern myself much in the argument of this case, leaving it to Senators to ascertain and explain for themselves what the effect is to be upon their particular States. For one, sir, I will not consent that the State of Alabama shall be put under any coercion, moral or otherwise, or even a temptation, in eight years from the date of the passage of this bill to raise her State taxation for school purposes to the sum of over $2,000,000, adding that to her present necessities for the support of her government, and raising her annual State taxation to $2,600,000. Rich as we are, prosperous as we are and hope to be, that is one thing our people can not afford to do.

If we do not tax our people in Alabama so as to make this fund available, other States will get our part of the money which can better bear the burden of taxation than we can, because they have no State debts to pay, or having them, they do not pay them. Our State expenditures for every purpose, including the interest on our bonded debt, are but a small fraction above the sums we now raise by taxation and pay over to our schools. If you will take off the burden that will put $140,000,000 surplus revenue into the Treasury of the United States at the end of this fiscal year, we will take care of our common schools. We are doing that now in a way to put to the blush many of the older and richer States. If there was a common school open in Alabama in 1874, when the carpet-baggers were shaken off, I do not remember the fact, and I do not believe there was one, and yet our State taxes were very heavy. We have had to build a system up from that time. Our bonded debt under that régime was increased from about $5,000,000 to over $31,000,000 in six years. We have had that to struggle with, and yet from 1874 to 1880 we had educated 24.9 per cent. of the negroes from ten to twenty years of age. Now we educate over 56 per cent. of the negroes between the ages of seven and twenty-one. If you will take the ages of ten to twenty, this percentage would increase to 70 or 80 per cent. That is what we are doing for the negroes after all these calamities have been visited upon us.

Now, let us see what is the weight of this burden of the surplus taxation upon the people of Alabama, which I ask you to take off and thereby enable us to go on with our work of State education. I assume that the people of Alabama pay as much of this surplus taxation as any other people. They are an extravagant people. They consume as much of sugar and cloth as most people, and we are charged with using a large amount of whisky and tobacco. I dislike to admit such a charge, but our pockets get so light that I am compelled to admit there is something wrong; but we consume as much as any other people in the United States according to our numbers.

Of the $140,000,000 surplus that will be in the Treasury at the end of this fiscal year, the 1,500,000 people in Alabama pay each $2.15½ per annum.

The total sum paid by them to this surplus tax each year is $3,230,769. In eight years this will be $25,846,152.

If this surplus is estimated even at $100,000,000 a year, Alabama will pay, in the eight years, $18,461,536—about one-fourth of the whole sum included in this bill.

The increase of Federal taxation which this bill alone will create, aside from all other considerations, in order to get the $79,000,000, will cost the people of Alabama $1,846,144; so that the average she would actually receive under this bill would not exceed $263,777 per annum for the eight years, instead of the sum of over a half million of dollars, as stated by the supporters of this measure.

This sum, left in the hands of the people of Alabama, would enable them to increase their school taxation to $816,096.88—nearly double all the other expenses of the State; and that would be a large, permanent, and reliable school fund. You say we will not do it, and therefore you will compel us to do it. That is the logic of this bill. You say that if you remit the taxes that bring this surplus into the Treasury of the United States we will not tax ourselves to promote the public schools, and because we will not do it you will continue to tax us to maintain the schools. That is what this bill means.

I have already stated that I object to this bill because of the power it gives to the Secretary of the Interior over the States, and the power it gives him to suspend the law or to put it into operation at his will.

I will state a summary of these powers as they are found in several sections of this bill, in order that it may go into the RECORD for the information of my constituents:

In section 5, lines 7 and 8, the Secretary of the Interior is charged with the administration of this law, and he is made independent of the President, and is required to report directly to Congress.

By section 4 the governors of States and Territories are required to report to him. To do this the State Legislatures must authorize them to do so. So the States must re-enact this law, or enact others to confer these powers.

By section 4 the Secretary of the Interior is to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury what States he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act.

By section 5 he makes monthly estimates and requisitions in favor of the States for the amount so apportioned to them.

By section 6 copies of all school-books used in the States and Territories must be filed with him.

By section 12 the governors of the States and Territories shall file with him detailed accounts of the disbursements of moneys received under this act, and of all balances in the hands of State officers, and detailed reports of the operation of the "public, common, and industrial schools." This includes all public schools, and no subsequent allotment can be made until these reports are made.

If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and the conditions thereof have been observed, then, and not otherwise, the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided.

By section 13 he reports to the President what he has done, but the state of facts on which he refuses the appropriation to a State, and all the complaints, he reports annually to Congress. What can the President do in the matter?

This sweep of powers is greater and more serious and important in their effects than any that were ever given to a civil officer. They touch, with the hand of unfettered discretion, the sovereign States and the people in their most sensitive domestic relations.

The conditions to be performed by the governor before a State can receive any money under this act are as follows:

SEC. 4. That no State or Territory shall receive any money under this act until the governor thereof shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement certified by him, showing:

1. The common-school system in force in such State or Territory.
2. The amount of money expended therein during the last preceding school year in the support of common schools, not including expenditure for the rent, repair, or erection of school-houses.
3. Whether any discrimination is made in the raising or distributing of the common-school revenues or in the common-school facilities afforded between the white and colored children therein, and, so far as practicable, the sources from which such revenues were derived.
4. The manner in which the same were apportioned to the use of the common schools.
5. The number of white and colored children in each county or parish and city between the ages of ten and twenty-one, both inclusive, as given by the census of 1880, and the number of children, white and colored, of such school age attending school.
6. The number of schools in operation in each county or parish and city, white and colored.
7. The school term for each class.
8. The number of teachers employed, white and colored, male and female, and the average compensation paid such teachers.
9. The average attendance in each class, and the length of the school term.

After the State has been admitted into the congregation of the elect by the Secretary of the Interior it must continue, during all the eight years, to send in through its governor reports of statistical nonsense and humiliating answers to questions that are the sheerest impertinence, in conformity with section 12, which provides:

SEC. 12. That no second or subsequent allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, giving—

1. A detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund allotted to his State or Territory, and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under this act.
2. And of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended.
3. And also the amount expended in such State or Territory, as required by section 9 of this act.
4. And also a statement of the number of school districts in such State or Territory.
5. And whether any portion of such State or Territory has not been divided into school districts or other territorial subdivisions for school purposes; and, if so, what portion and the reasons why the same has not been so subdivided.
6. The number of children of school age in each district, and the relative number of white and colored children in each district, and of the number of public, common, and industrial schools in each district.
7. The number of teachers employed.
8. The rate of wages paid.
9. The number of children in the State or Territory.
10. And the total number taught during the year and in what branches instructed.
11. The average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children.
12. And the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district.

Well, Mr. President, that is the most extraordinary civil-service examination that I have over known a State to be put to, before it can be admitted to enjoy its own money raised from its own people for the education of their children.

Then follows what the States must do to get any benefit of this law:

SECTION 1. * * * The Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act. * * * And if any State, by its Legislature, shall decline or relinquish its share or proportion under this act, or any portion thereof, the sum so relinquished shall go to increase the amount for distribution among the other States and Territories as herein provided. * * *

By section 4 the State must provide a system of free common schools for all of its children without distinction of race or color, either in raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded. Teachers, books, furniture, grades of classes, location of school-houses are all school facilities. These must all be without discrimination, and it must be so provided in the State laws.

By section 8 the State must expend out of its own revenues, or out of money raised under its authority, a sum equal to that it gets under this bill. And the States are held to forfeit their rights, under this law, that do not "distribute the moneys raised for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color" (section 14). This is not possible under section 2 of the bill.

Section 2 of this bill, if you will read the last clause of it, does not admit of the equal distribution of the money in the States between the children of different races. It requires the money to be distributed in separate schools, according to the color of the school, whether it is white or whether it is black. I will not comment upon the first and second clauses of the second section of this bill. I leave it to some gentleman who does not live in a former slave State to do that, that he may be able to show how this bill in the last Congress of the United States was turned upside down by an amendment that was put on it, for what purpose I am not exactly able to state, but that changed the basis of distribution within the State as it had existed from the time the first bill was introduced down to the time that amendment was put in, on the 3d of March, 1886, changing it from a distribution within the State, upon a comparison of the illiterate people within the State with those of other States, to a comparison merely of the number of children who were white with the number of children who were black between the ages of ten and twenty years, inclusive, in 1880.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will pardon me. I think he labors under a wrong impression as to the second section. It does not require a distribution among the schools according to the number of schools, but the language of the section is that the money—

Shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools, respectively, in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years, both inclusive, in such State or Territory and in the District of Columbia bear to each other as shown by the said census.

Not to be divided among the schools, but paid out for the support of the schools in the relative proportion of the number of children, white and black.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] drew that amendment, and he explained it very elaborately in a speech, and he explained it just as I have done. I do not care about going into it.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Vermont and myself were together when it was drawn.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to be drawn into a debate on that subject, but the Senator from Vermont evidently understood what he wrote and he explained it just as I have done.

There was but one feature of distribution in this bill, I remarked, until that amendment came into it, and I will read what that was. In every bill that was offered there was only one feature of distribution:

That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not read and write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; and until otherwise provided such compensation shall be made according to the official returns of the census of 1880.

In every bill that was introduced that feature was brought in, and only that; no other basis of distribution in the State was mentioned but that; and the Senator from Vermont, on the 3d of March, 1886, introduced the second clause, which changes the basis of distribution in the State entirely and makes it a distribution to correspond with the number of white children and the number of black children in the State, the money to be divided between the schools as provided in the clause which he added to the bill. That I have nothing to do with.

Mr. BLAIR. What was the Senator's remark?

Mr. MORGAN. I say that is an argument with which I have nothing to do. I am representing a former slave State, and if I wanted to grab money under this bill I could vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont for the palpable reason that it would give money to the State on the basis of illiteracy on every negro in the State above the age of ten up to one hundred years old, and when we come to distribute it we distribute it between the whites and blacks in proportion to the school population. Of course I would vote for that part of it if I believed in making the grab.

I know of but one parallel to the power which the Congress is exercising or applying in this bill, and that is the jurisdiction which they exercise over the blanket Indians. They take them and put them into the Government school, and they seem to think that the whole United States should act upon a like basis in respect to education, and wherever they find a child who does not know how to read and write by the time he gets ten or twelve years of age, the Government must go out and capture him, and in some way or other hurry him to school. How they ever got their consent to omit the compulsory power of education from this bill I can not understand, but we shall come to that. We know that that is the next step in the progress of reformation. We know when they have got jurisdiction by the consent of the State to receive this money, the power to alter, amend, or repeal the law being reserved, the next step necessarily will be compulsory education.

The schoolmaster intends to take possession of the land, and this bill in the State of Alabama gives him control of $2,000,000 a year, when all the expenses of the judiciary and Legislature, and the payment of interest on the public debt, and all the expenses amount to less than $600,000. If they can not prove otherwise the progress of their work, by getting children into their schools by voluntary enrollment, I dare say the Senator from New Hampshire, when he becomes a candidate for the Presidency, will be here with a bill to compel the attendance of children in the public schools supported by the Federal Government.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg to say to the Senator that I do not concede what he is speaking of. I am opposed to compulsory education.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the only reason it has not got in here. The Senator has got everything else in. I think that the school-book feature of this bill belongs legitimately to the measure. I can not understand why the Government of the United States should want to pay for a school without knowing something of the school-books used. The bill requires them to teach the English language instead of the German or the French. That is natural enough; but if you can require them to teach English and certain branches of English, orthography, reading, geography, etc., why can you not require them to use certain books? If you require them to teach history, why can you not select the book?

This power is perfectly legitimate if it is legitimate to vote money in aid of education, and may be exercised; and all this marshaling of school-books before the Secretary of the Interior will be merely for the purpose of informing the country that at last it is necessary to prescribe the school-books for the children. If we can give the education of the children, white and black, in the State of Alabama to the hands of the Senator from New Hampshire, we have a right to expect of course that there will be a tremendous moral revolution in our social system.

We might prefer some other kind of civilization than that elevated plane in which the Senator breathes and moves and has his existence, but we must accept what he offers. Some of us might prefer a lower level because it is more natural and more comfortable to us. We do not want to be trained up to this climax of high perfection in morality and in education to which the Senator desires to screw us up. I should rather that the school-book feature be left out, but I say it is legitimately here if the power to prescribe the curriculum is legitimately in this bill. If you were to strike it out the bill would still be as bad as it is now upon principle, though not quite so bad in practice.

Now, what are the political features of this bill? They startle me, I confess. Here is the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] who brings a resolution into the Senate of the United States to investigate a municipal election in Jackson, Miss. We search about for the authority in the Constitution and we do not find it; nevertheless a majority of the Senate vote the investigation. What for? Is it to punish anybody? Is it to reform anybody? Is it to protect the ballot? Is that the idea; to protect the ballot? I do not believe there is a Democrat on this side of the Chamber who recognizes the constitutional power of Congress to protect the ballot by investigating a municipal election in Jackson, Miss.; and if they have not got the right to do that how can they have the right to purify the ballot by making a negro more capable of using the ballot by taking him to a common school and educating him?

The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] wants to protect the ballot by educating the negro. The junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] wants to protect the ballot by taking the shotgun out of the hands of the white man. That is the proposition. Neither of them has any power to interfere with it, because it is a State regulation, and they have got no more right to interfere with a man's vote in the State of Mississippi than I have a right to interfere with a man's going to church in New Hampshire. That is one of the reserved powers of the States—the right to control the ballot.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me ask, who is to vote for Representatives in Congress?

Mr. MORGAN. The Representatives in Congress are to be elected by the people who are qualified to vote by State laws for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and that qualification is a matter that belongs exclusively to the States.

Mr. HAWLEY. But I think the Constitution says something about the right of Congress to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding such elections.

Mr. MORGAN. I know that clause, but it does not affect the right of the electors.

Mr. HAWLEY. That does not affect the argument of the gentleman on the school question; but I want to have his argument sound on all things.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not speaking of the manner of holding elections; I am speaking of the qualifications of the elector, and I say that it is a right reserved to the States to prescribe this qualification, and whether you qualify him by educating him or in any other way, it is a State matter and not a United States matter.

More than that, the complaints that are presented to the Secretary of the Interior, without reference to their quality, their terms, or nature, must, according to this bill, be referred by him to Congress. They must come here, and when they come here they are in order; in order for what? In order for strife, for contention. The people of the Northern section of this country, thinking that they could help the negro by conferring upon him certain so-called civil rights, passed act after act giving him such rights and prescribing certain punishments against people who should interfere with those rights. Trial after trial occurred in the courts. Finally, the cases commenced getting into the Supreme Court of the United States where unconstitutional laws were mashed by the weight of their authority, and Congress was left naked and unprotected in its efforts to enforce civil rights through the judiciary.

Failing in that, finding that the Supreme Court of the United States would defend the Constitution and protect it against invasion or abuse, this bill brings these civil-rights trials directly from the Secretary of the Interior into the Senate Chamber. Why have these statistics, sent to the Secretary of the Interior, referred to the House and to the Senate? Why make that a compulsory duty upon the Secretary of the Interior if it is not a part of this bill to have the investigation of every complaint that is made by any man, white or black, or any woman or child in a Southern State against the teacher, or against the governor, or against the State government, brought here for trial before this tribunal? What good purpose would these reports subserve? What issues do they bring with them?

Sir, there has been a constant effort in the civil-rights direction among politicians back to the day of the emancipation of the negro. That is the political purpose and the political feature of this bill against which I object most seriously and most earnestly. If there is anything that I would condemn above another it would be the hauling of these personal complaints made in respect to the distribution of this school fund into this Chamber as a source of strife between sections and as the basis of new legislation to be proposed in amendment to this bill.

Are we, because we suppose there is a popular demand for this largess, for this immense sum of money to be distributed among our people, to bring the States as subject States and force them to trial on this authorized investigation before this body? It is a total perversion of the constitutional authority of Congress. The Senate of the United States ought not to have, has not, and can not have jurisdiction to hear and determine a complaint made by every man against a schoolmaster in the State of Alabama or against its governor. You usurp that power. It is true that it is not amongst the very vital powers of this bill, but it is amongst those fraught with mischief, and this bill, with this feature in it, may well be named Pandora's box. It may well be called that Trojan horse which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] so aptly termed it the other day, and which extracted from the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] the declaration that he would welcome any number of Trojan horses to Mississippi if each had a million dollars in its belly. I have no doubt of it. He said so and I take it for granted.

The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] had an idea about this bill that he mentioned in Boston in a very able and elaborate speech he made there. He was talking about the tariff, and it has always seemed to me that there is a sort of bond of connection between this bill and the tariff. He says:

> Who in this enlightened audience would object to spending $10,000,000 a year to educate the men who vote our tickets in this Republic? I voted against the last bill which appropriated $70,000,000. Why? Because I disliked some of the provisions of the bill; I feared it did not give security enough for the expenditure of the money; in fact, to be honest, I have not a great deal of the Massachusetts gush about the South in my heart. [Laughter and applause.] When men won't let their fellow-men vote, drive them away from the polls and murder them if it is necessary to keep them away, refuse to count their ballots after they are cast, I will not trust them with the expenditure of money to educate those voters any farther than I am compelled to. [Applause.] I will do them the justice to say that up to the present time, so far as I have examined, they have given a fair share of their money for the education of the blacks. But if a white man is teaching a black school they will not permit him to go into the society of white men, not by any manner of means.

The Senator is mistaken about that.

> Under the Glenn bill they undertook to put men into the chain gang for a year, down in Georgia, because, forsooth, the professors in the Atlanta college, established by $150,000 paid in by Northern churches and Northern churchmen, educated their children at that school.

I do not want to have that conflict. These complaints do not come here about Alabama, I believe. Even the honorable junior Senator from New Hampshire the other day, when he wanted to reform the whole South by having a commission sit on their right to vote, very kindly omitted the State of Alabama. I am glad we are producing such a favorable impression on the Northern mind. But let me tell the Senators exactly how we are doing it. We are doing it by attending to our own business and letting the business of other people alone. We have had remarkable success in it, and I think we shall have more if we keep on in this course.

Mr. President, I do not wish to deliver a lecture upon the negro. I believe I understand him almost as well as any man in the Senate. I think I regard him with proper appreciation. I know he has a large hold upon my sympathies and my sense of justice. I would not do anything to degrade him or to prevent him from rising. I make contributions, as I have often done, to his elevation and promotion in every respect where he is capable of doing anything or where his promotion is acceptable to the people. I would not make a negro a judge and put him on the bench of the United States in Alabama, though he might be as learned a man as any on that bench. Why? Because he would not be acceptable to the people. I doubt if he would be acceptable to Massachusetts, or Connecticut, or Maine, or New Hampshire. There are a great many people that I would not put upon the bench, just as I would not put the negroes on the bench or in any other office, because they are not acceptable to the people. But let me tell you one thing about the negro——

Mr. HOAR rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the honorable Senator from Alabama whether a majority of the people of his State are negroes or whites?

Mr. MORGAN. They are white.

Mr. HOAR. What is the difference between the races?

Mr. MORGAN. I should suppose now about 100,000.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose a capable negro judge, fit within the description the Senator just gave, would be acceptable to all that portion of the people of Alabama who are negroes, would he not?

Mr. MORGAN. Hardly. A negro has a way of believing that a white man knows more than he does. Perhaps the Senator would like to know where that idea came from. It is a perfectly natural idea with the negro. In his own country he is a slave and always has been. Take the report printed by the Senate in the last Congress of a lieutenant of the Navy of his recent visit up the Congo 1,700 miles and hear what that officer of the Navy says about them. They are now there, and he witnessed their orgies of cannibalism; he witnessed their system of slavery; he witnessed what has been known about the negroes since the first historian wrote of them. That is to say, the negro adopts slavery in his own country as the common law just as we adopt civilization.

Mr. HOAR. I am sorry to interrupt the Senator. Does he quote that as an argument?

Mr. MORGAN. Part of one.

Mr. HOAR. To prove that the negro population in this country are unfit for civilization?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a question of citizenship.

Mr. HOAR. I ask if that is the point?

Mr. MORGAN. That is part of it. I was calling the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact, not an argument at all—it is a mere dry, cold fact—that the negro in his own country has always maintained the institution of slavery and does it yet. Slavery is the common law of Africa. When we brought them here, we brought them with that idea, we kept them under it, modifying it from time to time, according to our own civilization and our own Christianity, until the time emancipation came. It was really terminated by the condition of the negro up to which we had educated him. He took the advantage and was entitled to the advantage of all the education and civilization we had bestowed on him as a plea for his manhood, as a plea for his freedom, and he got it. Now——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. In the time that we were training the negroes up we could not pay a proper degree of attention conformable to the institution itself to the parental relation. We would take a father of a family and sell him, and a mother of a family and sell her. Child after child we would take and sell. The family relation did not exist except in a merely partial way. It did not exist legally at all. They were in that condition up to the time of emancipation. The master of the household had in that sense the control, occupying the place of the father of the family. He furnished the clothing, he paid for the medical attention, the nursing, the religious training, and everything else about the family, not consulting the father or the mother as to what he did with the children in those days. He himself stood in loco parentis as to the negro slaves. When they were turned loose, they were wanting in that spirit of parental power and control which it is necessary they should have at the head of a family in order to make it a unit of civilization.

Now, my purpose is to supply that; my labors have been directed to it. I know that that is the point where the negro needs assistance; and in order to make the father the head of the family certain things must occur. He must have the responsibility of supporting the children. They must have the duty of parental obedience which belongs to that relation and grows out of it. He must have the moral control of the family. They must be unified by the cultivation of all the elements of family structure and parental control. I want to secure that. If you will take the negro children in my State and feed and clothe and educate them at public expense, I will warrant you that the fathers of the families in that country will degenerate to a condition far inferior to that which they held while they were in domestic slavery. If we want to do anything for the negro; if we are really his friend, we will encourage him to self-control, and we will develop in him all the powers of manhood that belong to and that are essential to the relation of parent and child, father and son.

If I wanted to educate the colored children in this country properly I would put before them a good, just, proper, perfect school, but I would say to the father of that family, "Before your children can enter that door, you being a man capable of labor, must take a little off your expenditures for tobacco and for whisky, and instead of working two days in the week and idling the rest of the time, you must work a little more, like the white people do, and furnish your money to the school, and when you have done that you shall be one of the incorporators of the school; you shall be one of the managers; you shall have a father's care and a father's interest in connection with the teachers, and you shall go there and visit that school-room and see how your child is progressing." I would never think of contributing to the efficiency of the heads of families among the colored population of the South by relieving them of any of their parental duties and responsibilities.

I do not believe we could do worse with $10,000,000 in Alabama or $100,000,000 than to put it as a permanent fund for the education of the negro children in that country, thereby relieving the parents of all that they ought to do in trying to provide for the education of their children. I believe that education anyhow is safer in the hands of the fathers and mothers of the community than it is in the hands of outside people. I believe that one of the defects in our common-school system is that we discourage the parent from taking any control of the school. If we would adopt a system which would invite them into the control of the schools I think the common schools would yield far better results than they are doing.

Now, will the Secretary have the kindness, on this branch of the subject, to read a letter from an important gentleman in the State of Massachusetts, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper sent to the desk will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS AND THE BLAIR BILL—A LEADING EDUCATOR DECLARES THAT THE PEOPLE DO NOT FAVOR THE SCHEME.

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

SIR: I was at first favorable to national aid to Southern schools in some form, but the more I watched the educational sentiment and the activity of the new South, and the more I reflected upon the history of assistance from large funds—instance, the pernicious effect of the Connecticut Western Reserve school fund—the more I came to doubt the wisdom of Federal aid.

In the first place, the people of the South have awakened to the necessity of public education, and they are at work actively and successfully in the right direction. It is only through this public, active interest that a good system of schools can be either established or maintained.

Secondly, the people of the Southern States are as able to establish their schools as any of the new Western States have been or are to-day, and as well able also as any of the older States were at the beginning. The argument that those States formerly slave are poorer than they were before the war by the value of the slaves is fallacious, since a free man is worth more, and not less, than a slave to any community.

Thirdly, I feel sure that a large distribution of money from the surplus in the Treasury would not all find its way into the school-rooms, but would be to a large extent frittered away in the course of the distribution, and that instead of a healthy emulation to see who will do best in establishing schools of their own, and thus attracting business and population, as they do in the West and are doing in the South, there will arise a pernicious strife to see who can gobble up the largest share of the loaves and fishes.

Lastly, I oppose this move, as I do other innovations of similar injurious character, on the general principle that in this country it is the duty and the privilege of the individual to provide for himself and take care of himself; and it is not the duty of the Government to act the fond parent towards the people of this country. If the people can not take care of themselves, and if the Government must then take care of them, we reduce ourselves to an absurdity, since the Government is nothing but the expression of the people's will.

There is no foundation for the statement that the people of Massachusetts favor this bill. They have never expressed themselves. People actively interested in the measure have indeed secured the passage of "resolutions" committing, apparently, large bodies of influential citizens in its favor. This is so only in appearance. To illustrate: The Massachusetts Teachers' Association met in the fall of 1886. This subject was not discussed by the eight hundred or one thousand members at all. But at a meeting of the directors the last day, near the close of the meeting, when all but a dozen or twenty had left the hall, some one introduced a resolution in favor of national aid. Objection was made that the subject had not been discussed, and that the few remaining members were not authorized to act in this matter for the association. I have forgotten whether or not the resolution was adopted. If so, it represents nothing but the hasty opinion of a majority of a dozen or two of men.

Last Saturday there was a meeting of the directors of the American Institute of Instruction, a New England body of great antiquity. An indorsing resolution was introduced and lost by a vote of 16 to 11. Subsequently, after a large part of the membership had gone home, it was brought up again and carried against a vigorous protest. This resolution will doubtless be paraded to do duty as the expression of the American Institute of Instruction. That body has not spoken at all; for the directors, even if they had been unanimous, have not been authorized to act in this matter; and what they may say carries with it only the weight which the movers have as individuals.

The department of superintendence of the National Educational Association, composed of State, county, and city superintendents from, generally, three-fourths of the States in the Union, met in Washington last February. This subject was assigned to an evening discussion. The programme was made out, and all the time was occupied by the speakers, selected in advance because they approved the measure in almost if not quite every case. No free expression of opinion was had. But at the close, in a promiscuous audience, the resolution was presented and declared adopted. There is no other evidence that it expressed the opinion of the members of that body.

No one has the right to say that the teachers of Massachusetts favor the Blair bill, or any other bill on that subject. And the people of the State have not expressed themselves on the question.

Yours, truly,

A. P. MARBLE.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Worcester, Mass., January 9.

Mr. MORGAN. As that letter suggests, a great many experiments have been presented to the nation. We tried the Freedmen's Bureau, and that was a dead failure, at great expense and annoyance to the people and no benefit to the negroes. We tried the Freedman's Bank. That did not make them rich, but on the contrary it made rich a great many of the robbers who organized the bank, and we are now footing the bills by acts of Congress.

This bill is another gift to the negroes—a gift from the benevolence of Congress—and it is a gift which will destroy them, in my judgment. If you make it large enough and continue it long enough, you will take out of that race of people all the manhood they possess, and prevent their very best efforts in the South from making anything of them.

Now, another view of this bill. This is the largest single appropriation for a civil purpose ever made in the United States or ever attempted. If we could dump into its capacious maw all that we have paid for Alaska, for our acquisitions from Mexico, for the Louisiana purchase, and for the fisheries awards, it would be scarcely half full.

We could purchase Cuba with this sum if it should be for sale.

It would maintain an army of 80,000 men for a year in the field.

It would require the labor for a year of 252,396 men, which means the living of 1,009,584 people whom they support to be transferred from the producing classes to the professional classes.

I have not heard that the farmers and other producers of this country are clamoring for this bill. It is the teachers mainly who get all of this $77,000,000 in salaries whose opinions comprise the great volume of evidence, as it is called, that has been dumped into the record in support of this bill.

The arguments that have been made on the constitutional features of this bill have been judicious, sedate, able, exhaustive, and if it shall serve no other purposes hereafter this era of debate upon this bill will be referred to by men who desire to keep in balance the powers of the State and Federal Governments hereafter, as perhaps the very best development that has been made upon this subject, connecting the ideas which have been advanced and the arguments proven by experience established in the history of the country back to those of the fathers of the country, and showing that our country has not lived in vain in respect to keeping in distinction the rights of the States as contradistinguished from the rights of the Federal Government; showing also that proudest fact which ever existed in the history of any nation in this world—that our system, above and beyond all systems that were ever devised by human agents, contains the elements of self-perpetuation; that it contains those supports essential to the local governments of this country, and the maintenance of a great confederation of republics; that it contains that which France has not, which France needs to make her a true republic, without which there can be no real, substantial, self-governing republican government.

If we keep these States and the Federal Government in balance with each other, neither aggressing upon the rights, powers, and duties of the other, we shall establish not for ourselves only, but for mankind an example the influence of which can never be denied in favor of that wonderful system of government under which we have become the most wonderful people in our progress that ever existed in the history of the world. Our perpetuation is absolutely secure because we shall always stand by and maintain the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the States as it is fixed in the Constitution. I believe in frequent discussions and references to these distinctions. I believe they ought to be kept bright and alive in the minds of the people, and when we may have departed from our principles at any time and have set a bad precedent, our first care should be addressed to the removal of its evil effects. I quote from a speech made by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in 1858, while he was a member of the House of Representatives, language and doctrines which meet my very hearty approval. He said:

> A single evidence of the spirit and watchfulness of our fathers would save us from further encroachments. But we are told that the Senate has sent loan bills to this House before. Well, if there have been precedents, I see no reason why we should continue to follow them. Instead of reference to the Constitution, we are referred to bad precedents. We may be referred to the Treasury loan bill, at the beginning of this session, which came to us from the Senate. I say that even a multitude of bad precedents does not repeal the Constitution of the United States. If so, then there is no safeguard, no virtue in the Constitution. It is the unalterable law of the people, and neither precedents, nor Presidents, nor Senates dare overthrow it so long as there is an independent House of Representatives to hold them in check.

Perhaps I can not better further warn the Senate of the danger of creating bad precedents by aggressive or permissive usurpation than by calling again to their admonition the warning of General Washington in his Farewell Address:

> The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them.
> If, in the opinion of the people, distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Mr. President, I have said upon this question not all that might be said by any means. I have not run out the arguments that I set on foot to their legitimate conclusions in many instances, but I have said all that I desire to say, and I yield the floor in the hope that I shall never again be called upon to speak on the Blair bill.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I propose to speak upon this subject, and if no other member of the Senate desires to proceed with the argument, I am ready to proceed, but prefer not to go on at this late hour of the day.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate go into executive session.

Mr. BLAIR. If before the motion is put I may be permitted to make an explanation, I would like to do so.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I observe circulating through the press in all parts of the country a statement that an ex-justice of the Supreme Court has expressed an opinion adverse to the constitutionality of this bill. That may be so, but I have taken pains to see ex-Justice Strong with reference to an allegation, which of course was somewhat personal to himself, that he had practically consulted with a number of members of the Supreme Court, and that the Supreme Court was adverse to the constitutionality of this measure. A statement to that effect has been circulated in the press.

I have consulted him personally, so that I might deny the statement authoritatively to those who seem to fail to understand the utter impropriety of such a thing; and I can say from his own lips that he has had no conversation at any time with any member of the Supreme Court in reference to the bill, and knows nothing of the opinion of any member of the court on the subject.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator be good enough to say whether Justice Strong did not state, as his own view, that he believed the bill to be unconstitutional?

Mr. BLAIR. He did not.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me, I will state just what Judge Strong said to me. He said he made no allusion whatever to this bill in any address or in any lecture before the college of which he is a professor. After his lecture was through on one occasion, one of the students asked him what he thought of the constitutionality of this bill, and he said his reply was that he doubted its constitutionality.

The Senator will recollect that the same article stated that Justice Strong was a strict constructionist, and said he was more so than his Republican brethren, and I may say that I have never heard from any Republican source whatever a doubt expressed of the constitutionality of this bill. There have been doubts expressed of its propriety, of its necessity, but never so far as I know has any Republican expressed a doubt of the constitutionality of the measure.

While I am on my feet I will say that I now hold in my hand the memorial of the trustees of the Peabody fund, which was placed before Congress in the year 1880, which was transmitted by the chairman of the board of trustees, a very elaborate report and memorial prepared by A. H. H. Stuart, M. R. Waite, the present Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, and Hon. William M. Evarts, in which they discuss on this very point the constitutionality of national appropriations for the benefit of the systematic education of American citizens. The memorial expressly declared in favor of large appropriations for the education of the colored race, and the substance of it is embodied in this resolution:

> Resolved, That it is expedient that this board should present a memorial to Congress, praying that it may grant such aid as may be required to secure to the colored population of the Southern States the education which is necessary to fit them for the discharge of their duties as citizens of the United States.

That is signed by Alexander H. H. Stuart, M. R. Waite, William M. Evarts, Washington, February 19, 1880. It is a very able document, and argues through several pages the whole subject. It would be well to print it for the use of the people.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it not the fact that the gentlemen who made that report, while favoring appropriations, repudiated the idea that those appropriations should be followed into the States by Congressional legislation?

Mr. BLAIR. They make their argument, and they base it on the very ground that Democrats on this side of the Chamber have placed their support of this bill, that Congress has the power to make appropriations which through the instrumentality of the States may be applied to the education of the children within those States.

Mr. REAGAN. The point I was calling attention to was that they repudiated the idea of following the appropriation into the States.

Mr. BLAIR. I may again suggest to those who are arguing this in the newspapers and citing the courts, and I may refer Senators to the exceedingly able constitutional argument made on this question when he was a member of the Senate by the junior member of the present Supreme Court.

Mr. MORRILL. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 31, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 30, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 2131) for the relief of Joseph Cox, administrator of Charles Pasters, deceased.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER NEAR ST. CHARLES, MO.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Private Calendar and take up for present consideration the bill S. 274, which is a bridge bill, and the consideration of which I am sure will take but a moment. It is important that action should be taken upon it promptly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let the title of the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 274) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point in the county of St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, below the city of St. Charles.

Mr. MCADOO. I would like, before objection is waived, to have this bill read.

Mr. HATCH. I will state to the gentleman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from Kansas also, that this bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce. The report shows that it is in full accord with the report of the Chief of Engineers, and is no obstruction to navigation. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. MCADOO. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, as this bill is the exact counterpart of other bills of a similar character reported from the Committee on Commerce and passed here, unless some member desires to have the bill read at length, I ask that the further reading be waived.

There was no objection, and the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HATCH. I now ask the Clerk to read the first few lines of the report, which I think will afford all the information necessary in support of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 274) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point in the county of St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, below the city of St. Charles, have had the same under consideration, and upon close examination find the bill in accordance with the recommendations of the Ch.. f of Engineers, whose communications are appended to and made part of this report.

As will be seen from these letters, the bridge as proposed will not be an obstruction to navigation, and will subserve the interests of commerce, which demand its speedy construction.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the previous question upon the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of the States and Territories for bills and resolutions. Upon this call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials from State and Territorial Legislatures are in order; also resolutions of inquiry addressed to heads of Departments.

LAND OFFICE AT BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Mr. BANKHEAD introduced a bill (H. R. 6092) to establish a land office at Birmingham, in the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. OATES introduced a bill (H. R. 6093) to further provide for the disposal of the public lands in the State of Alabama, and to devote the proceeds of sale to education in said State; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ALIEN LAND-HOLDING.

Mr. OATES also introduced a bill (H. R. 6094) to prevent aliens from pre-empting or entering homesteads, and to limit the acquisition of the public domain in the United States, and to provide for leasing grazing lands for periods not exceeding ten years; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS TO SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. OATES also introduced a bill (H. R. 6095) to authorize the appointment and prescribe the compensation of clerks to Senators and Representatives who are not chairmen of committees; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

Mr. ROGERS introduced a bill (H. R. 6096) to construct a road from Little Rock, Ark., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SUBPORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. MORROW introduced a bill (H. R. 6097) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to designate subports of entry in customs districts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION.

Mr. MORROW also introduced a bill (H. R. 6098) authorizing the construction and repair of roads from the entrance of the reservation of the Presidio, at San Francisco, Cal., to the national cemetery on the same, and the fencing and protection of the said reservation and the cemetery thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. MORROW also introduced a bill (H. R. 6099) to improve the consular service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEW LONDON, CONN.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut, introduced a bill (H. R. 6100) for the erection of a public building at New London, Conn.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION OF THE BLIND.

Mr. CANDLER (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6101) to promote the education of the blind in the several States and Territories; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education, and ordered to be printed.

WORK OF GENERAL EMORY UPTON.

Mr. TOWNSHEND submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Whereas it is alleged that the late Maj. Gen. Emory Upton, of the United States Army, had prepared with great care and ability the manuscript of a valuable work on the "Military Policy of the United States," which embodies a profound study of the military records of the United States down to the year 1863, but which was not fully completed because of the death of that distinguished and accomplished officer and writer on military subjects; and

Whereas it is believed that it is a work of great value to the country and that the same should be completed and a sufficient number of copies thereof should be published by the United States for the use of the Army and distributed for general information: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and it is hereby, directed to ascertain on what terms said manuscript can be obtained, and whether it is of sufficient value and importance for publication by order of Congress for distribution, and that said committee report upon this subject as soon as practicable.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. TOWNSHEND also introduced a bill (H. R. 6102) to abolish the tax on salt and place the same on the free-list; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, should not the preamble of that bill go to the petition-box?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The preamble is a part of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman from Michigan had been sufficiently interested in the subject to listen attentively he would have seen that.

Mr. BURROWS. I simply wanted to know the practice. That was all.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

POSTAGE ON SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois, offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for reduced postage on seeds, bulbs, plants, scions, etc., and to report by bill or otherwise.

MONEY-ORDERS FOR SMALL SUMS.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois, also offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the issue of money-orders for an amount of $5 or less for a fee of 3 cents, and to report by bill or otherwise.

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois, also offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the reissue of fractional currency to meet the demand for its use in the mails, and to report by a bill or otherwise.

RELIEF OF UNION SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. LAWLER introduced a bill (H. R. 6103) for the relief of enlisted men who served in the Federal Army and Navy during the war of the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. LAWLER also introduced a bill (H. R. 6104) to reduce taxation; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Whereas the President in his message to Congress directed attention to the paramount necessity for a reduction of the surplus accumulating and to accumulate in the Treasury; and

Whereas in the said message he dwelt at great length upon the burdens imposed by excessive taxation upon the laboring classes; and

Whereas it would seem eminently proper to set the example of tax reduction by first relieving the poorer classes of taxation imposed by the internal-revenue laws deriving revenue for the support and maintenance of the Government: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the tax of 2 cents per pound now imposed by existing law upon the food product known as oleomargarine be, and the same is hereby, abrogated and repealed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the reference of the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HATCH. I move to strike out "Ways and Means" and insert "Agriculture."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has already moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LAWLER. It is a bill to reduce taxation, and Ways and Means is the proper committee for it to go to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] moves that this bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] moves, as an amendment, that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The vote will first be taken on the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment moved by Mr. LAWLER to the motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, and the Chair declared that it was rejected.

Mr. LAWLER. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 25, noes 123.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LAWLER. I raise the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. WILKINS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Speaker, owing to the confusion, some gentlemen may not yet understand the purport of this bill, and I ask that it may be read once more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been read twice already. It can not be read again except by unanimous consent. The Chair, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], will again state the proposition. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] in the nature of an amendment, to refer the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. OATES. To which committee does the Chair rule the bill should properly go?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not ruled upon that point. A motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Agriculture was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], to which the gentleman from Illinois has moved an amendment that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. On the latter motion the House is about to vote.

Mr. OATES. Would not the bill go to the Committee on Ways and Means but for a vote of the House sending it to some other committee?

Mr. HATCH. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of the roll. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 190, not voting 71; as follows:

Mr. BACON with Mr. WOODBURN.
Mr. FORAN with Mr. KELLEY.
Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BROWER.
Mr. CUMMINGS with Mr. MOFFITT until February 7.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia, with Mr. HARMER.
Mr. FRENCH with Mr. FITCH.
Mr. CARLTON with Mr. MCCOMAS.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. GOFF.

On this vote:

Mr. BARNES with Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, to refer the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, it was agreed to.

The bill was referred accordingly, and was ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CANNON FOR SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. 6105) donating a six-pound brass cannon to the Illinois Soldiers' and Sailors' Home; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

VOLUNTEERS IN LATE WAR.

FORT LEAVENWORTH RESERVATION, KANSAS.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (H. R. 6107) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

Mr. RYAN introduced a bill (H. R. 6108) making an appropriation to pay the regular assistants to United States district attorneys the same rate of compensation for the fiscal year 1888 that was paid to them during the fiscal year 1887; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RYAN also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate to the House of Representatives the names of all assistants to United States district attorneys who have been or are being paid out of the appropriation of $100,000 made by the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1887, "for payment of assistants to United States district attorneys;" also the places of employment and the present rate of compensation to each of said assistants, and how much greater or less is the rate of compensation to each of said assistants for the fiscal year 1888 than for the fiscal year 1887, and the reasons for any such increase or reduction; and such other information in relation thereto as in his judgment may contribute to just and intelligent legislation upon the subject.

EXPORTS OF WHEAT, CORN, AND FLOUR.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 6109) providing for a bounty on wheat, corn, and flour, exported from the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS IN KANSAS.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas, also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to inform the House the reason, if any, why the railroad land grants, made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads within the State of Kansas, have not been adjusted in accordance with chapter 376 of the laws of the Forty-ninth Congress, second session, being "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes."

WASHINGTON AND WESTERN MARYLAND RAILROAD.

Mr. CARUTH (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6110) to incorporate the Washington and Western Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLEMENT AND ADJUSTMENT OF STATE WAR CLAIMS.

REPORT ON IRON ORES OF NORTHERN LOUISIANA, ETC.

Mr. BLANCHARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to inform this House of the cause of the delay in the preparation and publication of the report of Professor Lawrence Johnson, of the United States Geological Survey, on the iron ores of Northern Louisiana and Eastern Texas, which work was ordered more than two years ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It does not belong to the Committee on Printing. It belongs to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not object to its going to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so referred.

RESTORING PUBLIC LANDS TO FLORIDA PARISHES, LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBERTSON introduced a bill (H. R. 6115) restoring to the Florida parishes of the State of Louisiana certain public lands as compensation to the people thereof for lands disposed of by the United States Government at the Montpelier and Greensburgh land offices in said State; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

GRANT OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. LODGE also introduced a bill (H. R. 6120) granting cannon to General Lander Post, of Lynn, Mass.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. LONG submitted the following amendment to the rules; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Thirty minutes shall be allowed each day immediately prior to the first morning hour, in which members who have filed their names with the Speaker shall be allowed in such order as he shall arrange, to ask unanimous consent for present consideration of any bill favorably reported by a committee, and shall have three minutes for that purpose after it has been read. If the request is granted, three minutes shall be allowed in opposition to the bill. The question shall then be at once upon its amendment, engrossment, and passage. If thereupon the yeas and nays are ordered, they shall not be taken; but the order shall be equivalent to a restoration of the bill to its former status on the Calendar.

CLAIMS FOR REMUSTER.

Mr. CUTCHEON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to advise this House what progress has been made in the examination and adjudication of claims for remuster of officers of the volunteer forces under the act of June 3, 1884, or under said act as amended by the act of February 3, 1887; what is the whole number of claims filed under the said acts respectively; what number remain to be examined and adjudicated, and how long it will be before the consideration of said claims can be completed with the present clerical force of the Adjutant-General's Office.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN INDUSTRIES.

Mr. CUTCHEON also submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That it is the deliberate judgment of this House that in any proposed revision of the duties upon imports the principle of protection to American industries and the maintenance of the wages of American workingmen at the American standard ought to be distinctly recognized and firmly adhered to.

Resolved, That duties upon imports ought not to be imposed "for revenue only," but the production of those articles which we have abundant raw materials and labor to produce in this country ought to be protected by duties sufficient to enable American producers to maintain free competition in such productions in the American markets.

Resolved, That articles for the free or non-dutiable list should be selected from among such necessaries of living as we are unable to produce in adequate quantity for our needs within the United States, and not from among such productions as would come into direct competition with our own industries and would tend to throw American workingmen out of employment and to depress their wages, and ultimately to increase the cost of such productions by destroying competition.

E. G. BENTON, JR.

Mr. TARSNEY introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That E. G. Benton, jr., be, and is hereby, appointed an additional page on the floor of the House of Representatives, and to receive the same rate of compensation as those now acting in that capacity, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF GENERAL CUSTER.

Mr. FORD introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 96) authorizing the erection of an equestrian statue in the city of Washington, D. C., of the late Bvt. Maj. Gen. George A. Custer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

PROHIBITION OF ALIENS ENGAGING IN CERTAIN BUSINESS.

SEC. 5. That, in view of the recognized value of the sea fisheries as the nursery of seamen, and to encourage the training of citizens in such sea service as will make them promptly available for the manning of Government vessels in time of war, from and after the passage of this act there shall be paid from the Treasury to every fisherman employed on a vessel of the United States licensed for and engaged in the fisheries the sum of $——— per month for each calendar month actually engaged in a fishing voyage: Provided, That this payment shall be made only to citizens of the United States or to aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens.

SEC. 6. That the master of every vessel licensed for the fisheries shall, before proceeding on a fishing voyage, file with the customs officer of the port where his fishing license is issued a list of the officers and men who have been engaged for such voyage; and on returning from said voyage shall also file with such customs officer a list of officers and men who have served on said vessel, and the time served by each. Said lists shall be verified and payment made by the collector of the district from which such license was issued to each person entitled to receive the same by this act, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

CAPT. W. J. KOUNTZ.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 2865) for the relief of Capt. W. J. Kountz was erroneously referred to the Committee on War Claims. It should have been referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the reference may be changed accordingly.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of the States has been completed.

INDIANA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—LOWRY VS. WHITE.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Elections to submit a report in the contested-election case of Lowry against White, from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana. In that connection I wish to give notice that the committee will call this case up for consideration on next Thursday, immediately after the morning hour.

I am also requested, Mr. Speaker, by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. O'NEALL], to file on his part his individual views in this particular case.

Mr. ROWELL. I ask, by unanimous consent, to present the views of the minority of the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. These reports will be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask, by unanimous consent, to report back for present consideration a private bill for which there is considerable urgency, and to which there can be no kind of objection.

Mr. MCCREARY. Allow the call for bills and resolutions to be concluded.

Mr. DUNN. I thought it had been concluded.

COURT OF CLAIMS REPORTS.

Mr. MCCREARY. I present, on the part of my colleague [Mr. TAULBEE], the following resolution, which I ask to be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be authorized to refer to the appropriate committees of the House the bills now upon the House Private Calendar reported by the Court of Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress and brought forward.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. ENLOE. I rise for the purpose of making an explanation. I find in the list of private bills filed under the rule and transmitted by the petition clerk for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that one introduced by me on last Friday fails to state that it was introduced "by request." I desire that fact to be noticed, but I have been told that such an entry can not be made upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not usual to make such entry upon the Journal.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following letter from the Public Printer.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1888.

SIR: I herewith transmit to Congress my report in reply to the directions contained in resolutions of the House adopted January 24.

TH. E. BENEDICT,
Public Printer.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Speaker pro tempore, House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the letter of the Public Printer be read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the letter.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the reading of this letter be dispensed with, as nobody seems to be paying attention to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it should be read. There has been a good deal of criticism of the Public Printer, and it ought to be read in justice to him.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman tell me who is listening to it?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am listening to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. And so am I.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then let it be read for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman thinks that is a witticism he can do so. I was listening to it, and it is not my business to see what other gentlemen are doing.

The reading of the letter was then concluded, and it is as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1888.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Speaker pro tempore, House of Representatives:

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt, on the 26th instant, of the following preamble and resolution, adopted in the House of Representatives on January 24, 1888, to wit:

"Whereas it is reported that a considerable number of employés have been recently discharged from the force of the Public Printer, and that others have been granted involuntary furloughs, thereby reducing the force employed in the office of the Public Printer: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Public Printer be directed to report to this House whether he has recently discharged or furloughed any of his force, and if so, how many, and for what reasons such discharges and furloughs have been made at a time when the printing ordered by this House is largely in arrears.

"Also, whether in making such discharges and furloughs regard has been had to section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, by giving the preference to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors."

In reply, as directed, I have the honor to state that on the 21st of the present month I discharged from this office 39 employés, men and women. Said discharged employés included 16 book-binders, 14 book-sewers, and 1 laborer from the bindery division, and 8 others from other divisions of the office, comprising 1 proof-reader, 1 copy-holder, 1 carpenter, 1 laborer, and 4 women from the folding-room. I also on that date furloughed 24 book-binders and 16 book-sewers for a period of twelve working days, at the end of which they are at liberty to report for duty and resume work.

These persons were discharged and furloughed under authority of law conferred upon me to employ the necessary hands in this office for the execution of the public printing and binding, under which authority of law my powers are expressly limited as follows:

"He [the Congressional Printer] shall not at any time employ in the office more hands than the absolute necessities of the public work may require."

My action was also influenced by the further provision of law which is found in the act appropriating funds for the public printing and binding for the current fiscal year, to wit:

"No more than an allotment of one-half of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended in the two first quarters of the fiscal year, and no more than one-fourth thereof may be expended in either of the two last quarters of the fiscal year, except that in addition thereto, in either of said last quarters, the unexpended balances of allotment for preceding quarters may be expended."

A reduction of force at this time being a business necessity, as well as dictated by a due observance of the provisions of the two acts above quoted, I directed a discharge and furlough from that division of the office which, owing to the present nature of the demands upon the office, could bear the reduction with the least interruption of the current work. Such a discharge of employés in this office, even at this season of the year, was not an unusual event, as the records of the office show, especially from the division referred to, which does not usually during the present allotment period require to be run to its fullest capacity. It is probable that the motive of my action may be better shown by a comparison of the force in the bindery at the time of this discharge with that of the same period in January, 1886, at the beginning of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress:

These figures from the rolls of the office show that prior to the recent discharge there were employed twelve more book-binders than at the same period two years ago. The demands of the current work of the office at this season of the year require less work in the bindery than during the period when the regular editions of the document work ordered by Congress, the Agricultural Report, the bound edition of the RECORD, and the reports of Departments are in hand for binding. Apart from the fact that this office was carrying a larger force in the bindery than had been the case at other periods under like conditions, I am pleased to state to Congress that said division of the office had been enabled during the preceding year not only to meet all current demands but to bring up to date much delayed work and to execute more of the reserve work than had ever been the case in any single previous year. As a consequence, said division is now enabled to more than meet any current demand that is likely to be made upon it. This condition of affairs will continue until the office takes up the work of the Agricultural Report for 1887, the copy of which has not yet been received.

The following statement will exhibit the increase in the output of bound Congressional work for the periods named, being for equal portions of the first sessions of the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses:

|---|---|

A fair proportion of this great increase in the output of the office in bound Congressional work during a period of less than seven months (amounting to an actual gain of 313,275 volumes, or an increase of over 50 per cent.) was for work ordered by Congress from two to five years prior to my assuming charge of the office, and the statement does not include any work executed in the bindery upon Department requisitions, which during the same period was the largest ever known in the office.

These statements as to the work accomplished and the present condition of the work of the bindery will, I trust, in the judgment of Congress, be deemed a sufficient justification of my action in pursuance of the provision of the law prohibiting the Public Printer from employing in the office "more hands than the absolute necessities of the public work may require."

It may be further stated, however, that the condition of the appropriation governing this office for the present year was also a motive for my action. Of the total sum of $1,088,304.54 available, from all sources, for the public printing and binding, under the provisions of the one-half allotment, from July 1 to December 31, 1887, I expended for labor and material during said period $1,074,446.43, leaving but $13,858.11 unexpended and available in the Treasury, which sum would not have enabled me to continue the work of the office for more than two working days beyond the first allotment period. In addition to the sum available for public printing and binding for the one-half allotment period, there was available of the agricultural appropriation of 1886, from July 1, 1887, to January 1, 1888, the sum of $169,696.98, all of which, excepting $4,953.96, was expended prior to January 1, and all of the latter sum prior to the date of the discharge referred to, the whole edition of 401,900 copies being bound and delivered within four and one-half months. I had, on January 1, available, under the provisions of the appropriation act, less than $552,000 to conduct the office during the third quarter or present allotment period of three months, and the expenses of the office for labor and material at this time, in order to execute promptly the work demanded by Congress and the Departments, is necessarily about $8,500 per day, a sum equal to the highest average per diem expense for any period heretofore in the history of the office.

This statement would seem to furnish a sufficient answer to certain criticisms directed to an assumed parsimony on the part of the present administration of this office. I have not failed to expend every dollar at my disposal that could be honestly and legally applied to executing the increased demand for public printing, nor can it be justly said that I received at the hands of Congress at its last session all the appropriation which I deemed necessary for the conduct of the work of the office. The original estimate transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury to cover the expenses of this office for the current fiscal year was $2,427,047.41.

In reply to a request of the Appropriations Committee of the House, made December 1, 1886, as to "whether said estimate can not be prudently reduced to the sum which was appropriated for the current fiscal year, namely, $2,000,000," I said, "If the question was one simply of doing the Government printing with the present facilities and under present conditions, I would answer that $2,000,000 was amply sufficient, providing there was no increase in the amount of work ordered by Congress." I then called attention to the largely-increased demand being made upon the office, and to certain extraordinary expenditures imperatively demanded in the interest of safety and economy, which I estimated would need an appropriation of at least $150,000, and stated that if Congress would appropriate that sum for the special purpose of increasing the facilities and working capacity of the office, I would feel confidence in undertaking to conduct the office for the fiscal year of 1888 for the sum of $2,000,000, being the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1887.

While Congress, in the due and proper exercise of its powers, saw fit to confine this office to a sum upward of $150,000 below the lowest amount estimated by me to be necessary, and notwithstanding large expenditures have been required to be made out of the regular appropriation for printing and binding to meet actual necessities in the direction of safety, health, and the prompt execution of the increased demands made upon the office, I can state that I have been enabled, by legitimate economies in the purchase of material and the discharge of needless employés, to keep fully abreast of the work of the office, and I feel quite confident of my ability to meet the expectations of Congress within the limits of expense it has set, unless the allotment restriction of the present quarter should result in embarrassment owing to my inability to use an amount of appropriation proportionate to the demands of the work that may be called for by Congress.

The statement in the resolution that the "printing ordered by this House is largely in arrears" is one that I beg respectfully but emphatically to dissent from. There is not at this time, nor was there at the time of the introduction or passage of the resolution, any work ordered by this Congress in arrears in this office, all work received up to that time having been printed and returned to Congress within the shortest period that it could possibly be done, or within which it ever has been done.

It is in the power of Congress to order in a single day printing that would occupy every resource of this office for a week or even a year. The Public Printer can not be expected to execute work not within the mechanical facilities or the working space at his command. For several days immediately succeeding the reassembling of Congress, after the holiday adjournment, more work was received than could be executed within a working day, owing to the fact that the mechanical facilities of the office in type, presses, and other machinery were not sufficient to meet so extraordinary a demand, although one of the largest and best selected bill and document forces ever known in the history of the office was employed.

I can not refrain from stating at this time that in every case where complaint of delayed work has been made, either in Congress, the public press, or by communication to this office, the bills or documents so represented as delayed had, so far as my knowledge extends, already been printed and delivered to Congress for periods of a day or a week previous, or else the copy of the same had not been received in this office when the request or complaint was made. I can further say, with the greatest confidence, that the office has, during the past month and year, exceeded all previous efforts in the rapid execution of printing and binding, and, had there been less efficiency in the working force, or less improvements in the office service during the year past, it would not now be able to meet the daily demands made upon it.

Upon the basis of these facts and statements I would respectfully deny all charges that this office is in arrears in printing the work ordered by the House. Apart from the fact that not one single complaint has reached me from the Senate of any delay in printing documents or bills, I submit the following statement from the records of this office, on which I base the claim that the office has not only executed promptly all work of Congress but has executed a largely increased amount of work for this Congress in comparison with work executed during the same period of the Forty-ninth Congress:

| Total number of Senate executive documents, Senate miscellaneous documents, and Senate reports received up to January 25, 1886, first session Forty-ninth Congress | 158 |
| Total number of House executive documents, House miscellaneous documents, and House reports received up to January 25, 1886, first session Forty-ninth Congress | 240 |
| Total | 398 |
| Total number of Senate executive documents, Senate miscellaneous documents, and Senate reports received up to January 25, 1888, first session Fiftieth Congress | 189 |
| Total number of House executive documents, House miscellaneous documents, and House reports received up to January 25, 1888, first session Fiftieth Congress | 391 |
| Total number of Senate bills introduced up to January 25, 1886, first session Forty-ninth Congress | 1,235 |
| Total number of House bills introduced up to January 25, 1886, first session Forty-ninth Congress | 4,420 |
| Total number of Senate bills introduced up to January 25, 1888, first session Fiftieth Congress | 1,654 |
| Total number of House bills introduced up to January 25, 1888, first session Fiftieth Congress | 5,995 |

These figures show conclusively an increase of nearly 46 per cent. in the Senate and House documents and reports, and of nearly 36 per cent. in the Senate and House bills up to January 25 of the present session of Congress over a like period of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, all of which work, except a few documents held awaiting illustrations and a few others never taken up at this season of the year, was completed and delivered to Congress before the close of work on January 25, 1888, to which period the figures are brought up.

I am pleased to further present the following figures, showing the increased amount of work in the office in another direction:

| Total number of concurrent resolutions, Senate resolutions, and House resolutions received in this office during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, up to January 25, 1886, inclusive | 51 |
| Total number of concurrent resolutions, Senate resolutions, and House resolutions received at this office during the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, up to January 25, 1888, inclusive | 67 |

This exhibit shows an increase of 16 in the number of said resolutions, or an average of over 30 per cent., and I can state that all of the same have been printed and promptly delivered to Congress.

The following exhibit of work printed on private orders of members of the Senate and House also has a bearing on the points previously presented:

| Total number of copies of messages and speeches ordered up to January 25, 1886, first session Forty-ninth Congress | 332,410 |
| Total number of copies of messages and speeches ordered up to January 25, 1888, first session Fiftieth Congress | 749,000 |

All of this work was printed and delivered at the date of this report, being a gain of over 100 per cent.

The records of the office show a corresponding increase in work received from all of the Departments of the Government during the present fiscal year, as compared with that of two years ago, as the following figures clearly indicate:

| Total number of requisitions for printing received from the several Executive and Judicial Departments, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House from July 1, 1885, to January 25, 1886 | 13,169 |
| Total number of requisitions for printing received from the several Executive and Judicial Departments, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House from July 1, 1887, to January 25, 1888 | 14,272 |
| Total increase | 1,103 |

This increase of over 9 per cent. in the total number of requisitions, however, does not indicate the actual increase of work, as a large number of the requisitions cover nearly double the amount of work required by the requisitions of two years ago. This statement is made clear by the following exhibit of the cost of work covered by said requisitions and chargeable against the total allotments of the Departments for the current year:

| Total allotments to Departments for printing and binding for current fiscal year | $1,103,237.46 |
| Total cost of work covered by 14,272 requisitions received and charged during current fiscal year | 799,214.21 |
| Balance allotments available | 304,023.25 |

This shows that less than one-third of the total sum allotted to Departments in the appropriation for printing and binding for the current fiscal year is now available for their use, while less than seven months of the fiscal year have elapsed. It is proper to add that it is customary for Departments to put in the major part of their requisitions during the first allotment period of the year, to allow of ample time to execute them; but the records show that their orders have been supplied more promptly and in larger quantities than usual, leading to the early exhaustion of their allotment, and calling for a greatly reduced amount of work during the balance of the year. This fact alone is a sufficient cause for the reduction of force at this time in the division most affected by this reduction of the demand for departmental work, and can be stated as an additional reason for my action.

The several exhibits already given do not so clearly illustrate the increase in the amount of work executed at present over past periods in this office as the following statement of the press-room and paper warehouse, which furnish the items that may be considered the most correct gauge of the actual output of printed work:

|---|---|---|
| Total output of press-room from December 1, 1887, to January 25, 1888, inclusive | 11,532 | 87,931 |

This exhibits an increase in favor of the present period of 933 printed forms and 4,758 tokens of paper (equal to 2,379,000 printed sheets) in a period of only forty-five working days. Yet, while this is fairly representative of the increased output of work, it does not show the full increase, for the reason that some eight presses in the press-room now print 32-page forms, which count in tokens only equal to the 16-page forms formerly printed. The following is the paper warehouse exhibit:

This shows an increase of over 23 per cent. in the use of one class of paper over the period of two years ago, this class of paper being that on which Congressional work is mostly printed. The statement does not include any paper used in the bindery, nor any material (such as paper, envelopes, and cardboard) furnished by Congress or the Departments, of which material there has been an increase estimated at nearly fourfold over the amounts of the same material received two years ago.

I am further pleased to state that this large increase of work has been accomplished with a force of about two hundred employés less than was required two years ago, which reduction, I would add, has not been made by the discharge of skilled and competent mechanics, the number of which in the office is now about equal to that of former years, but which has been made largely by the dismissal of clerks, laborers, and other supernumerary persons whose employment, in my judgment, did not contribute to the output of work in the office.

In further reply to your resolution, as to "whether, in making discharges and furloughs, regard has been had to section 1754, Revised Statutes, by giving the preference to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors," I have to state that I have fully observed the letter and spirit of said act, and that of all later acts which protect not only the limited number of veteran soldiers referred to in section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, but all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors and their widows and orphan children. In corroboration of this statement I have the original lists on which the names of persons were presented to me from the working divisions of this office for discharge, on which appear my own memoranda as to whether they were entitled to exemption under the above referred to provisions of law, and upon which no honorably discharged soldier or sailor, or widow or orphan son or daughter of the same, appears as having been discharged except for cause.

I can further state that the roll-book of this office, for the first time in its history, now bears a record of every person entitled to protection under the act according preferment in appointment or exemption from discharge for reason of service in the Army of the United States. These data could only be obtained by a personal inquiry of nearly every person found entitled to such exemption, when I took charge of the office, as the original appointment papers on file in but few instances referred to their honorable service in the Army.

I am pleased to state that there is a much larger percentage of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors and their widows and orphan children now employed in this office than ever before, and in such divisions as the watch force none but honorably discharged soldiers and sailors have been appointed by me.

If Congress should not find this reply sufficiently broad to cover the inquiry proposed by the resolution, I will be pleased to have any further inquiry or investigation made that may seem desirable in the matter, or that the purposes of the authors of the present inquiry may suggest.

TH. E. BENEDICT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the report be referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed. And, Mr. Speaker, on that motion I desire to say a few words. In my official relations as a member of the Committee on Printing of the House it has been my duty to look somewhat after the public printing, and I have been thrown into closest contact with the Public Printer; and I wish to emphasize for a few moments—and I will take as little time as I can—some of the facts and statistics as set forth in this report, which is so explicit upon all points covered by it, or intended to be covered by it.

In answer to the resolution which I had the honor to transmit to him, it having been adopted by the House on the 24th of the present month, he admitted that he did discharge from the Government Printing Office on January 21, thirty-nine employés. Nearly all these employés so discharged had been employed in the bindery. It is further true on that day he had discharged, or rather furloughed for twelve days, forty employés. Now, Mr. Speaker, nearly all the employés so discharged and furloughed had been employed, as I have said, in the bindery.

This officer shows in his report that at this season of the year, or at this stage of the public business, there is less demand in the bindery for employés than in the printing department of his bureau. He shows that he could dispense with the employés in the bindery, therefore, with a proper regard for the public interest, and that the bindery could bear the reduction, which he of necessity was forced to make, and with the least interruption of the current work; hence, in order to keep within the limits of his appropriation, discharges were made from those employés. It should be remembered that these were necessary in order to keep his expenses within the appropriation made him under existing law.

This report shows further, and I want to emphasize that particularly, because complaints have been made that the work is not being done promptly, that in the bindery a larger volume of work has been done than was ever done before in the history of the Government in the same period of time, and I wish to refer to the statistics, taking the same period of time covered by the Forty-ninth Congress and comparing it with the work done in the present Congress up to the corresponding date. For the six months and twenty-five days from the beginning of the fiscal year preceding the opening of the Forty-ninth Congress this report shows that in this department there were bound 576,946 volumes, while in the same length of time in the Fiftieth Congress there were bound 890,221 volumes, making a difference in favor of the amount of work done by this officer in the same length of time, that is to say, six months and twenty-five days of this fiscal year, of 313,275 volumes, an increase of over 50 per cent. It is but fair to the present incumbent to state that very much of this work was work ordered by Congress from two to five years before he took charge of the office.

While doing this, and I want also to call special attention to this fact, he has been enabled to reduce the public expenditures in the Printing Office without in any manner affecting the efficient working of that branch of the public service. Let us make a comparison of the number of employés of that department, the bindery, at the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress, when the 576,946 volumes were bound, as I have mentioned, and the beginning of this Congress, when in the same period of time 890,221 volumes were bound.

In the closing period of 1886, when this work was done, there were employed 262 persons in the bindery, while in the closing days of 1887 and in January, 1888, he has employed 274; in other words, he had only twelve more while doing so much more work. And yet it will be seen after making all the discharges of which this complaint is made he has a larger force in the bindery than in January, 1886.

Now, sir, the law is that the Public Printer shall not employ more hands than the absolute necessities of the public service require; and this law is imperative upon him. It is well known that Congress in its wisdom sets apart all the money in appropriation bills that the Public Printer can lawfully use within specified periods of each fiscal year. This amount is, as you are well aware, allotted to him, and provision is made that this allotment shall be one-half the total amount of the appropriation for the first six months of the fiscal year, and the remaining half is to be divided evenly, one quarter of the amount to be used in the third quarter of the year and the remainder in the fourth quarter of the fiscal year.

Again I want to say that, taking the first half of the fiscal year ending December 31, 1887, this officer was enabled, by his efficient management of that bureau and the efficient system of business adopted in that office, to determine not only exactly the amount that he could profitably expend, but to know exactly what amount was being expended daily, and to so graduate his expenditures as to consume just what was allotted him by law to be expended within the given period, ending with the close of the year. This report shows that on December 31, at the close of the first half of the fiscal year, he had expended every dollar which Congress had allotted to him to expend in the first half of the year except the sum of $13,858.11, which amount, I will state, would not be sufficient, as he says in his report, to pay the running expenses of the Printing Office for two days. Evidently he must have made a very accurate and close calculation to have been able to know so nearly what he was doing, and to have expended so nearly the whole amount he could by law expend down to that date. This is an evidence of the business methods which obtain in that office.

But, Mr. Speaker, it may be argued that he had other appropriations. That is true. The agricultural appropriation in part was available in that portion of the fiscal year, the whole amount of this agricultural appropriation so available being $169,696.98. But on the 31st day of December, at the close of that portion of the fiscal year, he had expended every dollar of that appropriation or allotment except $4,953.96, and that amount was brought over into the appropriation for the new fiscal year. But this balance itself was expended before the discharges in the bindery were made on the 21st of the present month.

Now, the whole allotment for the third quarter of the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1888, under the law amounts to $552,000; and he shows, and I think the report in that respect is conclusive, that he could not in justice to the public service have retained the employés discharged with any hope of keeping within the appropriation or quarterly allotment. This matter of employing persons and discharging or furloughing them belongs, Mr. Speaker, to the Public Printer. The law wisely lodges this discretion in him. And from the best light obtained I believe he has wisely and prudently exercised the discretion thus given him.

Now, a word in regard to the work done by this officer. It is set forth fully in the report, but I can briefly recapitulate it, and I ask particular attention to it since a great deal of complaint has been made in some of the newspapers, but which the Public Printer states has not been made in the other branch of this Congress; we have heard some complaints of a similar character on this side of the Capitol.

Take the Senate executive and miscellaneous documents and reports, and the House executive and miscellaneous documents and reports which were submitted in the first forty-five days of the Forty-ninth Congress and compare them with the number submitted during the same length of time in this Congress.

Thus, from the first Monday in December, 1885, for forty-five days, there were introduced in the Senate 158 of these documents and reports, and in the House for the same period 240, making an aggregate of 398. Now, for the first forty-five days of the Fiftieth Congress, beginning first Monday in December, 1887, the Senate documents and reports amounted to 189 as against 158 two years ago, and in the House of Representatives 321 as against 240 for the same length of time last Congress, making in the aggregate an increase of these documents of 182 introduced in this Congress over the Forty-ninth Congress for the same period.

Take bills. There were introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress, first forty-five days, 1,235 bills in the Senate and in the House 4,420, making a total of 5,655.

In the first forty-five days of the Fiftieth Congress there were introduced 1,654 bills in the Senate, and 5,995 in the House, a total of 7,649, being an excess in forty-five days of 1,994 bills in the present Congress over the Forty-ninth.

This shows an increase in this Congress of that class of work known as documents and reports to be done by the Public Printer of 46 per cent. in these forty-five days, while in the other class of work, bills, there is an increase of 36 per cent. Notwithstanding all this large increase of work, this officer has done it with a working force of at least two hundred employés less, on an average, than were employed in that department in the corresponding time in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Now let us look for a moment at the further work done during these forty-five days of the Forty-ninth and of the Fiftieth Congresses. Take the printing of messages and speeches of members of Congress upon the orders of members of the Senate and of the House. In these forty-five days in 1885–'86 there were printed of these speeches and messages 332,410. In the same time in forty-five days of the present Congress the Public Printer has printed 749,000, making a difference in favor of this work now of 416,590. This is an increase of over 100 per cent. in the demands upon that office in this class of work.

The Public Printer also calls attention, Mr. Speaker, and I may be pardoned for referring to that briefly, to the printing for the various heads of Departments, etc., upon requisitions. The printing for the different Departments of the Government, and for the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House is made on requisition, as it is termed. I desire to show you the number of requisitions sent within the first forty-five days of the Forty-ninth Congress, and the number of requisitions sent in the first forty-five days in the Fiftieth Congress. In the Forty-ninth Congress of these requisitions there were 13,169; in the Fiftieth there were 14,272; that is to say an increase of 1,103 in the requisitions made upon the Public Printer for printing from the sources I have mentioned. But the requisitions themselves do not show the volume or the amount of the work in the requisition. Let us get at that for a moment.

The amount appropriated by Congress to these various Departments and set apart to be used as available by them for public printing is ascertained and fixed, and, as I have said, the Public Printer can only use a certain portion of it in the first half of the year and so much in the remaining part of the year. He can only use half of the appropriation in the first half of the fiscal year. Under these requisitions they had allotted to them to be expended in printing their requisitions $1,103,237.46; that is for the whole year. During the first six months and twenty-five days of the year there was used for this purpose $799,214.21; which only leaves for the remaining half of the year, less twenty-five days, the sum of $304,023.25; so that the requisitions which have been made upon the Public Printer for printing consumed more than two-thirds of the entire amount which the Departments, etc., are allowed for printing during the entire fiscal year. That much was consumed in a little over one-half of the fiscal year. All of this increase in work has been done by the Public Printer in forty-five days, and the work has been delivered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one point more in regard to the quantity of the stuff and material consumed and printed in that office. One of the best methods of getting at the actual output of the office is to take the result of the work of the press-room and paper warehouse. First, the press-room account shows that in the first forty-five days of the Forty-ninth Congress there were put out 10,599 printed forms, as they are called; in the first forty-five days of the Fiftieth Congress there were put out 11,532 forms. I am not a practical printer, and if I mistake what the form is I hope some gentleman who is a practical printer will correct me.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Has the Committee on Printing investigated the question as to the cause of delay in printing such matter as is needed for the use of the House in the performance of its duty? If my friend will allow me, I say that I imagine this is not a question of what amount of printing has been done by one Public Printer or by another, or a question of what has been the expense of printing by one Congress or another, or one Public Printer or another; but it is a question whether the printing which ought to be done in the interest of the House has been performed in a proper manner.

If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me I will say as to the reports of the Engineering Department of the Government that almost two months of the session have now elapsed, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, one of the important committees of the House, has only to-day a single one of perhaps four volumes of the reports of the engineers, neither bound nor indexed. Two months of this session have gone and these reports, which are valuable and needed by an important committee of the House, have not yet been furnished.

I have heard complaints also from other committees, and the question for the House to consider is whether the printing which ought to be done and which must be done in the interest of good and speedy legislation has been done, not what this Public Printer has been enabled to save or what he has been enabled to do more than previous Public Printers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I appreciate the gentleman's point and will endeavor to answer his inquiry. Upon the subject of the Engineer's Report (which is outside of what I intended to say), I understand that there was a delay in the previous Congress in furnishing that report, but the delay in that case was in no way attributable to the act of the Public Printer. He was not to blame for that delay, as I am quite well assured the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors very well knows, and while attention is called to the fact that that Engineer's Report was not bound, my information is that it was in the hands of the members of the committee in such shape and condition that they could very readily use it. It was not bound, and the reason why it was not bound can be ascertained, I believe, but it was not the fault of the Public Printer. However, that is totally outside of the present inquiry.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to say to the gentleman that the report of the Chief of Engineers has not been received by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in any form. One small portion of it and a fraction of a second part have been received, and that is all that has been received up to this morning. No part of the document is bound, and not more than one-third of it has been received in any form.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to make any statement in regard to that document in this Congress; but heretofore when the Engineer's Report was delayed, it was delayed because it was necessary to get certain information from the War Department which the Public Printer could not obtain. I have no doubt that I shall be able to get an answer from the Public Printer why there is delay in this case, and I undertake to say that his answer will be as accurate and conclusive upon that point as it proves to be upon the questions that have been addressed to him. There was no inquiry made in regard to this Engineer's Report in the matter before us, and therefore this statement from the Public Printer does not answer that inquiry; but I have no doubt that he can answer it in a perfectly satisfactory manner, as he has answered every question that the House has asked.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman is apologizing for the delays in furnishing these reports and giving excuses in advance for the Public Printer, I would like him to tell the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the members of this House why it is that we have not the report of the Commissioner of Navigation? I am credibly informed that more than two months prior to the commencement of this Congress that report was placed in the hands of the Public Printer, and the members of the committee have been absolutely begging for copies of that document, a report which makes certain recommendations in regard to the navigation laws, a report which it is necessary to have in the hands of the members of that committee in order that they may act intelligently upon matters that are coming before them every week in the form of bills. The committee have been so inconvenienced by reason of this delay that they have actually been compelled to have a transcript of certain portions of the report made and brought to the committee-room, in order that they may be enabled to act upon the bills that have been referred to them.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was not that transcript made before the committees of this House were appointed?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No, sir; not as I understand the matter.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that it was.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to answer every question that may be propounded to me in regard to every particular document—I am not apologizing and making excuses for the Public Printer. He needs none.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. While I am upon the floor, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say this in addition——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yielded to the gentleman for a question. I did not suppose he was going to make a speech. As I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, I can not answer now as to every particular piece of printing which gentlemen may make inquiry about, but I undertake to say that the Public Printer, in the communication which we have before us, has answered satisfactorily and conclusively every inquiry addressed to him; and if gentlemen have other inquiries which they desire to make, he challenges and invites the most complete and scrutinizing investigation into his office and will be prepared to give a satisfactory answer to every inquiry that may be made by this House.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry in regard to the matter in hand?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I wish to ask the gentleman if there is not a large amount of printing which has been ordered by the Smithsonian Institution, and which is to be paid for, or paid for to a large extent, out of the Smithsonian fund, and I wish to ask him whether that printing is not more than two years behind. I understand that some of the publications have become almost valueless on account of the delay, and I want to ask why it is that those publications have not been printed sooner, and why the printers and binders who have been discharged were not employed upon that Smithsonian work, payment for which is provided for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman I can only repeat that I am not prepared to give specific answer at this time in regard to every job of work in the Government Printing Office, and I am not prepared to answer his question; but I have no doubt that the Public Printer will give him a satisfactory answer, and I can only add if this particular piece of work is over two years behind, as the gentleman affirms, then it was in the hands of the late Public Printer, the immediate predecessor of the present incumbent, and the work of printing it should have been done by that officer. I know very many such jobs were brought over in this way.

But that question is not involved in this inquiry and is not pertinent to it. I desire, however, to say that if the gentleman had paid attention to this report and to the remarks which I have submitted upon it he would have seen that the Public Printer on the 31st of December last had exhausted every dollar given him by Congress, and therefore he could not have employed any more hands than were employed or have done any more work than he did up to that date. I desire to emphasize the fact that at that time this Congress had not given him the amount of money that he asked for. He asked of the Committee on Appropriations and of Congress $159,000 more than was appropriated to do the public printing. When Congress in its wisdom declined to give him this amount he consumed all the money that was available up to that time, and in doing so did all the work that he could do with the amount of money allowed him. I think this answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to make a proposition. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, has manifestly had access to this report before its presentation, while others here have had no opportunity to compare its statements of facts with their opinions and knowledge, would not the gentleman be willing that the consideration of this question be postponed until some other day—to-morrow, perhaps—so as to give us an opportunity for examination of the matter, that we may be prepared to meet any statements which we think erroneous, and to submit any remarks in relation thereto which we may deem proper. My friend from Tennessee can hardly expect us to be ready now to meet this array of figures and propositions which we have had no opportunity to examine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I will say that I see no objection to his very respectful request; and, so far as I am concerned, I am willing that this question may go over.

I was almost through with what I desired to say; and after I have called attention to some facts in connection with this report, I will make a request such as the gentleman from Ohio has indicated, in order to enable gentlemen on the other side of the House and on this side to examine the statements which the Public Printer presents and in order to have the case fully understood by the country. The Public Printer courts the fullest investigation.

I undertake to say for this officer, upon the hasty examination I have been able to make into the affairs of his department, that he has done from 20 to 40 per cent. more work within a given period of time than any of his predecessors, and with less money and a smaller force of nearly three hundred.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Does the gentleman understand that this is a question as to whether this Public Printer has done more or less work than other Public Printers?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; I do not understand any such thing.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The line of the gentleman's argument seems to be based simply upon comparisons with the work done by other Public Printers. But such comparisons are no answer to the claim made by members of this House that this Public Printer is delaying the work of Congress and the country in reference to the printing of reports which Congress requires. The fact remains in spite of the comparisons which the gentleman makes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The report shows, as I have stated, that with less money this officer has done more work than has ever been done before by any Public Printer. If it be necessary, let Congress give him more money, and then he will be able to do the increased volume of work which is piled upon him by both Houses of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to get back to this report. I was showing when the interruptions began the output of the press-room. I had shown that of these jobs on printed forms there were 933 more in the first forty-five days of this Congress than in the first forty-five days of the Forty-ninth Congress. In addition to that there was an increase of 4,758 tokens, as they are called, this increase in tokens representing 2,379,000 more of printed sheets passing through the presses of that office in the first forty-five days of this Congress than in the same number of days in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Take one other matter. The amount of paper used will illustrate again the increase of work there. In paper alone there has been in the first fiscal year of the incumbency of the present Printer an increase in consumption of 270,420 pounds of printing paper and 88,877 pounds of writing paper.

One other fact. This Public Printer came into office in the month of September, 1886, nearly two months after the adjournment of the long session of Congress in that year. He then found on the rolls of his department 2,420 employés. What was the number at the end of sixty days after the adjournment of the last session of Congress? There were then on the roll only 2,000 men, a difference of 420 employés, illustrating the idea I am attempting to enforce, that with 2,000 men this Public Printer has done more work than could possibly be done, as it seems, in former administrations with over 2,400.

As to some reforms he instituted here, it will not be out of order for me to take a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If the Public Printer is doing such an immense amount of work, and doing it so well, will the gentleman from Tennessee be kind enough to move a committee of five members of the House be appointed by the Chair with power to examine employés, etc., and make this investigation? I for one would prefer to take the report of a committee appointed by this House than the ex parte statement of the Public Printer or his apologists on this floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman's inquiry is not pertinent to this report. If, when we conclude the consideration of this report, that gentleman or any other gentleman on that side of the House or upon this side desires the appointment made of such a committee, I think I can say he will have no objection on this side. We agree to that investigation. We only insist on one thing——

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Just wait one moment. The only thing we shall insist on is that the investigation shall extend to former administrations of that office.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will remember this remark if he is speaking for his party. He desires to make this a party issue.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not yield to the gentleman any longer. The other side have made this a party question from the beginning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other day when this question was under consideration, and the House declined to recommit the report of the Committee on Printing then pending before it on his motio., in order that we might have a further investigation of other matters representing the Committee on Printing, I did then say, and I was speaking for some members on this side, to the gentleman, if he would permit that report to be adopted without objection this side of the House would withdraw all opposition to any investigation demanded by his resolution then pending; but he declined the offer I made.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. One moment. Did not the gentleman know that his entire party voted against that, and that the members upon that side of the House claimed it was a party issue when I disclaimed it to be anything of the kind? Did not he know, further, that so far as any objection has been raised upon this floor from the Republican side, it has been raised on account of the gross sin of neglect by the Public Printer to furnish us with reports and papers necessary to carry on the public business?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not yield any further; but I deny this.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Some members on that side sought to make it a party issue. They can not make it a party issue unless they father the shortcomings of the Public Printer. [Cries of "Order!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman well understands this side of the House did not decline any investigation. I did not decline any the other day and do not decline any now.

I now wish to put on record a denial of the charge that the Public Printing department is not furnishing reports and bills as rapidly as they were ever furnished before. I know one gentleman on that side of the House, who arose in his place in the House on January 16, I will not call any names, who gave the number of the bill which he said he wanted for a week and had been unable to get it. I wish to say further, that gentleman when he is called upon to speak to the House will say, and I intend to ask him to do so before I yield the floor, that the bill which he said could not be obtained from the Printing Office had been for nearly a week in the document-room of the House. And most likely that is the case with a good many similar complaints that have been made. If gentlemen will inquire specifically in any case at any time of the Public Printer where delay is alleged, in my judgment he will get a satisfactory answer in reference to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one more contrast and then I am through. I wish to call attention to some facts indicating some reforms which this efficient officer has put into practice. It may not be known, and I mention this fact, that all contracts for the Government Printing Office are made by the members of the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses of Congress, but the Public Printer is authorized to purchase, in his discretion, in the open market, ink, roller composition, and oil.

I wish to give some facts in reference to the purchase by the Public Printer of ink, and I ask your attention to it for a moment.

During the fiscal year of 1885, 23,004 pounds of printing ink were purchased at an average price of 51.9 cents per pound. In 1886, under the old administration, there were purchased 26,501 pounds at an average cost of 66.17 cents per pound. The price in one case was 51.9 and in the other 66.17 cents per pound.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman state the price at the different times?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under the present administration this officer purchased 16,879 pounds of printing ink at an average cost of 24.85 cents per pound.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman tell the price of that at the several times indicated by him?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, I want to know how it is that under a former administration of that department printer's ink cost 51 cents a pound for one year, and the next year 66 cents a pound, and under the present incumbent only 24 cents and a fraction a pound. Gentlemen talk of an investigation. Now, if you want an investigation, I say that as far as I am concerned, and so far as this side of the House is concerned, it can be had, and I would like to see these facts explained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question now?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman has stated that under a former administration the Public Printer paid in one year for ink 66 cents a pound, and 51 cents another year, while at present they are getting it at about 24 cents a pound. Does the gentleman not know that butter may be worth 25 cents a pound one year and only 20 cents the next? That being the case, should the gentleman not, in justice, give us the benefit of the market price of printer's ink prevailing at the time to which he alludes?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have stated distinctly that in 1885 the Public Printer paid 51 cents a pound for ink, and in 1886 he paid 66 cents a pound. I am calling attention to the fact that the present incumbent has purchased ink at only about 24 cents per pound.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the same quality of ink?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; I presume so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the gentleman know the fact?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It may not be the same quality, but in answer to the gentleman I can say that it is represented here to be just as good, and by some persons thought to be better. The Public Printer says it is better, as I will show later on.

But that is not all. Take the article of roller composition, for the purchase of which the Public Printer has discretion in buying.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me interrupt the gentleman further.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman admits that he is not a practical printer. That was scarcely necessary, for it is evident to those who are practical printers that he is not.

Next he admits that this ink which was purchased at different prices may be of different qualities; that fact he does not know. Now I want to ask the gentleman this question. He says the Public Printer is performing the same amount of work, or more work, than a former administration, which was considered an admirable one, under Mr. Rounds, with 400 men less than Mr. Rounds had. That being the case, I want to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, at the end of this session of Congress there will be 400 men less on the rolls of the Printing Office than there were at the close of the long session of the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can only say in answer to the gentleman that I do not propose to enter into the field of prophecy. I do not know. But I do say to him that forty or sixty days after the adjournment of the last short session of Congress—and that is a fair comparison—there were then nearly four hundred less persons employed than when Mr. Rounds turned this office over to the present incumbent forty to sixty days after the adjournment of Congress in 1886. Not only that, but the record shows—and I did not want to go into that, but if gentlemen desire it we are ready—the record shows that of that 2,420 persons employed there, nearly 200, or to be as nearly exact as I can, about 145 of them were put there in the thirty or forty days immediately preceding the time that the Printing Office was turned over to the present incumbent. A man need not be a practical printer to see these things.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee believe honestly that the places of the men discharged will be filled within the present session or before it expires?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not answer the gentleman. I have said I can not go into the question of speculation or prophecy. I hope so, I will answer him, if the public necessity requires it and if there is money to pay them and work to be done, and I trust the new appointees will all be good Democrats.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, a good many good Republicans were dismissed to make room for just that many good Democrats.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, upon the question of roller composition, for I do not want to get away from that. In 1886 the former incumbent of this place used 13,900 pounds of roller composition, for which he paid 45 cents a pound. The present incumbent during the year 1887 paid but 26 cents per pound for roller composition, or a difference of price as between 45 and 26 cents, saving in that period $3,427 in that one item.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will.

Mr. CANNON. I did not intend to ask permission to say anything touching this question at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suspend the public business until order is restored upon the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I did not intend to open my mouth in this discussion, but I think it is just and proper to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to state that I was acquainted, and well acquainted, with the late Public Printer, Mr. Rounds. I believe him to have been an honest man. He had the reputation of being a very competent Public Printer. He was a citizen of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. But when the gentleman states that he paid for ink 50 or 60 cents a pound during the term of his office, and the present Public Printer pays but 20 to 30 cents a pound, in view of the fact as I am told by practical printers that this ink varies in value from $32 a pound down to 10 cents, and in view of the further fact that roller composition varies in price greatly according to its quality, I do feel called upon to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it quite fair to make this statement unless he is able to state that the material which the present Public Printer is purchasing in the markets of the country is of the same value and quality as that used by the former Public Printer, or if a similar material of equal value, and no greater, was purchased at a higher price by the late Public Printer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to be perfectly fair to the gentleman who held this office formerly, and I have not attempted to refer to him by name. It is far from my purpose to reflect on him in any way. What I have referred to is simply a part of the public records of this office.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to what he will find in regard to the purchase of ink in the report of the Public Printer on page 9. The facts I have stated are there set forth substantially; and the gentleman will find that after the Public Printer has given the result of his purchases he uses these words:

> I will add that under my administration all the ink has been purchased from first-class makers only, under positive guaranties as to quality, and that it has done more work and better work than the ink previously used and with a great saving of time and labor in use.

And he saved in the year 1887, as compared with the year 1885, taking the two short sessions of Congress for comparison, in this one item of printing-ink $12,306.52.

I repeat that I do not reflect on anybody, but simply give these figures for what they show.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman will bear with me when I say that the Public Printer, assiduously blowing his own horn in that report, as he always does——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a speech.

Mr. CANNON. I merely wanted to vindicate a dead public officer against the assaults and innuendoes which have been thrown out against him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield to the gentleman when I have completed what I have to say, but I deny that I make any assault or use any innuendoes. I give the facts and the figures.

I will close by referring to the only other article which the Public Printer can buy in the public market—the article of oil. The purchase of this article was made at 50 per cent. less than in the former administration, as shown in the Public Printer's report.

Mr. CANNON. Of the same quality?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Public Printer says "that it has done more work and better work than the oil previously used, and at a great saving of time and labor in its use."

Mr. REED. Not as fast.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And when this amount of money is saved there should be no complaint about it, as it occurs to me.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have only a few minutes more, and I can not yield to the gentleman at this time.

A portion of the inquiry addressed to the Public Printer is in reference to the discharge of ex-soldiers and sailors. Upon this point his answer is equally explicit.

As regards soldiers who have served the country and been honorably discharged, the Public Printer shows that for the first time in the history of his office the roll-book bears a record of every person entitled to protection under the law which gives preference in appointment or exemption from discharge for reason of service in the United States Army. He shows that the records of the office have never shown the list of widows and orphans of those honorably discharged soldiers who are there employed, and who are entitled to some exemption under the law, but that record is to-day on file and is open to inspection.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not time to yield.

Mr. WARNER. I merely wish to ask whether any other executive officer of the Government can truthfully say that he has complied with section 1754 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That record is there and this Public Printer challenges an investigation into the facts; and it will be found, so the Public Printer claims, that there are more soldiers and widows and orphans of discharged soldiers there than ever before. In this connection I desire to have read an article, a very brief one, from Mrs. Elizabeth C. Montis, chairman of the employment committee of the relief board of the Grand Army of the Republic, which was printed in the Capital of yesterday, a newspaper of this city. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"THE CAMPAIGN SCREW."

To the Editor:

SIR: I do not wish to make any defense of the Government Printer, as that is not necessary. A reporter in Monday's Republican, January 16, published under the above title an article about the conduct of the Government Printing Office that was so entirely "off" as to facts that the writer of this feels sure no journal of any reputation would have published it unless laboring under an entire misapprehension. The contents of that article have been already aired sufficiently by the press of this city and satisfactorily replied to also, both in the debates of the House and other quarters, so as to make it unnecessary to say more here than that your correspondent knows and can prove that the statement as to the assessment of women is entirely false. The object of this article is to inform the public of certain other matters that have not as yet been made known to them, namely, improvements carried out there, that have elevated the office to the same standard of other Government institutions. The place is now kept clean at least, Mr. Benedict having employed charwomen for that purpose, something that was never done before. These women are paid at the rate of $30 per month by this so-called "Screw," while those in the Treasury Department receive only $20. In short, the whole place, as far as the means at the disposal of the Public Printer would permit, has been put on a par with other offices, the aim of Mr. Benedict being to elevate his subordinates morally and esthetically.

I am chairman of the employment committee of the women's relief corps of the Grand Army of the Republic, and by direction of that organization it has been my business to seek employment for those connected with them—widows and orphans of soldiers. He has responded in the most emphatic and satisfactory manner, not with promises but by immediate and actual appointments of more than a score up to the present time, with more readiness and kindness, too, than any other Government official whom I have yet approached. The question of politics was never raised by him either. Once or twice when I said "the applicant was a Democrat," he replied that "it was of no consequence;" he did what he "could for the soldiers, not for them as Democrats or otherwise." Instead of oppressing the women in his office, he has always tried to protect them in every way he can. Of course there is hard work to be done and he can only pay according to the money allowed, but he can secure them from impertinence and abuse, which he is always ready to do when informed of anything wrong. I have often gone to him for women whom I have secured appointments for, when they complained of injustice from his subordinate officers, and he always immediately instituted inquiry and remedied the evil.

In justice to this friend of the soldier and this good and just man I respectfully ask space in your paper for these statements, for which I make myself responsible by my own observation as positive facts.

ELIZABETH C. MONTIS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, I am perfectly willing, instead of insisting on the previous question on the motion to refer this report to the Committee on Printing and have it printed, to allow it to go over as long as the gentleman desires; and when it is again called up I am willing he should have the floor to submit any remarks he may deem necessary, or that any other gentleman may do so. We shrink from no investigation of this office and its management under the present incumbent. I now yield the floor.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question; whether he will yield the floor at the proper time for a motion to appoint a committee to investigate the condition of the Government Printing Office?

Mr. CUTCHEON. As the introducer of this resolution, I desire to say a few words in regard to the circumstances of its introduction, and also in regard to the reply which the Public Printer has made to the request of the House. A week ago last night a man called at my rooms saying that he had known me in the Army; that he had served in the same brigade with me in several campaigns, although I did not know him; that the night before he had been discharged from the Public Printing establishment with some sixty-eight or sixty-nine others, discharged or furloughed, turned into the street in the dead of winter without anything to do.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Michigan please give the name of this gentleman who called on him?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have the name, and will produce it if necessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like the gentleman to give the name.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not care to give it at the present time. He requested me, in behalf of himself and of these sixty and odd other employés who had just been discharged, to introduce a resolution in the House asking the Public Printer to state why he had discharged these employés at this season of the year without assigning to them any reason whatsoever. They had been simply notified, this gentleman informed me, that their services were no longer required, and they had been turned out of doors without any reason being assigned for their discharge.

It seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, a singular procedure; singular, in the first place, that the Public Printer should have selected for making this discharge the dead of winter, when he must have known, as we all know, that it is exceedingly difficult for a workingman or a working-woman to get a new situation.

It seemed to me singular, in the second place, that it should be done at a time when I knew, when every gentleman upon this floor knew, that the printing ordered by this House was largely in arrears, because, Mr. Speaker, I knew, and we all knew, that more than a thousand bills that had been introduced in this House a week before had not yet come to the file-room; we knew that we had not yet received the first complete copy of the Congressional Directory for this session, although nearly sixty days had elapsed from the time of our assembling; we also knew that the rules of the House, which we had amended weeks before, had not been returned to us, and have not yet been returned, so that we are not even now able to inspect the amended rules under which we are acting; we knew also that of all the pending bills we had not a report upon a single one printed in time for inspection before acting upon the bill to which it related.

Mr. REED. But the Printer has spent much less for ink than his predecessor spent. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, the Printer has paid much less for ink. When the contested-election case of Thobe against Carlisle came up in this House, although we were informed by the chairman of the Committee on Elections that the report had been mailed the evening previous, yet we had had no opportunity to examine the report of the committee upon that important case when we were required to go into the debate and to vote upon the question. Nor was that all, Mr. Speaker. Other important printing ordered for some of the leading committees of this House—the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, for instance—and the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, as has been stated by a member of the House to-day, had not been furnished, and have not yet been furnished to this House, so as to enable those committees to go on with the public business that has been referred to them. For these reasons I introduced this resolution, asking three pointed questions. The first was, whether the Public Printer had discharged these sixty and odd employés at this season of the year. The second was why he had done it, if he had done it; and, in the third place, I asked whether he had duly regarded section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, which requires a preference in the public service to be given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Union.

I have listened with deep interest and profound attention to this last dying speech and confession of the Public Printer which has been read here to-day, in which he tells us everything under heaven except what we want to know. He tells us, however, that he has discharged these employés, more than sixty in number, in the middle of this month of January; that he has sent these workingmen and working-women out into the world at this trying season to shift for themselves, when we all know how difficult it is for any one to get a new situation, particularly if he has been discharged from a public office, and more especially hard for the old soldiers. The Public Printer tells us that he has duly regarded the statute which requires a preference to be given to discharged soldiers and sailors of the Republic, and yet I have no reason to doubt that the gentleman to whom I have referred, who came to me and stated that he had served in the same brigade with me in the war, told the truth when he said that he had been dismissed without any reason assigned. Since this debate commenced, I have received a copy of a notice which I am assured, on the authority of an eye-witness, was posted in the Public Printing Office, in the room from which these employés were discharged, on the Monday following their discharge. This is the notice:

NOTICE.

The persons discharged on Saturday were removed for loud and boisterous talking during working hours. An observer is on the floor. Those discharged hereafter will know the reason of their dismissal.

I can not vouch for the correctness of this, but I am assured on the authority of one who claims to have seen it that it is an exact copy of a notice which was posted in the Public Printing Office.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not a political question. I protest against its being made a political question. It is a question of the privileges of the members of this House and of the rights of the honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of this country. It is a question of the rights and privileges of this House, because when we order public printing to be done it is our right that it shall be done with such reasonable promptness and expedition that the business of the House and of the country may be transacted in due course. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that of all times when the Public Printer should have exercised his discretion (if he had any discretion) in regard to the discharge of employés, it was the most unfortunate time for him to have exercised it in this way when the House of Representatives was waiting for him to print important public documents in order that it might proceed with the public business. The time was unfortunate for another reason. It was most unfortunate that this discharge of employés should have been made in the very week when this House refused to open the case of Mr. Thobe, of Kentucky; refused him the investigation which he asked. He claimed to have been elected a member of this House by the workingmen of his district, and it was most unfortunate, I say, that in the same week when the House declined to investigate that claim of a representative workingman these sixty workingmen and working-women should have been discharged from the great Government Printing Office of this country and turned out into the streets of Washington, many of them without any means of subsistence.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will, as he has promised to do, come forward and tender to us a full, free, and complete investigation of the conduct of the Public Printing Office, so that we may know why it is that at this Congress we have waited, as we have never waited before since I have been a member of this House, for documents that we need, for the Congressional Directory, for the Rules and Manual, for the reports upon our bills, for the documents that go to various committees, documents upon which they must act if they act at all. Let us know why the Public Printer has told us almost everything else in the world about the past and the present—has gone into ancient history, so that we have had ancient history to a surfeit—but we have not yet learned why he selected the middle of January—the coldest month almost ever known in the city of Washington—to turn these seventy working men and women into the streets. For my part, I would like to know some better reason for this than has yet been stated. I do not care how much more paper has been used than the last Public Printer used in a given time. I do not care just now about the comparative prices of ink or of roller composition. Just now I would like to know why Public Printer Benedict selected the middle of January to turn these seventy working men and women into the streets, thus putting a fitting climax to the refusal of this House to investigate the election of the first man in this country who ever claimed to be elected as the Labor candidate upon a Labor ticket.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have this question lie over, so that we may have the same opportunity for investigation that the gentleman from Tennessee has had, for it is evident that he has had the benefit of this report. He comes here with his mouth full of figures and his hands full of documents. We have not had any such advantages. Therefore I would be glad to have this answer of the Public Printer lie over until we can make the necessary examinations and comparisons, so that we may be able to comment on it understandingly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman whether, when he stated some three weeks ago that he had called for a bill——

Mr. CUTCHEON. I intended to make that statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will make it in justice to the Public Printer.

Mr. CUTCHEON. As a matter of personal explanation, I will say that when the question of the administration of the Public Printer was before this House a week or two ago, I made a statement that bill No. 1559, introduced by me, had been sought by me in vain in the document-room and in the Clerk's file-room; that I was assured it had not come from the Public Printer, and the reason was that other bills of far later number had been made special and had been printed. The following day a copy of the bill was brought to me. I will say, however, Mr. Speaker, that when I went to the Clerk's file-room, the clerk in charge referred to his register and found that he had no record of the return of that bill from the Public Printer, and assured me as an official of this House that it had not been returned from the Public Printer. It was upon his information to me that I made my statement. It turned out, however, that the bill had come from the Public Printer, and I was assured by the messenger who brought it to me that it was tied up with tape with another bill, not separated from it, and therefore in the search, repeated no less than half a dozen times, my bill had been overlooked each time, so that the fault lay not with the Public Printer, but with some official of this House. To that extent I desire, not to correct my statement, because I stated correctly the information given to me at the time, but to give what appear to have been the actual facts of the case.

Mr. Speaker, other gentlemen have asked me to yield a portion of my time. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have not been investigating this matter, but some facts have come to my knowledge which I think may properly be added to what has been said here on both sides.

In the first place, I want to say that I do not believe the statement which has just been made on this floor, and which was made during the campaign last fall, that there are now more soldiers in the Government Printing Office than there were under Republican administrations.

A MEMBER. You mean Union soldiers.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Union soldiers. I deny the statement; and I am not going to be content with a general averment coming from the Government Printer. I do not want to have that statement go to the country without a flat denial. Now give us the proof. The Government Printer is wonderfully silent when it comes to giving the facts, the names, the data to establish his general declaration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I can not give him the names——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, of course you can not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Because the Public Printer states that the records of the Printing Office do not show entered upon them the names of the soldiers under former administrations.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then if those facts are not shown, how do gentlemen know what they so glibly tell us? It is false. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now let me tell the gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Wait a minute. You would not hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for a single moment when we offered to extend your time and when you were hammering and blackening the name of a dead and efficient public officer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I deny it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me have a word to say. I will not yield a moment to you.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word as to what I know. Only a short time ago a lady came to my hotel in Washington with a card of introduction—[laughter on the Democratic side]—oh, yes, sneer if you will because the widow of a dead comrade visits me! [Applause on the Republican side.] Sneer away! [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] It is a fine thing to applaud over, is it not? [Applause on the Republican side.] A lady came to me—you may not be able to make that statement, all of you. [Laughter.] She came to me and told me that she was the widow of a dead soldier who entered the Army from my own city of Dubuque; that she was in this city with two children, one a young man and the other a young lady. The young lady came with her mother to my hotel. Here, gentlemen, if you want to, you can applaud again. [Laughter.] She told me this little boy—a young man who had been in the Government Printer's employ—had been suddenly dropped from the roll and his place filled from that great fountain of Democratic officials, Baltimore—[laughter and applause]—by one of the nimble fingers of the Democratic leader of that city; that this child of the dead Union soldier had been kicked out of office and his place filled from the city of Baltimore.

Mr. COMPTON and many others. What was his name?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Who wants to know his name? [Applause.]

Mr. COMPTON. I do.

Several MEMBERS. We all do.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes, you all want to know it very badly, do you not? [Laughter and applause.] Well, give us the investigation we ask and we will give you the names. [Laughter and applause.] As gentlemen we promise you to do that. [Laughter.] My word is as good as Mr. Benedict's, or any other gentleman on that side; if not, I will make it good.

Mr. COMPTON. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I can not do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. When I get through my own sermon I will let the gentleman have his say, if he is uneasy about Baltimore. [Laughter.]

Mr. COMPTON. The gentleman need not worry about Baltimore; she can take care of herself here and everywhere else and turn up Democratic every time. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This lady told me the young lady, her daughter, had been in the employ of the Treasury Department, and that these two, on very petty salaries, had enabled this little fatherless family to live; but that both had been discharged almost at the same time. The young lady appealed to be retained for the sake of her poor mother and her family. The gentleman who discharged her—I will not give the name now, but I can give it—told her she had no recommendation but her efficiency, which was not disputed, but that they wanted men in there who could serve the Democratic party and use money in its interest, if need be. I can give the gentleman's name, if it is necessary.

Mr. WISE. Give it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Not now. But, Mr. Speaker, both of these children were dropped from the roll, and in the depth of winter they are left without means of support. And I stand here and proclaim that it is not in the power of myself or any Republican representative of the people to secure the pettiest place in Washington, even in the Government Printing Office, to save the widow of a dead Union soldier from starvation. So help me God, I speak the truth!

Mr. PERKINS. And they say that is good on that side of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Ask to make up a contribution, and they will not starve.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am not surprised that sneers should follow this declaration. It might be a trifling matter to the gentleman from Florida, but they are facts that are sinking deep into the hearts of the people of the country.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. It is a matter of importance when he states a young lady discharged from public office is about to starve. I desire merely to say that before she should starve, if the case were known, contributions would be made to prevent it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not yield. I have no doubt that the generous gentleman might be induced to save her from starvation, but your party stand like a mailed citadel against this class so that no Union Republican representative can get the pettiest office for the widow or children of a Union soldier who are in danger of starvation.

That is your reform, gentlemen. Cover it over with printer's ink if you will, but you can not wipe out the current facts of history.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I will say again, as I did a little while ago, not then in my own time, that I did not intend to say a word touching this resolution, nor would I now were it not that the Public Printer, in the report as read from by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and apparently quoted with the approval of that gentleman, does seek, as it occurred to me, to cast reflections upon the character of a former Public Printer as to his integrity.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not understand me as assenting to that statement. I did not intend to do anything of the kind.

Mr. CANNON. Then I may say I have nothing more to add.

Mr. PERKINS. What was the object of the statement, then?

Mr. CANNON. That is a very pertinent question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What does the gentleman ask?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Kansas asks, if that was not your intention what was the object of the statement?

Mr. RICHARDSON. My object, Mr. Speaker, was to give to the House and to the country the facts as they are presented, but to make no reflection upon anybody. I am willing to be governed by the facts.

Mr. CANNON. Well, then, if the Public Printer, by innuendo, seeks to make that impression upon the House and the country, I want to make this statement: That with the craft in the United States, with all printers and experts, the reputation of the late S. P. Rounds as an honest man, a man of integrity, and a competent man in his business, is well known, and by that reputation Mr. Rounds's family and friends can well afford to stand. I want to say, further, not being a printer or an expert, that in so far as the present Public Printer seeks by an uncandid statement to convey the impression that he bought the same ink, and as valuable ink, at 26 cents a pound as his predecessor, Mr. Rounds, bought, and for which he paid 50 or 60 cents a pound—that in so far as he seeks to convey that impression, I will assume the responsibility of giving my opinion, at least, that he undertakes to cast a suspicion on the integrity of the deceased.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He not only undertakes to do it, but actually does it.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that the impression sought to be conveyed in the report, the impression made upon me at least from the report, was clear in that regard; and for that reason I asked the gentleman from Michigan to yield a moment to me for the purpose of making this statement.

I do not believe Mr. Rounds paid for ink at the time he purchased it 25 or 30 cents a pound, or any other sum more than the market price. As to the exercise of a sound discretion in the quality of ink and other material used in the public printing, I am quite willing for one that the work done under the supervision of the late Public Printer, Mr. Rounds, should be compared with that done under the supervision of the present Public Printer.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, there was read here a letter, sent up to the Clerk's desk by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], purporting to be a communication from the chairman or chairwoman of some committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, in general terms stating that she, the writer, had received kind treatment at the hands of the Public Printer. It was sent to the Clerk's desk and read, I imagine, for some purpose, and I want to say that if it is intended to convey the impression that this lady has secured the appointment of any considerable number of the orphans or widows of Union soldiers in the Public Printing department of this Government, the facts do not by any means justify the statement.

She has been, as I am fully informed, connected with the employment bureau of the Grand Army of the Republic only during the current year, 1888. She has come into the business therefore as a novice, and she has not been driven out of the Public Printing Office; the recital of which fact is the sum total of her utterance. But she herself has come to members upon this floor, and to myself among the rest, and asked us to appeal in the name of the Grand Army of the Republic to the Public Printer to have reinstated soldiers' and sailors' widows who have been turned out of that same office. For some reason best known to herself she publishes there, as a part of the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, this letter containing a general statement that she has been more kindly treated by the present Government Printer than by any other person occupying that position, when I know, and state here on my credit, as a matter of fact, that she has had nothing to do with the organization with which she is now connected until during the present year.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is she employed now in the office?

Mr. GROSVENOR. She is not, as I understand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. She never was.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And never was. Her husband was an employé of the Treasury Department. I knew him for many years. He died some two years ago. His widow, the lady in question, has not been rudely treated at the office, and writes a letter which contains no other statement of fact worthy of consideration as bearing upon the question here presented.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I understood from the reading of the communication of the Public Printer which was read awhile ago, that these employés were turned out of the Government Printing Office because there were no longer any funds at the command of the Public Printer with which to pay them and no longer any work for them to do. Only a few days ago I went to the Smithsonian Institution to make inquiry in regard to certain publications which some of my constituents greatly desired, and I was informed by the Secretary of that Institution that some of their publications, which had been in the hands of the Public Printer for more than two years, were not yet printed and probably would not be for some time to come. The publications of the Smithsonian Institution are valuable works and are greatly sought after by certain classes of people. They look forward with great anxiety to the time when they are ready for distribution, and it is certainly a misfortune to have their publication so long delayed.

I also understand, if I have been correctly informed, that the money with which these books are to be published comes from the Smithsonian fund, not from the ordinary appropriation of this House, and if this be true I am unable to understand why men and women should be turned out in midwinter when there is abundance of work for them to do in the Government Printing Office, for which there is made ample provision so far as the money is concerned.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No, sir; I only have a few moments. I understand that some of these publications have been in the hands of the Public Printer for more than two years and are not yet published. And I further understand that the character of some of them is such that the works when printed will be substantially worthless, simply because they were not published at the time they were prepared. These books, furnished to the Government Printing Office in 1885, will probably be distributed in 1888, and the object of their publication will be defeated and their usefulness will amount to very little on account of this long delay.

If that be true, as I said before, I can not see why it is that sixty men and women should be discharged in midwinter when there was abundance of work in the office to be done, and when the money to pay for doing the work was to come from the funds of the Smithsonian Institution. If I am correctly informed in regard to this matter, I can see no reason for the course of the Public Printer. I have understood all the while that the Government Printing Office is about two years behind, and if there is not money enough appropriated to do the work it certainly ought to be appropriated, and the work ought to be done.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAIDLAW].

Mr. LAIDLAW. I desire to state a fact in connection with this matter that came to my knowledge the other day. A lady out in the lobby sent to my seat a card, which I now hold in my hand. I went out, following the messenger until I found the lady. She told me she was from my district; that she had been in the employ of the Public Printing Office for four or five years; that the small salary she there received gave her her living; that her mother was dependent on her; that they were residing here in a small house; and she asked me if I could do anything, with a view to getting her back into the situation where she had been trying to support herself as best she could. It appears she has been put out of the office at this inclement season of the year with a house on her hands which she rents at some $20 a month. It appears she is turned out by this great Government without rhyme or reason, except that the money is all gone. I say that is no excuse at all. Every reasonable, sensible man knows that the places of these people now discharged will be filled in the near future by other people.

All I have to say is that we ought to live up to our professions and our promises. I remember to have read years ago what Corporal Trim said about a man's honoring his parents. His idea about honoring his father and mother was to give them 3 pence a day out of his pay when they were old. Better than by resolutions we can honor the dead soldier by giving employment, with some substantial pay for it, to his widow. That is the best kind of honor we can give to the soldier.

I am a new member, and I think I have now said about enough. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You have done first rate. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. The Public Printer has given us a somewhat lengthy document here containing something that is pertinent to the inquiry, and a very great deal that is very impertinent to the inquiry.

We have his reply. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a report of a committee of this House upon certain definite propositions. We know certain things, and we know them somewhat sadly, too. We know, for instance, that the eulogies delivered in this Hall almost a year ago upon General John A. Logan have not yet come to the document-room or the folding-room of this House; and on inquiry we are informed they can not even give us a surmise when they will be delivered. The same is the case with the eulogies on Senator Miller, delivered even before that.

We know we have not yet got our revision of the rules; we know we have not got the reports of the engineers; we have not got various other documents which we ought to have and which are necessary for the procedure of this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the resolution which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker pro tempore to investigate and report upon the management of the Public Printing Office, and to report upon the causes of the delay in furnishing necessary documents ordered by the House; also whether section 1754 of the Revised Statutes has been duly observed in making appointments to and dismissals from said office.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer a substitute for what has just been read.

Mr. CANNON. Before that is done let me suggest an amendment to the gentleman from Michigan. His resolution uses the expression "documents ordered by the House." I suggest that after those words be inserted "provided by law."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I accept that as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I offered mine as a substitute for the original motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out of the resolution the following words:

That a committee of five members of the House be appointed by the Speaker pro tempore to investigate and report upon the management of the Public Printing Office.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the letter of the Public Printer in answer to the resolution of the House be referred to the Committee on Printing and printed, and that the Committee on Printing be instructed to make a thorough investigation of the administration of the Government Printing Office during the incumbency of the present occupant and that of his predecessor, and to report to the House at the earliest time possible.

Mr. REED. Why are you putting in the predecessor of the Government Printer? There is no complaint about him. How will investigating a person who is dead help us to get the documents we are waiting for?

Mr. SPRINGER. The proposition is to investigate the administration of the office under the present Public Printer and his predecessor.

Mr. REED. But we are not interested in his predecessor. What we want is to get our documents quicker. Now, do not make a partisan matter of this. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no partisanship in it at all. I am always delighted to hear the gentleman from Maine on that subject. He never can understand the right of anybody else to be a partisan; but when he wants to act the partisan it is all right.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, my partisanship is of such a mild character that it is hardly to be called by that name. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. If you are going to investigate that office——

Mr. REED. What we want is to get our documents quicker.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I want to show the gentleman, by way of comparison, that he is getting them now faster than he got them under any previous Public Printer. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"] I want to show further how much more work is being done under this administration of the office than was done under the former administration, and how much less money it costs to run the Printing Office now than it cost when the former Printer was in office. I want to show also how many more honorably discharged Union soldiers are in the employ of the Printing Office to-day than there were when it was managed by a Republican. All these are important facts.

Mr. SOWDEN. And soldiers' widows and orphans.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, I want to show also, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] suggests, how many widows and orphans of soldiers of the late war there are in the office now compared with the number employed there formerly. These facts are all valuable by way of comparison. It is stated, and I understand it to be a fact—this proposed investigation will show the truth about the matter—that the commander of the Grand Army of the Republic in this city has authorized the statement since this discussion arose that there are more Union soldiers employed now in the Government Printing Office than there ever have been at any previous time, and that he is thoroughly satisfied with the present management of the office so far as the soldiers were concerned. Now I move the previous question upon the amendment.

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope we shall find out also how many soldiers from the other side there are in the office.

The previous question was ordered—ayes 137, noes 130.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

A MEMBER. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to submit a proposition to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] which will perhaps save some time. I suggest that if he will modify his amendment so as to provide for a special committee of five instead of the regular Committee on Printing——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. SPRINGER. We have a standing Committee on Printing fully competent for this work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] allow me——

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The Committee on Printing consists of only three members, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HIESTAND]. Now, if this subject is to be referred to the Committee on Printing for a searching investigation, I suggest that two members be added to that committee, one from each side of the House.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] consent to modify his amendment by simply providing that for this investigation two members be added to the standing Committee on Printing? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for, and the Chair must enforce it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] asks me whether I have any objection to adding, for the purpose of this investigation, two members to the Committee on Printing. I have not; and if unanimous consent can be given, I am willing to modify my proposition in that way. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and unanimous consent can not be given.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered. This will give my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] an opportunity to make the modification.

Mr. SPRINGER. After this question is taken, I will try to accomplish the object of my colleague.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. CANNON. I am willing to take the word of my colleague that he will accomplish the object we have in view.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will try to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Committee on Printing will not object to the proposition which has just been made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the House had better agree now to the proposition that for the purpose of this investigation two members be added to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There ought to be no objection to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to make that modification of my proposition.

Mr. WISE objected, but withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent to modify his proposition so as to provide that two members be added to the Committee on Printing for the purpose of this investigation. Is there objection to this modification? The Chair hears none.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, as modified, it was agreed to; and the substitute as thus amended was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the votes just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 4881) making an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1877, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experimental stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto," with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 191) to make an additional appropriation for printing the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late John A. Logan; and

A bill (S. 455) for the relief of Andrew J. Lindsay.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 20,000 copies of the first annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the appendices thereto, 5,000 for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House, and 5,000 for the use of the Commission; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

AGRICULTURAL-EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the House now take up the agricultural-experiment-station bill, with a view to concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4881) making an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experimental stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto."

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "the," in line 9, down to the end of the bill and insert "sum of $585,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There being no objection,

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 6183) to amend existing laws relating to imports.

Mr. McKINLEY. I demand the reading of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but before the reading was concluded,

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, said: I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this bill be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed, is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6183) to amend existing laws relating to imports.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following amendments to and provisions for existing laws shall take effect on and after the passage and approval of this act.

Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," providing a substitute for Title XXXIII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended as to certain of the sections and parts of sections or schedules in such substituted title so that they shall be as follows, respectively:

"SEC. 2499. Each and every imported article not enumerated or provided for in any schedule in this title, which is similar either in material, quality, texture, or the use to which it may be applied, to any article enumerated in this title as chargeable with duty, shall pay the same rate of duty which is levied on the enumerated article which it most resembles in any of the particulars before mentioned; and if any non-enumerated article equally resembles two or more enumerated articles on which different rates of duty are chargeable, there shall be levied on such non-enumerated article the same rate of duty as is chargeable on the article which it resembles paying the highest rate of duty; and on articles, not otherwise provided for, manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the rate at which the (dutiable) component material of chief value may be chargeable; and the words 'component material of chief value,' whenever used in this title, shall be held to mean that (dutiable) component material which shall exceed in value any other single component material found in the article; and the value of each component material shall be determined by the ascertained value of such material in its last form and condition before it became a component material of such article. If two or more rates of duty shall be applicable to any imported article, it shall pay duty at the highest of such rates: Provided, That any non-enumerated article similar in material, and quality, and texture, and the use to which it may be applied to any article on the free-list, and in the manufacture of which no dutiable materials are used, shall be free of duty."

SEC. 2502. SCHEDULE A—CHEMICAL PRODUCTS.—By striking out from this schedule the words "distilled spirits containing 50 per cent. of anhydrous alcohol, $1 per gallon;" also by striking out the words "alcohol containing 94 per cent. anhydrous alcohol, $2 per gallon."—[Tariff, paragraphs 101, 102, 103.]

SCHEDULE B—EARTHENWARE AND GLASSWARE.—The tenth clause of this schedule, relating to "green and colored glass bottles," and so forth, is hereby amended so that it shall be as follows:

"Green and colored glass bottles, vials, demijohns, and carboys (covered or uncovered), pickle or preserve jars, and other plain, molded, or pressed green and colored bottle-glass, not cut, engraved, or painted, and not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 1 cent per pound; if filled, and not otherwise in this act provided for, and the contents are subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a rate of duty based on their value, the value of such bottles, vials, or other vessels shall be added to the value of the contents for the ascertainment of the dutiable value of the latter; but if filled and not otherwise provided for, and the contents are not subject to an ad valorem duty or to a rate of duty based on their value, they shall pay a duty of 1 cent per pound in addition to the duty, if any, on their contents."—[Tariff, paragraph 133.]

The eleventh clause of this schedule, relating to "flint and lime glass bottles," and so forth, is hereby amended so that it shall be as follows:—[Tariff, paragraph 134.]

"Flint and lime glass bottles and vials, and other plain, molded, or pressed flint or lime glassware, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 40 per cent. ad valorem; if filled, and not otherwise in this act provided for, and the contents are subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a rate of duty based on their value, the value of such flint or lime glass bottles, or vials, or other vessels of like material above provided for, shall be added to the value of the contents for the ascertainment of the dutiable value of the latter; but if filled, and not otherwise provided for, and the contents are not subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a rate of duty based on their value, they shall pay a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem in addition to the duty, if any, on their contents."

SCHEDULE C—METALS.—By striking out the last clause of this schedule, relating to "manufactures, articles, or wares not specially enumerated or provided for," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Manufactures, articles, or wares not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, copper, lead, nickel, pewter, tin, zinc, gold, silver, platinum, or any other metal, and whether partly or wholly manufactured, 45 per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall affect the rate of duty hereinbefore provided for the manufactures of copper, or of which copper shall be the component of chief value."—[Tariff, paragraphs 186, 216.]

By striking out in next to the last clause of this schedule the words "mineral substances in a crude state;" so that the clause shall read as follows:

"Metals, unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem."—[Tariff, paragraph 215.]

SCHEDULE F—TOBACCO.—By striking out from this schedule the second clause, relating to "leaf-tobacco," and in lieu thereof inserting the following:

"Leaf-tobacco, of the requisite size and of the necessary fineness of texture to be suitable for wrappers, and of which more than one hundred leaves are required to weigh a pound, if not stemmed, 75 cents per pound; if stemmed, $1 per pound."—[Tariff, paragraph 246.]

SCHEDULE G—PROVISIONS.—Amend the clause relating to "rice-flour," etc. (tariff, paragraph 272), by adding after the word "rice-meal" the words "and broken rice which will pass through a sieve known commercially as No. 10 brass-wire sieve, ten meshes to the running inch or one hundred meshes to the square inch;" the space within the wires shall not exceed in length or width seven hundred and eighty-seven ten-thousandths of an inch;" so that the paragraph shall read as follows:

"Rice-flour, rice-meal, and broken rice which will pass through a sieve known commercially as No. 10 brass-wire sieve, ten meshes to the running inch or one hundred meshes to the square inch; the space within the wires shall not exceed in length or width seven hundred and eighty-seven ten-thousandths of an inch."

SCHEDULE N.—By striking out the seventh clause of this schedule, relating to "bonnets, hats, and hoods," and so forth, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Bonnets, hats, and hoods for men, women, and children, composed of hair, whalebone, or any vegetable material, and not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 30 per cent. ad valorem."—[Tariff, paragraph 400.]

By striking out the clause of this schedule commencing with the words "hats, and so forth, materials for," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Hats, materials for: Braids, plaits, flats, willow sheets and squares, fit only for use in making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, composed of straw, chip, grass, palm-leaf, willow, hair, whalebone, or any vegetable material, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem."—[Tariff, paragraph 448.]

By striking out the clause of this schedule commencing with the words "garden seeds," which clause is hereby repealed.—[Tariff, paragraph 465.]

By striking out the last clause but one of this schedule, relating to "watches," and so forth, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:—[Tariff, paragraph 494.]

"Watches, watch-cases, watch-movements, parts of watches, watch-glasses, and watch-keys, whether separately packed or otherwise, and watch materials not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

By striking out the last clause in this schedule, relating to "webbing," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Webbing composed of cotton or flax, or of a mixture of these materials, and not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 35 per cent. ad valorem."—[Tariff, paragraph 495.]

THE FREE-LIST.

SEC. 2503. [Substituted for Sec. 2505 Revised Statutes.] By striking out the clause in this section commencing with the words "articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States, when returned after having been exported, without having been advanced in value by any process of manufacture or by labor thereon; casks, barrels, carboys, bags, and other vessels of American manufacture exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, including shooks when returned as barrels or boxes; but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made, under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and if any of such articles are subject to internal tax at the time of exportation, such tax shall be proved to have been paid before exportation and not refunded: Provided, That this clause shall not include any article upon which an allowance of drawback has been made, the reimportation of which is hereby prohibited except upon payment of duties equal to the drawbacks allowed."—[Tariff, paragraphs 649a to 649d.]

Add to the clause in this section relating to "soap-stocks" so that the clause as amended will read as follows:

"Soap-stocks, fit only for use as such."—[Tariff, paragraph 790.]

Amend the clause relating to "wearing-apparel," etc. (tariff, paragraph 815), so that it shall read as follows:

"Wearing-apparel, implements, instruments, and tools of trade, occupation, or employment, professional books, and other personal effects (not merchandise) of persons arriving in the United States, not exceeding in value $500, and not intended for the use of any other person or persons, nor for sale; but this exemption shall not be constructed to include machinery or other articles imported for use in any manufacturing establishment or for sale: Provided, however, That the limitation in value above specified shall not apply to wearing-apparel and other personal effects which may have been taken from the United States to foreign countries by the persons returning therefrom; and such last-named articles shall, upon production of evidence satisfactory to the collector and to the naval officer, if any, that they have been previously exported from the United States by such persons, and have not been advanced in value or improved in condition by any process of manufacture or labor thereon since so exported, be exempt from the payment of duty: And provided further, That all articles of foreign production or manufacture which may have been once imported into the United States and subjected to the payment of duty shall, upon reimportation, if not improved in condition except by repairs, by any means, since their exportation from the United States, be entitled to exemption from duty upon their identity being established, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Theatrical scenery and actors' and actresses' wardrobes brought by theatrical managers and professional actors and actresses arriving from abroad, for their temporary use in the United States; works of art, drawings, engravings, photographic pictures, and philosophical and scientific apparatus brought by professional artists, lecturers, or scientists arriving from abroad, for use by them temporarily for exhibition and in illustration, promotion, and encouragement of art, science, or industry in the United States; and wearing-apparel and other personal effects of tourists from abroad visiting the United States, shall be admitted to free entry, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and bonds shall be given, whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the payment to the United States of such duties as may be imposed by law upon any and all such articles as shall not be exported within six months after such importation: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, extend such period for a further term of six months in cases where application therefor shall be made."

Insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Wearing-apparel, old and worn, not exceeding $100 in value, upon production of evidence satisfactory to the collector and naval officer (if any) that the same has been donated and imported in good faith for the relief or aid of indigent or needy persons residing in the United States, and not for sale."

SEC. 2. That section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," is hereby amended so that it shall be as follows:

"In all cases where imported merchandise is subject to an ad valorem rate of duty, or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, the duty shall be assessed upon the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise, at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from whence imported, and in the finished condition in which such merchandise is there bought and sold for exportation to the United States, and in which it is prepared and put up for shipment when so bought and sold, or when consigned to the United States for sale, including all costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing the same in such condition: Provided, however, That in determining the dutiable value of imported merchandise no estimate shall be made of the cost or value of such outside sacks, crates, cases, or other outer coverings as are used and as are designed to be used only in the bona fide transportation of such merchandise to the United States, nor of the actual and necessary expenses incident to the transportation of the merchandise from the place of purchase or consignment to the vessel or other vehicle in which exported to the United States, nor of commissions, marine insurance, export duties, or fees for authentication by consular officers of the United States, in case the same shall be severally stated in the invoice, and if not so stated no deduction therefor from the invoice value shall be allowed: And provided further, That if there be used for covering or holding imported merchandise which shall be free of duty any material or article designed for use other than in the bona fide transportation of such merchandise to the United States, duty shall be assessed thereon at the rate to which such material or article would be subject if imported separately; and if there be used for covering or holding imported merchandise which shall be subject to duty any material or article designed for use other than in the bona fide transportation of such merchandise to the United States, and which, if imported separately, would be subject to a higher rate of duty than the merchandise contained therein, the whole invoice shall be subject to such higher rate of duty, unless the value of the merchandise, and of the article or material covering or holding the same, shall be separately stated in the invoice, in which case the duties shall be assessed and collected on each separately, at the rates prescribed by law: And provided further, That, except as provided in this section and in section 17 of this act, duties shall not be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value of the merchandise."

SEC. 3. That section 8 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," amending section 2841 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby further amended so that said section of the Revised Statutes shall be as follows:

"SEC. 2841. Whenever merchandise imported into the United States is entered by invoice, one of the following declarations, according to the nature of the case, shall be filed with the collector of the port, at the time of entry, by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent; which declaration so filed shall be duly signed by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, before the collector, or before a notary public or other officer duly authorized by law to administer oaths and take acknowledgments, who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive such declarations and to certify to the identity of the persons making them; and every officer so designated shall file with the collector of the port a copy of his official signature and seal: Provided, That if any of the invoices or bills of lading of any merchandise imported in any one vessel, which should otherwise be embraced in said entry, have not been received at the date of the entry, the declaration may state the fact, and thereupon such merchandise of which the invoices or bills of lading are not produced shall not be included in such entry, but may be entered subsequently.

"DECLARATION OF CONSIGNEE, IMPORTER, OR AGENT.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly and truly declare that the invoice and bill of lading now presented by me to the collector of ——— are the true and only invoice and bill of lading by me received of all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported in the ———, whereof ——— ——— is master, from ———, for account of any person whomsoever for whom I am authorized to enter the same; that the said invoice and bill of lading are in the state in which they were actually received by me, and that I do not know nor believe in the existence of any other invoice or bill of lading of the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that the entry now delivered to the collector contains a just and true account of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, according to the said invoice and bill of lading; that nothing has been, on my part, nor to my knowledge on the part of any other person, concealed or suppressed, whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that the said invoice and the declaration therein are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice, or in the account now rendered of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district. And I do further solemnly and truly declare that to the best of my knowledge and belief [here insert the name and residence of the owner or owners] is [or are] the owner [or owners] of the goods, wares, and merchandise mentioned in the annexed entry; that the invoice now produced by me exhibits the actual cost [if purchased] or fair market value [if otherwise obtained], at the time or times and place or places when or where procured [as the case may be], of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, including all cost for finishing said goods, wares, and merchandise to their present condition, and no other or different discount, bounty, or drawback but such as has been actually allowed on the same.

"DECLARATION OF OWNER IN CASES WHERE MERCHANDISE HAS BEEN ACTUALLY PURCHASED.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly and truly declare that the entry now delivered by me to the collector of ——— contains a just and true account of all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported by or consigned to me, in the ———, whereof ——— ——— is master, from ———; that the invoice which I now produce contains a just and faithful account of the actual cost of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, including all cost of finishing said goods, wares, and merchandise to their present condition, and no other discount, drawback, or bounty but such as has been actually allowed on the same; that I do not know nor believe in the existence of any invoice or bill of lading other than those now produced by me, and that they are in the state in which I actually received them. And I further solemnly and truly declare that I have not in the said entry or invoice concealed or suppressed anything whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that the said invoice and the declaration thereon are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice or in the account now produced of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district.

"DECLARATION OF MANUFACTURER OR OWNER IN CASES WHERE MERCHANDISE HAS NOT BEEN ACTUALLY PURCHASED.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly and truly declare that the entry now delivered by me to the collector of ——— contains a just and true account of all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported by or consigned to me in the ———, whereof ——— ——— is master, from ———; that the said goods, wares, and merchandise were not actually bought by me, or by my agent, in the ordinary mode of bargain and sale, but that nevertheless the invoice which I now produce contains a just and faithful valuation of the same, at their fair market value, at the time or times and place or places when and where procured for my account [or for account of myself or partners]; that the said invoice contains also a just and faithful account of all the cost for finishing said goods, wares, and merchandise to their present condition, and no other discount, drawback, or bounty, but such as has been actually allowed on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; and the said invoice and the declaration thereon are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made; that I do not know nor believe in the existence of any invoice or bill of lading other than those now produced by me, and that they are in the state in which I actually received them. And I do further solemnly and truly declare that I have not in the said entry or invoice concealed or suppressed anything whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice, or in the account now produced of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district."

SEC. 4. That any person who shall knowingly make any false or untrue statement in the declarations herein provided for, or shall aid or procure the making of any such false statement as to any matter material thereto, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $2,000, and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to relieve imported merchandise from forfeiture for any cause elsewhere provided by law.

SEC. 5. That sections 2970 and 2983 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby amended so that the same shall be, respectively, as follows:

"SEC. 2970. Any merchandise deposited in bond in any public or private bonded warehouse may be withdrawn for consumption within three years from the date of original importation, on payment of the duties and charges to which it may be subject by law at the time of such withdrawal: Provided, That nothing herein shall affect or impair existing provisions of law in regard to the disposal of perishable or explosive articles."

"SEC. 2983. In no case shall there be any abatement of the duties or allowance made for any injury, damage, or deterioration sustained by any merchandise while deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse: Provided, That the duty assessed on merchandise withdrawn from any such warehouse shall be assessed on the quantity withdrawn therefrom at the time of such withdrawal; but no greater allowance for leakage or evaporation of wines, liquors, and distilled spirits shall be made than is or may be allowed by law on domestic spirits or wines in bond: And provided further, That nothing in this section as amended shall restrict or in any way affect the liability of the proprietors of bonded warehouses on their bonds: And provided further, That nothing herein shall restrain or limit the exercise of the authority conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by section 2984 of the Revised Statutes."

SEC. 6. That sections 2803 and 3058 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2803. Any baggage or personal effects arriving in the United States in transit to any foreign country may be delivered by the parties having it in charge to the collector of the proper district, to be by him retained, without the payment or exaction of any import duty, or to be forwarded by such collector to the collector of the port of departure, and to be delivered to such parties on their departure for their foreign destination, under such rules, regulations, and fees as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

"SEC. 3058. All merchandise imported into the United States shall, for the purpose of this title, be deemed and held to be the property of the person to whom the merchandise may be consigned; but the holder of any bill of lading consigned to order and properly indorsed shall be deemed the consignee thereof; and in case of the abandonment of any merchandise to the underwriters, the latter may be recognized as the consignee."

SEC. 7. That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to dispense whenever expedient with the triplicate invoices and consular certificates now required by sections 2853, 2854, and 2855 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and triplicate invoices and consular certificates shall in no case be required when the value of the merchandise shipped by any one consignor, in any one vessel, at one and the same time, does not exceed $100; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, is hereby authorized to make such general regulations in regard to invoices and consular certificates as in his judgment the public interest may require.

SEC. 8. That all fees exacted and oaths administered by officers of the customs, under or by virtue of existing laws of the United States, upon the entry of imported goods and the passing thereof through the customs, and also upon all entries of domestic goods, wares, and merchandise for exportation, be, and the same are hereby, abolished; and in case of entry of merchandise for exportation, a declaration, in lieu of an oath, shall be filed, in such form and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the penalties for false statements in such declaration provided in the fourth section of this act shall be applicable to declarations made under this section: Provided, That where such fees, under existing laws, constitute, in whole or in part, the compensation of any officer, such officer shall receive, from and after the passage of this act, a fixed sum for each year equal to the amount of such compensation received by him for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, or a proportionate amount for any part of a year.

SEC. 9. That on all articles exported on and after the passage of this act, and entitled to drawback under sections 3019, 3020, and 3021 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and under section 10 of the act of February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes," there shall be allowed a drawback equal to the duty paid on the materials named and described in said laws, without retention of any part thereof: Provided, however, That where the amount of drawback is less than $100, the fees of the United States consuls for certifying the foreign landing certificate shall not exceed 50 cents; and all provisions of law inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 10. That section 2900 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2900. The owner, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise which has been actually purchased may, at the time, and not afterward, when he shall make and verify his written entry of his merchandise, make such addition in the entry to the cost or value given in the invoice, or pro forma invoice, or statement in form of an invoice, which he shall produce with his entry, as in his opinion may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise, at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported; and the collector within whose district any merchandise, whether the same has been actually purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, may be imported or entered shall cause such actual market value or wholesale price thereof to be appraised; and if such appraised value shall exceed by 10 per cent. or more the entered value, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied and collected a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem on such appraised value. The duty shall not, however, be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value, except as elsewhere especially provided in this act."

SEC. 11. That section 2931 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2931. The decision hereinafter described, of the collector of customs at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on the tonnage of any vessel, or on any merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested in such vessel or merchandise, unless the owner, master, commander, or consignee of such vessel, in the case of duties levied on tonnage, or the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of the merchandise, in the case of duties levied on merchandise, or the costs and charges thereon, shall, within ten days after and not on any day before the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, and a statement thereof, and of the date thereof, on the original entry, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector, if dissatisfied with the aforesaid decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry, the reasons of his objection thereto, and shall also, within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment, liquidation, and statement, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, on receiving such appeal, shall forthwith call upon the collector for a report thereon; and the collector shall thereupon, if he adheres to his decision, set forth specifically and in detail to the Secretary, the reasons therefor; and the decision of the Secretary on such appeal shall be final and conclusive, and such vessel or merchandise, or costs and charges shall be liable to duty accordingly, unless suit shall be brought within ninety days after the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on such appeal, for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision on such vessel or on such merchandise, or costs and charges, or within ninety days after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the Secretary. No suit shall be begun or maintained for the recovery of any duties alleged to have been erroneously or illegally exacted until the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall have been first had on such appeal, unless the decision of the Secretary shall be delayed more than ninety days from the date of such appeal. A notice of such ascertainment, liquidation, and statement shall be posted, on the day succeeding the date thereof, in a conspicuous place in the custom-house, accessible to the public, there to remain for ten days, when it shall be removed. The fact of its having been posted shall be noted thereon, signed by the proper officer, and filed with the records of the collector's office; and posting of such notice shall be deemed and taken to be full notice to all parties interested. Whenever there shall, subject always to section 21 of the act of June 22, 1874 (chapter 391), be an amended liquidation or reliquidation, personal notice thereof, in addition to the public notice herein prescribed, shall, in the form and manner to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be given to the person or persons who shall have made the original entry; and any such amended liquidation or reliquidation shall be final and conclusive in the same manner as an original liquidation herein referred to, unless the provisions of this section shall have been complied with as to protest, appeal, and suit. And when a suit shall be brought by the United States to recover the additional duties found due on any ascertainment and liquidation thereof, and not paid, the defendant or defendants shall not be permitted to set up any plea or matter in defense excepting such as shall have been set forth in a protest and appeal made as herein prescribed."

SEC. 12. That the section of the Revised Statutes numbered 3012 shall be, and hereby is, amended by adding at the end of said section the following words:

"And there shall be attached to the said bill of particulars, when served as aforesaid, a copy of each and every such protest or notice of dissatisfaction, and of every appeal relied upon by the plaintiff or plaintiffs in said suit; and the said bill of particulars shall declare the date of liquidation."

SEC. 13. That no suit which by this act, or by any law of the United States, is permitted to be begun against a collector of customs to recover money alleged to have been illegally exacted by him on imported merchandise, shall hereafter be begun or maintained in any court of any State of the United States, but each and every such suit shall be begun in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such alleged illegal exaction shall have been made.

SEC. 14. That section 3012½ of the Revised Statutes shall be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"Whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury (first) that, in any case of unascertained or estimated duties, more money has been paid to or deposited with a collector of customs than it has been ascertained by final liquidations thereof that the law required to be paid or deposited; and also (second) whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall have decided, on an appeal to him as herein provided, that more money has been paid to or deposited with a collector of customs than the law required; and also (third) whenever any judgment shall have been recovered and entered, in any court of the United States, against a collector of customs, for duties illegally exacted by him on imported merchandise, and a certificate of probable cause shall have been entered in said suit, in compliance with the provisions and requirements of section 989 of the Revised Statutes, from which judgment the Attorney-General shall certify, in conformity with the act of March 3, 1875, (chapter 136), that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States, and from which judgment the Secretary of the Treasury shall also be satisfied that no such appeal or writ of error ought to be taken; and also (fourth) whenever any suit or suits have been begun against a collector of customs to recover money exacted by him and paid under protest, and an appeal, as required by law at the time of importation, and a bill of particulars has been served therein on the defendant or his attorney, as required by such law, and when by the legal effect of any judgment of a court of the United States, satisfactory to the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid, the said exaction of such duties shall have been declared illegal, and protests, appeals, and bills of particulars have been made according to the law in force at the time of importation, and the proper officers of the customs shall, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, have reliquidated the entries covered by said suit or suits and bill or bills of particulars, according to the principles and rules of law prescribed by said judgment, and the district attorney appearing of record for the defendant shall certify that such suits have been discontinued, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in each and all of the before-mentioned cases, always excepting judgments or 'judgment cases' in suits commonly known as 'charges and commission' suits, which last named shall only be paid in pursuance of a specific appropriation therefor, draw his warrant upon the Treasurer in favor of the person or persons entitled to the overpayment, or the sum expressed in said judgment, or the sum thus found due on reliquidation of the entries in discontinued suits, including interest and costs payable by law, directing the Treasurer to refund and pay the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The necessary moneys therefor are hereby appropriated, and this appropriation shall be deemed a permanent indefinite appropriation."

SEC. 15. That section 2927 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by the addition of the following words thereto:

"No allowances for damage to fruits or other perishable goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States shall hereafter be allowed in the estimation of duties thereon, except as to seeds and such other commodities as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury do not admit of convenient separation by package or piece; but the importer thereof may abandon to the Government all or any portion of goods, wares, and merchandise of the character last mentioned included in any invoice, and be relieved from the payment of the duties on the portion so abandoned: Provided, That the portion so abandoned shall amount to 10 per cent. or over of the total value of the invoice."

SEC. 16. That section 29 of the act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, is hereby amended by striking out in the first line thereof the word "seventy-six," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seventy;" so that that part of said section preceding the word "provided" shall read: "Section 2779 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding thereto the following."

SEC. 17. That any person who shall give, or offer to give, or promise to give any money or thing of value, directly or indirectly, to any customs officer, in consideration of or for any act or omission contrary to law in connection with or pertaining to the importation, appraisement, entry, examination, or inspection of goods, wares, or merchandise, including herein any baggage, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less that $100 nor more than $5,000 or be imprisoned at hard labor not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 18. That any officer of the customs who shall demand, exact, or receive from any person, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value, in consideration of or for any act or omission contrary to law in connection with or pertaining to the importation, appraisement, entry, examination, or inspection of goods, wares, or merchandise, including herein any baggage, on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned at hard labor not more than two years, or both; and for the purpose of constituting an offense under sections 15 and 16 of this act, the giving or offering to give, and the receiving, of any money or thing of value shall be regarded as prima facie evidence.

SEC. 19. That section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874, be amended so that it shall read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall for each offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition to such fine, such merchandise, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited, which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

SEC. 20. That all imported goods, wares, and merchandise which may be in the public stores or bonded warehouses or on shipboard within the limits of any port of entry, or remaining in the customs offices, on the day and year when this act, or any provision thereof, shall go into effect, except as otherwise provided in this act, shall be subjected to no other duty, upon the entry thereof for consumption, than if the same were imported respectively after that day; and all goods, wares, and merchandise remaining in bonded warehouses on the day and year this act, or any provision thereof, shall take effect, and upon which the duties shall have been paid, shall be entitled to a refund of the difference between the amount of duties paid and the amount of duties said goods, wares, and merchandise would be subject to if the same were imported respectively after that date.

SEC. 21. That sections 3011 and 3013 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby are, repealed as to all importations made after the date of this act; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the other requirements and provisions of this act are also hereby repealed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Joseph Neumann, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the preservation of the flag made of American silk presented by him to the Government, and deposited in the Smithsonian Institution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying that the Indians of the Indian Territory be located on the eastern portion of the same, and that the western portion, including Oklahoma and the Cherokee Strip, be opened to settlers under a Territorial organization; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Greeley, Colo., praying that an appropriation be made to construct a system of reservoirs in the State to irrigate Government lands, and that Government land be reserved for reservoirs, Kansas and Nebraska to be also benefited; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the American Shipping and Industrial League, January 18, 1888, favoring the proposed celebration of the centennial of the Constitution of the United States, etc.; which were referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and the Discovery of America.

Mr. COCKRELL presented resolutions adopted by the Cigar-Makers' Union, No. 44, of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the repeal of internal-revenue taxes upon tobacco and cigars; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Merchants' Exchange, of St. Louis, Mo., in favor of the inter-American and inter-republic celebration of the centennial of the United States, etc.; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and the Discovery of America.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of members of the faculty of Ripon College, in Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of W. J. Moberly, late first lieutenant Fourth United States Cavalry, praying for certain relief; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of Charles Murphy, stating that at a former session of Congress a bill for his relief was adversely reported, setting forth new evidence that has been discovered, and with it are filed the affidavits of the parties. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims, and that an order be made that the papers in respect to his claim, on file in the Secretary's office, be also referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of the faculty of the Western University of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. TURPIE presented a petition of 124 citizens of the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, and Tenth Congressional districts of Indiana, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the faculty of Drury College, Springfield, Mo., praying for the enactment of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of E. L. Martin and other citizens of Kansas City, Mo., praying that the compensation of post-office clerks be placed on the same basis with that of railway postal clerks and letter-carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the First, Second, and Third Congressional districts of Missouri, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of the Lombard Street Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, held in the city of Baltimore, Md., composed of representatives from its various subordinate meetings in Maryland and the adjacent parts of Virginia and Pennsylvania, through its committee on philanthropic labor, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified, will prohibit henceforth the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of all alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the United States, and in every place subject to their jurisdiction. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BECK. The petition prays Congress to prohibit imports and to regulate the revenue. I do not know what the Committee on Education and Labor has to do with that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The indorsement of the petition will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A petition for a national prohibitory constitutional amendment from the Lombard Street Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, Baltimore.

Mr. BECK. The object of it seems to be to prohibit imports of certain sorts, and I supposed that to be a financial matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The body of the petition will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Lombard Street Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, held in the city of Baltimore, Md., composed of representatives from its various subordinate meetings in Maryland and the adjacent parts of Virginia and Pennsylvania, through its committee on philanthropic labor, most respectfully and earnestly ask you, by an appropriate joint resolution, to adopt and propose to the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified, will prohibit henceforth the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of all alcoholic liquors, as a beverage, in the United States, and in every place subject to their jurisdiction.

JONATHAN K. TAYLOR,
Chairman of Committee.

Mr. BECK. I think the petition ought to be referred to the Finance Committee. I move that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say that similar petitions in almost this exact phraseology have been sent for a long time to the Committee on Education and Labor. I should be glad to have one sent to the Committee on Finance, so as to see what they will do with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In this connection the Chair will state that it would greatly facilitate the transaction of business if Senators presenting petitions will comply with the rule which requires that a brief statement of the contents shall be made by the Senators presenting them, or indorsed thereon, so that it can be read at the desk.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Presiding Officer had observed, he would have noticed that I did so when I presented the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I present another petition from the same body, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in which the petitioners say:

Realizing the fearful and distressing effects produced by the use of intoxicating drinks, such as the increase of pauperism, disease, crime, and taxation, the Lombard Street Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, held in the city of Baltimore, Md., through its committee on philanthropic labor, most respectfully but earnestly ask you to enact laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale, and importation, exportation, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverages in the District of Columbia, and all other portions of the United States under the control of the General Government, thus absolving the Government from being accessory to the alarming effects of intemperance in the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he regards that as a brief statement of the contents of the petition.

Mr. BLAIR. That is tolerably brief, I think, Mr. President. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present, from the same organization, a further petition, of which I will endeavor to make a brief statement. The petition comprises about half a page of written matter, in which the petitioners most respectfully and earnestly pray for the enactment of a law which will authorize the appropriation of money from the Treasury of the United States for temporary aid in the establishment and maintenance of free public schools, in order that the number of illiterates in the United States may be reduced to a minimum, thus strengthening the foundations of our civil and religious liberty. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of the Lombard Street Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, held in Baltimore, Md., praying Congress by appropriate legislation to provide exemplary penalties for the seduction, with or without promise of marriage, and for the defilement of the persons of young girls; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of McCook, Nebr., praying for the establishment of a system of postal telegraphy. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Greeley, Weld County, Colorado, praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of storage reservoirs for the purpose of irrigation in Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPOONER presented the petition of A. R. Devine and 127 other citizens of the Eighth Congressional district of Wisconsin, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of citizens of West District, Hays County, Nebraska, praying for certain amendments of the postal laws; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Greeley, Colo., praying for an appropriation to aid in the reclamation of arid lands in that State through increased irrigation facilities; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented the petition of Hiram Parker, of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of citizens of Franklin County, Virginia, praying for certain amendments of the postal laws; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Franklin County, Virginia, praying for the enactment of a law providing for the reissue of fractional currency; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 70) to provide for warehousing fruit brandy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VANCE. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back the bill (S. 1067) relating to imported liquors to this body, and to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it involves questions which we think that body should pass upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change of reference will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 293) granting a pension to Mrs. Arabella Coddington, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 433) granting an increase of pension to General S. W. Price, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1139) for the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 752) to grant a pension to Mrs. Elvira L. Johnson, widow of Commodore Philip E. Johnson, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1086) granting a pension to Jacob Kintz, alias John Walters, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 695) for the relief of R. C. Martin, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 234) granting a pension to Julia A. Ross, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 466) granting a pension to William R. Blevins, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed upon the Calendar, please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 691) for the relief of Henry Bellion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 819) granting a pension to Christopher Wisemiller;
A bill (S. 821) granting a pension to John Vertessy;
A bill (S. 815) granting a pension to Angerone P. Cole, mother of George H. Cole, private Company B, Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers;
A bill (S. 174) granting a pension to Mary Martin;
A bill (S. 172) granting a pension to Abbie M. Hay;
A bill (S. 173) granting a pension to Henry B. Very;
A bill (S. 170) granting a pension to Mary A. Mykins;
A bill (S. 806) granting a pension to William Healy;
A bill (S. 801) for the relief of Basile Champagne; and
A bill (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ida May Welton, of Groton, Vt., praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1784) granting a pension to Ida May Welton; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 810) granting a pension to Mrs. A. L. Collins, guardian;
A bill (S. 804) granting a pension to James Conto;
A bill (S. 813) granting a pension to Charles Wilkinson;
A bill (S. 390) for the relief of Ida M. Howell;

Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a resolution of the Board of Trade of Chester, Pa., remonstrating against the continuance of the quarantine station in its present location near that city, and recommending the establishment of a national system of quarantine, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1328) for the relief of Betts, Nichols & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1226) touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

JACKSON, MISS., MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution for the payment of the expenses of the Judiciary Committee in the investigation of certain matters alleged to have occurred at Jackson, Miss., to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary, January 23, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, in making the inquiries into certain matters alleged to have occurred at Jackson, Miss., and as directed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 12th instant and of the 23d instant, be paid out of the appropriation for the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of said committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the committee will be next read.

The Chief Clerk read the substitute proposed by the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, in making the inquiries into certain matters alleged to have occurred at Jackson, Miss., and as directed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 12th instant and of the 23d instant, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported as a substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the slightest objection myself to the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses auditing the expenses incurred by the Committee on the Judiciary, except for the inconvenience of it, and the fact that it has not been usual in such investigation, for the reason that it would be difficult for the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, as all the expenses in respect of the quantum of witnesses, etc., are left in the discretion of the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not see how the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses could be officially informed of what those expenses properly had been.

I have not the slightest objection to the Committee on the Judiciary getting rid of the duty of auditing these accounts and expenses, but I do not want the business placed in such a condition that the witnesses and other people will have difficulty in getting their recompense when it is due to them.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be again read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It makes the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses audit the accounts, and not the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the committee will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend that by substituting "approved by the chairman of said committee."

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is an amendment reported from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and the original resolution makes that provision. I suppose by the rules, however—I have always so understood—after the vouchers have once received the imprimatur of the Committee on the Judiciary they then have to be revised and go through the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I think I have understood that to be the case, but I am not sure about it.

But the practical difficulty is in the committee having charge of the business being one committee, and of the expenditure and the auditing committee being a different one, upon the separate vouchers of each witness, or stenographer, or whoever he may be, as to what is to be the means of proof that shall satisfy the Committee on Contingent Expenses that the expenditure has been regular and ought to be paid. It is not a question of dignity, so far as I am concerned, between the two committees, but only of convenience.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Massachusetts to call for the reading of the original resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. The original resolution is about right.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. There seemed to be two committees—a subcommittee and the Committee on the Judiciary—mentioned in the resolution, and the amendment to the resolution simply states in precise words what always occurs. Even if these vouchers should be paid upon the approval of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, they would have to pass through the Committee on Contingent Expenses for the approval of its chairman and the approval of that committee. Of course that committee can not make this approval except upon the approval of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. So, after all, it amounts to about the same thing; but it would be more in order to adopt the amendment than the original resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has not been the course heretofore.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The only other change that the committee made in the original resolution is that the expenses should not be taken out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent expense fund, but simply out of the contingent fund.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if expenses similar to these that are now being provided for have not heretofore been invariably paid upon the approval of the chairman of the committee which made them?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. They have been paid upon that approval and also upon the approval of the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. HARRIS. Why depart in this case from the usual custom of the Senate? Why not let the resolution provide for the approval of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and then so far as is necessary the vouchers would go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses as usual?

Mr. HOAR. I will state what I understand to be the present practice. Perhaps I may be mistaken, but certainly I have so understood it, and I have had the charge of quite a number of such matters as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I understand that the usual resolution is to have the expenses paid on the voucher of the chairman of the committee, so that when a witness wants his pay he gets a certificate from the chairman of the committee that summoned him and that knows all about him; and he goes to the Secretary's office and gets his pay. So with the stenographer or any other special expense. If the investigation is out of Washington, it is the custom for the Secretary of the Senate to deliver to the clerk or the deputy sergeant-at-arms who goes with the committee a sum of money sufficient to cover the expenses for halls, stationery, or whatever may be the expense of the transportation of the committee, and so on; and when the committee returns its chairman certifies the detail of that expenditure to the Secretary's office, and the account then is made.

Now, if this resolution passes, every witness who wants his pay will have to hunt up my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and get his voucher in addition to the voucher he has already got from the committee making the investigation. I suppose when the Secretary has paid the vouchers he then submits his account to the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses for his approval. This amendment will require for every dollar that is paid to get a voucher from the chairman of the two committees. The person who will be the most annoyed by it will be my honorable friend from Nevada himself. So, I think, the original resolution is best.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is certain that the original resolution follows the practice of the Senate for a good many years, for I framed the original resolution myself upon the precise model of one adopted by the Senate in the last Congress for an investigation by the Committee on Foreign Relations or any subcommittee thereof into the fisheries question; and the resolution of the last Congress on that subject was founded upon precisely the same modus operandi of preceding resolutions of the Senate.

The law provides, however—and all resolutions such as our original one do not contravene the law—that when these accounts are finally settled they have got to receive the imprimatur of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That is the final revision; just as the board of directors of a bank revise the discount and deposit accounts, etc., that the cashier has been running for the week. The law is found in section 76 of the Revised Statutes.

The original resolution is not designed to diminish the authority or interfere with the power of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but the committee which the Senate chooses to trust with expending money for an investigation is thought to be the best committee, then and there, to be the first to certify and approve or to disapprove claims for expenditures and fees, etc., that are made upon it. That is the state of the case.

As to the other part of the amendment, the difficulty is that the contingent fund of the Senate in question is divided into various and separate parts, and, as has been held in the Treasury Department, if you have an expense account, for instance, for the investigation, as I was told a Congress or two ago, of an affair like this or an affair like the fisheries, no matter what, by the Senate, and you pay it and charge it, not against the appropriation for the miscellaneous items of expense, the unforeseen ones, etc., but charge it to some other account, it will be disallowed. Therefore it has been the custom in the numerous cases that I have known for years gone by; and on the advice of the cashier of the Senate, who is in constant communication with the Comptroller of the Treasury, in order not to have the accounts held up and a disturbance with the accounting officers of the Treasury, it was necessary to put into the resolution a provision that the payment should be from the appropriations for the miscellaneous items, unless there should be a standing appropriation for the investigation which was not exhausted, and in that case, of course, it could be paid from that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I will ask the Senate to allow the resolution to remain, with the leave of my honorable friend from Nevada, the chairman of the committee, for a few minutes, to be taken up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will lie on the table for the present.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH INVESTIGATION.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay the stenographer authorized by the resolution of the 19th instant to report the arguments, evidence, etc., for the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the subject of the postal telegraph, out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSENGER FOR PRESS GALLERY.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special messenger, who shall attend upon the Press Gallery of the Senate, and be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund.

STATEMENTS ON PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, submitted evidence taken by that committee in support of the bill (S. 945) to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, and rinderpest among cattle, and to facilitate the exportation of cattle and the products of live-stock, and for other purposes, and moved that 500 copies be printed for the use of the committee; which was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4881) making an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experimental stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto."

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 274) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point in the county of St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, below the city of St. Charles.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1787) to provide for the erection of an Army gun-factory at the Watervliet arsenal, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest to the Senator from New York that that subject is now before the Committee on Coast Defenses. The Committee on Coast Defenses has had that question under consideration and reported a bill at the last session, which was passed by the Senate, providing for a gun-factory. There is also a bill on the same subject before the Committee on Coast Defenses at the present session.

Mr. EVARTS. I consent to the change of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1788) granting a pension to Hiram Parker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 1789) for a supplemental appropriation for the erection of a public building at Los Angeles, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1790) to carry into effect the recommendation of the Board of Admirals convened under the joint resolution approved February 5, 1879, in the case of Commander Henry Glass, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1791) for the relief of John Williams; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1792) for the relief of Charles Willey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1793) releasing the title of the United States in a certain parcel of land to John D. Thorne, assignee of John Cutler; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 1794) granting to the Aberdeen, Bismarck and Northwestern Railway right of way across a portion of the Sioux reservation, in Dakota Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 1795) for the relief of the First National Bank, of Marion, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 1796) to establish a United States land court, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1797) to enforce restrictions on Chinese immigration; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to this bill. I am in favor of a more extensive exclusion bill, but this bill is necessary to carry out the provisions of existing laws. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to make regulations to carry out the existing laws. It also cuts off after ninety days the entry of Chinese on previous permits. In that respect there is a great abuse, which has existed now for six years and over. The courts are overloaded with cases. If we could have this measure immediately it would be a matter of great relief. The public papers have shown to some extent the difficulty that exists on the Pacific coast.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to vessels not propelled by sails or internal motive power of their own, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1879; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1799) to authorize the approval of certain leases of Indian lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1800) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit miners and companies and corporations organized for mining purposes to prospect, develop, lease, and own the mineral portion of any Indian reservation upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the Indians on any such reservation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1801) making an appropriation for the removal of obstructions in the Columbia River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1802) granting the right of way through the Flathead Indian reservation to the Missoula and Northern Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 1803) in aid of the Centennial and Memorial Association of Valley Forge, and to secure the Washington headquarter mansion and grounds occupied by the Continental Army of 1777–'78; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MANDERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1804) to authorize the Cheyenne Street Railroad Company to build its road on and across the Fort D. A. Russell military reservation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1805) to incorporate the Washington and Highlands Street Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 1806) to regulate the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 1807) to refund to the State of West Virginia the money paid to officers of the One hundred and thirty-third Regiment West Virginia Militia, for services rendered during the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 1808) for the relief of Isaac Davenport and others, citizens of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I introduce a bill drawn by the presiding officer of this body, regulating the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia. It is far from my purpose to say that I offer it by request, because I promised not to do that.

The bill (S. 1809) regulating the sale of distilled and fermented liquors in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 1810) authorizing the President to place Lieut. Commander Charles A. Schetky, United States Navy, upon the retired-list; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present at this time the petition of Judge A. L. Gilstrop, of Macon, Mo., accompanied by a joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I introduce it by request, and I ask that the petition be printed in connection with the resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. 45) proposing an amendment of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the accompanying petition was ordered to be printed.

OMAHA RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate what amount of lands upon the Omaha reservation have been sold pursuant to the statute approved August 17, 1882, and the statutes amendatory thereof; how much of the money due as proceeds of such sales has been paid into the Treasury, and how much, if any, is due and unpaid, both principal and interest, and what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce such payments as are due, or to recover possession of the lands so sold, payments for which have failed according to the terms thereof.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the treaty between this Government and that of Great Britain, now before the Senate in executive session, be considered in open session.

I ask that the resolution be now considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That belongs to executive business, I should think, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks that the resolution be now considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object, Mr. President, for the time being. I suggest to the Senator that it is a matter which should properly be considered in executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objecting, the resolution goes over under the rules until the succeeding day.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon, sir. The Senator from Vermont says that he thinks it ought to be considered in executive session. The Senator fails to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The Senator from Vermont having objected to the present consideration of the resolution it has gone over until to-morrow, and is therefore not now the subject of discussion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not mean to discuss it, but I say the Senator from Vermont has failed to apprehend that the object of the resolution is just exactly to do the opposite of what he thinks ought to be done. Here is another resolution that I propose to put in, which necessarily will go over, proposing to alter a rule of the Senate. I did not rise for the purpose of debating the matter, but getting such a change of rule that I thought would stop objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXVII be so amended as to allow the treaty now pending between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States to be considered in open Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That, I believe, goes over one day. That is a notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes over one day under the rules.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of G. M. Woodruff, filed in the Forty-sixth Congress, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONTRACT WORK ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, instructed to consider the advisability of inserting a provision in the bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors requiring all work to be done thereunder to be let by contract to the lowest bidder.

CHARLES R. WESTBROOK.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate the facts attending the employment of Charles R. Westbrook as an assistant to the district attorney for the southern district of New York, together with copies of all correspondence on the subject, the emolument paid to him, and the appropriation from which paid, and if the said Westbrook received also extra compensation for any time previous to such employment, he not being a sworn officer of Government.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate the evidence taken by the stenographer's notes in the issue of Curtis vs. Schell before Judge Lacombe, so far as relates to the testimony of Charles R. Westbrook, and which issue was tried in November, 1887.

THE MAIL SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PLUMB, as follows:

Whereas there have been for many months serious complaints as to the inefficient character of the mail service, especially in the West and South, and the same continue, indicating that the trouble is of a permanent character:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to make thorough inquiry into the cause of such inefficient mail service, and report to the Senate their conclusions thereon, with suggestions as to remedy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest an amendment about which I spoke to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] not now in his seat, and I am satisfied it will be accepted. The preamble is:

Whereas there have been for many months serious complaints as to the inefficient character of the mail service, etc.

I wish to insert "alleged" before "inefficient."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has entered the Chamber.

Mr. PLUMB. That change is entirely acceptable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2, before the word "inefficient," it is proposed to insert the word "alleged;" so as to read:

Whereas there have been for many months serious complaints as to the alleged inefficient character of the mail service, especially in the West and South, and the same continue, indicating that the trouble is of a permanent character.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not object to this amendment, which I understand is accepted by the Senator from Kansas, although I think the evils referred to in the resolution have passed beyond the domain of mere allegation and have become well-known and ascertained facts.

I feel a personal sense of gratitude to the Senator from Kansas that he has introduced this resolution, and I hope that investigation will quickly follow. Those of us who live in the rapidly advancing States of the West have suffered very greatly within the last two years because of inadequate postal facilities. I am in receipt daily of letters calling my attention to the facts. In my own State there have been built within the last year over a thousand miles of railroad—1,100 miles of railroad, I am informed by my colleague [Mr. PADDOCK]—and along these newly built lines of road new communities have sprung into existence, thriving villages, that are actually deprived of adequate postal facilities. Where the fault is I do not know; but I do know that the attention of the Post-Office authorities has been frequently called to these complaints by myself and other members of the delegation of the State that I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, and that a remedy for the evil has been demanded. I have here letters received on other subjects, but referring incidentally to this, one from a gentleman well known to this body, late the efficient Public Printer of the Government, Hon. S. P. Rounds, now deceased. He wrote me on October 26, 1887:

Without any disparagement of our present post-office officials, everybody knows and complains of the mail service here. Especially is this true as regards our paper—

Mr. Rounds then editing the Omaha Republican—and, we presume, the others in this city, and we are in constant receipt of complaints from subscribers of the non-receipt or irregular and late receipt of their papers.

I read also an extract from a letter from the editor of the Omaha World, a daily newspaper published in Omaha:

Let me add my voice—

Says Mr. Hitchcock, the editor—

to the storm of complaints against the inadequate post-office facilities of Omaha with which your ears have doubtless been assailed.

Not Omaha only, but the whole tributary country, with a population of two millions or more, suffers because the post-office building and the post-office force in Omaha are wholly inadequate for the needs of business in this section. Take the case of a newspaper. It is almost of daily occurrence that the World fails to reach hundreds of readers outside the city promptly because the force in the post-office could not handle the work in time to catch the train. Not only is this often the case with a portion of our outgoing mail, but the postmaster is obliged constantly to require of us that the papers be delivered at the office long before train time, which would not be necessary if his force were large enough to dispatch work promptly.

What is true of the newspaper is true of bankers, wholesale merchants, and others having heavy mails. The service is abominable, but the postmaster is not to blame. He and his force are up to their ears in mail-bags, overwhelmed with work, and crowded into inadequate quarters. The result is that all Nebraska suffers.

I select these letters out of numerous others received simply for the purpose of showing the magnitude of this evil. The calls for relief come not only from those who are publishing newspapers, but from the public at large and even from the postmasters themselves.

I know it is very much easier to find fault than it is to apply a remedy; it is easier to criticise than it is to reform, but certainly a reformation is needed here by which these people who have suffered for the last two or three years should have some remedy for the evils that now exist and under which they have suffered for years past.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the same condition of things described by the Senator from Nebraska exists throughout the West. The mail service has been cut down and the expenses are curtailed to such an extent that the service is altogether inadequate. It is so in Nevada and so throughout the Territories. I have received a vast number of letters on the subject going into great detail about it; and there is a universal complaint in the new countries, the cause of which must be removed or great injury will be done them. The mail routes have been cut down. Where they had daily mails they are reduced to tri-weekly, sometimes to weekly, and then the force is often inadequate to deliver letters promptly or carry them promptly. The complaint is general. I hope the matter will be looked into and that we shall have some relief from an evil which is generally felt by the whole Western community.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the particular delays in the mails which have been spoken of. The complaints may be well founded, or they may be mere reports without proper foundation. But what I rose to say is that, while I have no objection to the investigation proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, I do think it is unfair when a resolution of that character is offered for the purpose of inquiring whether certain complaints are well founded, to spread upon the RECORD and so put before the country, not the statements of Senators, but extracts from newspapers, charges of delinquency somewhere in an Executive Department in regard to which an investigation is proposed. That kind of dealing with an executive officer does not commend itself to my judgment of fairness and justice.

I was pleased to hear the Senator from Kansas say—and I have heard nobody dispute the position—that he was satisfied the Postmaster-General had acted honestly and endeavored to act economically in the management of his Department. That is a comment very favorable upon the present administration of postal affairs, because we know that it has not been long since there were grave charges of fraud and defalcations in the management of the postal affairs of the country. I am pleased to know that no charges of that kind are brought forth against the present administration of the Postal Department.

We all know that we cut down a few years ago the rate of letter-postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, and reduced the postage on other matter. The Postmaster-General has been compelled to carry on and support his Department with the appropriations made by Congress. He has not done what was done a few years ago under another administration, when we were informed by the Postmaster-General that the appropriations which had been made to the full extent which he had estimated would be exhausted by the first of May, and that there would be two months of the year when the mails would be stopped, because he was not able under the act of Congress to carry on the Department for the want of funds.

The late Postmaster-General, who has recently left that Department, has endeavored to keep himself within the limits of the appropriations made to meet the deficiency in the revenues of the Department, and he may, perhaps, have had to economize more than his own judgment would have justified, from the necessity of the case.

I hope the investigation will be instituted, and that it will be dealt with fairly, and that the true cause of any delay, or any want of proper facilities, may be ascertained and a proper remedy pointed out. What I rose to say was that I do not think it is fair, when it is proposed to investigate the management of a Department, to put upon the record complaints of newspapers and others without having even a verification of their accuracy by the Senator who introduces them. I say I think it is unfair to an executive officer thus to be dealt with in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, in the remarks I made I reflected upon no officer. I simply stated a condition of things that ought to be inquired into. It may need further appropriations and further legislation. I think the necessities of the people in new countries should be taken into consideration and liberally treated. I was opposed to large contracts for carrying the mail on what are called star routes. The swindling in that matter did the West a great deal of harm. It prevented the use of money for small routes to do the necessary service that would accommodate the people. The reform in cutting off extravagance in star-route contracts is a great reform and a thing to be commended, and the scandal ought not to be renewed again.

What the people want is to have their necessities provided for. They want mail service cheap, economical, and efficient, and an inquiry into this subject, so that the mail service can be extended to them without any unreasonable expenses, is what is important; and with that view I am cordially in favor of the resolution presented by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad this resolution has been introduced, and I hope it will be adopted, especially because I think the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads need to have some little stimulant administered to them to cause them to form some statute or amendment to the statutes which will make the postal service of the United States correspond with its growth.

This country is growing very rapidly in every direction, extending territorially, and increasing very rapidly in population. We are receiving a great acquisition of foreign people in this country, of something like half a million people a year.

There is also one fact connected with this service that is an important one to be considered. By the reduction of postage upon all classes of mail matter made a few years ago we have increased the volume and weight of the mails immensely. The number of packages for mailing, the number for distribution, the number for transportation, have enormously increased. The clerical force to do this work has not kept pace with the increase of all mail matter carried over our lines, nor have the salaries that belong to the inferior officers in the service of the Government of the United States been increased sufficiently to enable them to do this additional amount of work.

We have been grading the postal expenditures almost within the postal revenue. We have been very successful in bringing the postal expenditures within postal receipts, but I think we have done it at the expense of that very faithful band of people engaged in handling the mail matter that passes through our post-offices. I think they are the hardest-worked set of people in the world. They are certainly the most faithful of men, take them all in all. Take the numerous number of persons who are concerned in the postal management of the United States, and I think they are the most faithful set of men that have ever had a record made in history. We ought to increase their pay; we ought to provide for the increase of their number.

A great many things are needed to be done to bring the postal service up to the necessities of the country. What we need to-day is to take up our postal laws and reform them. Now, if that committee should want a guide for this reformation they have nothing to do but to consult the report of the Postmaster-General, a most carefully-prepared paper, in which every evil of the postal system as it now exists is portrayed, and the remedy is indicated, and is earnestly brought to the attention of Congress. If that committee will take up that report and examine it they will find that the late Postmaster-General has covered the whole ground, and I should think they would not fail if they adopted every single recommendation he made. He complains more loudly of the postal system than we complain here of his administration of it, and he says that the difficulties by which he has been environed grow out of deficiencies in the law. I have been here several years in the Senate, and I think we have made fewer efforts to amend our postal laws than any other system of laws we have got.

It seems to me that if the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have contented themselves with a system that belongs to the past of this country twenty or twenty-five years back, we had better move our statutes up to correspond somewhat with the progressive advancement of our people.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if the purpose of this inquiry is to find whether there is defective mail service, in the West at least, it is not necessary. That is admitted by everybody, by the post-office officials as well as the public. I do not propose to criticise anybody, because I am of the opinion myself that the complaint largely grows out of causes beyond the control of the Executive Department.

The evils alleged by the Senator from Nebraska undoubtedly exist; and what he read in reference to the post-office at Omaha shows that it is beyond the power of the Executive Department to remedy the difficulty unless they are improperly withholding from that office force that they are giving improperly to others, of which I have heard no complaint. The fault is that there is not an appropriation sufficient to meet the wants and demands of the postal service. There may be, and undoubtedly is, something to be attributed to the change in officials of the Department from skilled and competent men to men who are unskilled, and it takes time for them to acquire the knowledge and the skill that their predecessors had. But the real trouble is that there is not money enough. You go to the Post-Office Department for an additional assignment for clerical force at Denver or Omaha or any other place that is rapidly growing, and you are told that if they should give what you demand, there would be a deficiency which they have no right under the statutes to make.

This is an evil that is not entirely to be charged to the Administration. It has been going on for years. As the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] says, we do not keep pace with the growth of the country. That is what is the matter. We do not realize that towns which had not any existence when the last census was taken contain large numbers of people, and that it requires thousands of dollars to carry on and keep up their postal affairs. I have seen a post-office from a $12-a-year post-office jump to where the clerical force required cost $7,000 a year in one single twelvemonth to keep it going, and the man who put his hand in his pocket and paid the $7,000 for clerk-hire is still waiting for the Government to reimburse him.

I have seen another instance of a town that sprang into existence at once where the postmaster gave his services for a twelvemonth, where he gave the rent of a building that was worth $100 per month, and he paid out every dollar that he received from the Government for the clerks that were absolutely necessary to accommodate the public, and he is still waiting for the Government to repay him the money that he has expended, and I doubt whether the Government will ever pay him.

The Western country is full of such instances within the last ten years; and as the prosperity of the country increases and the public demand is greater for these facilities the complaint becomes louder. I do not propose myself to attribute it entirely to the officials, but I do attribute it in part to the lack of that department of the Government which appropriates the money, not this branch of Congress; but there is the trouble largely.

I do not doubt that there has been a lack of celerity in putting the mails on new railroads when they have been built, and the fact is that in the West they have built railroads with such facility and such unexampled celerity that it takes more than an ordinary executive officer to take notice of the fact that the railroads are built. When in one section of the country they can build 600 miles from April to November, and when in another they can build in a summer 200 miles through a mountain range supposed to be impassable, it is not to be supposed that the officials living here, hampered as they are by the notion that this is the whole country where they are, will keep up with the times. One of the great difficulties we have had to encounter in building up the West has been a lack of a knowledge here of our condition, a lack of an appreciation of the necessities of the people, and a lack of appreciation of our growth and of our enterprise.

Mr. President, in the country in which I live the people do not want any weekly mail; they would just about as lief not have any; and there is more than one settlement in Colorado to-day that is paying for a daily mail because the Government declines to give them more than a weekly mail, sending their special messengers to depots at a distance and bringing the mail in and distributing it by a tax put upon themselves, and when the Department is applied to, the officials tell us that they have not the money, and I am inclined to think that that is largely true.

I heard it said yesterday—and I refer to it now because perhaps it will be the only opportunity I shall have—that it was not worth while to put postage at 1 cent, because it was proposed to make the Post-Office Department self-supporting. I have on various occasions expressed my disapprobation of that sentiment. There is no reason why the Post-Office should be self-supporting any more than the Army or the Navy, and there are a thousand reasons why it should not be self-supporting where there is one why it should be. Free communication between the different sections of the country, cheap literature that can be sent to the people in all sections of the country, is almost a necessity now for the civilization of this age, and we can not invest money anything like as well in any other branch of the administration of government as we can in the postal service, and that, too, without reference to its income or its revenue.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I should like to say a word if I may be allowed. I have looked into this matter with some care of late, and I am glad that the resolution is offered and hope it will be adopted, because it is going to develop a great many things.

In an effort which I made some time ago to see whether a bill could be drawn to reduce the rate of charge on letters, I found that I could not understand the matter, and therefore sent it to the committee, who reported it back yesterday, to see what they could do. We are told that the matter involves a reclassification of all the service, the pay of the clerical force in the various postmasters' offices, and very many other things; and one of the difficulties we are laboring under now, it is very well for Senators to know, is that railroads are built with such rapidity, displacing star-route lines, and so much time under existing laws must elapse before contracts can be made, that the changes involve great embarrassment.

I have read with great care the report of the Postmaster-General, which was referred to by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. He called the attention of Congress to the legislation needed very clearly, in the following language:

> To such as thus receive $2,000 or more the full salary is bestowed without abatement, and adequate provision made of an office, with all its accessories, and of all clerical assistance, supplies, and other expenses of equipment and maintenance. The second-class postmaster especially is the favorite of the statute; charged generally with duties which exact but a moderate share of a competent officer's time, and sustaining no drawback in any necessity of applying part of his salary to the expenses of his office.
> Yet from the third-class postmaster, who has so much less than the others in nominal salary, is taken "even that which he hath." To him no allowance (except in a case which is no exception, that of the separating office) for rent, light, fuel, clerical service, stationery, or other outgo whatever is made, but all must be defrayed from his miscalled salary, which thus proves too often, instead of the apparently promised reward of labor, but the weak residuum of a well-nigh exhausted cup. "The consequences are, first, injustice, more or less, to all postmasters of the third class, and frequent instances of grotesque inequality and unfairness in the proportion of labor and responsibility to net compensation; and, secondly, a resulting tendency to poorer provision and service in such offices, only counterbalanced by the pride and sense of duty of the officer."

And so all through the Postmaster-General calls attention to those things which the law-making power must regulate, and he can not.

While I am on my feet I wish to state that there is another thing I hope this resolution will elicit. We are distributing the mails now by perhaps the most intelligent body of young men in the service, known as the postal-railway clerks, all along the lines of railway; and yet we have great ocean steamers coming in every day from all parts of Europe laden down with foreign mails, many of them of great importance, and instead of having a postal clerk on those great mail steamers arranging the mails and having them ready for shipment as soon as they land at New York to San Francisco, Chicago, Louisville, and everywhere else, they are dumped into the New York post-office, and from fifty to one hundred clerks are kept there from twenty-four to forty-eight hours arranging, assorting, and adjusting them before they can start for their places of destination. Why do we not regulate that?

If the young men on railroad trains can adjust the mails so that they can be sent off, why can we not in some way or other have the same arrangement on the ocean steamers? There is no difficulty in arranging with foreign nations by extending our postal treaties; and yet the Postmaster-General can not do all that.

There are a thousand things to be done, and that is one of them. If we go into the difficulties of the service, its needs and the improvements that can be made, we may find that while the office may have been a little too economical, or too desirous to make itself self-supporting—which I admit ought not to be looked at, but the good of the service and its facilities ought to be looked after—while they may have gone a little too far in that direction the Congress of the United States has not exercised its power nor done its duty in furnishing to that Department the facility and the power to meet the requirements of the country.

I hope all this will be gone into and developed, and then let us do something which will make the service good and efficient. I do not blame the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; they are burdened I know with immense work; but still, as one Senator said, we may well serve them notice that something should be done. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] is capable of doing any amount of work, and he has good backing as I know.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything in regard to this resolution because it seems to me that this discussion is a little premature. If there is to be an examination of the management of the Post-Office Department, it would seem better to get in the testimony before we make the argument; but inasmuch as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has proposed to spread out the investigation from the Department itself to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and has proposed to administer to that committee a dose of stimulant, I thought I would respond that the committee would prefer to be consulted perhaps somewhat as to the character of the dose to be administered.

It is not, I apprehend, by any possibility to be laid at the door of that committee that the evils of which complaint has been made exist. I do not wish to criticise unduly or unfairly the Postmaster-General or his Department, and I know very well that some of the heads of the subordinate departments are very efficient, excellent, and competent men.

My friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] attempted to draw a little comparison between the service under the present Administration and in the past. I think that is not exactly fair, for there was no such great general complaint during the last Administration as there has been during the present one, nor does the complaint come entirely from the West, as has been suggested. It is not alone that railroads are being extended so rapidly; that is not the difficulty in this matter. The difficulty arises from two sources: the first source, and probably the greatest one, is the fact that the Department has attempted to change the clerical force too rapidly. In the short space of two years and a half nearly 90 per cent. of the whole force of the Post-Office Department in this country has been changed. It is impossible that that number of new men should be inducted so suddenly into the service and perform the duties successfully and efficiently.

My friend from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] asked a question in regard to the railway postal service. It is true that there has been less change in the railway postal service than in any other department of the service; and it is also true, and bears directly on this question, that in no department of this service has there been so little difficulty as in the service on the postal cars.

In the city of Philadelphia, where the most radical change has been made, it has become notorious, everybody knows, that if a man is really in a hurry to get a communication to anybody in the city of Philadelphia he either sends it by express or by telegraph. Numerous instances are on record where letters have been traced that have been one, two, and three weeks reaching their destination in the city of Philadelphia. What is the reason of this? It is very patent. The clerical force in the city of Philadelphia has been almost entirely changed, and new men have been selected, not with reference to their qualifications for office, but especially with a view to political services, and we have seen the fruits of it only a few weeks ago in the efforts of the present Administration to capture a convention and secure the election of a chairman of the State Democratic committee of Pennsylvania. This is notorious; everybody knows it. The men in the post-office in the city of Philadelphia acted as the political heelers and strikers to bring about that movement, supposed to be looking to the appointment of delegates to a convention that may sit during the coming warm weather.

But I wish to say further in regard to this matter of difficulty in the West, that it is not confined to the West. The business men of my city are suffering every week and every day from delays in the handling of the mail, until it has become to be a very common matter for a man who is engaged in business to find that his samples have come in before his invoice arrives, and when he is in a hurry to get the invoice he directs that it be sent by express. This did not occur formerly.

There is another difficulty. This Department, in common with others, has attempted to carry the theory of economy to an excessive extent. They have cut off expenditures to an extent unwarranted by law or usage; the decisions of the Department have been against efficiency and good service; and this policy has been carried on notoriously in regard to the printing and writing upon wrappers on second and third class matter.

So also the decision of the Department in regard to an appropriation made in the Forty-eighth Congress to convey the water-borne mails. Congress, supposing it possessed the authority to make the appropriation, provided by legislation that bids should be called for under certain prescribed conditions, and made the appropriation, expecting the Post-Office Department to carry out that provision of law; but the Postmaster-General, taking upon himself the right and the authority to decide upon a supposed law binding on himself, declared that he would not carry out the provisions of that statute

Mr. BECK. What does the Senator say, may I ask him?

Mr. CHACE. I was alluding to the appropriation of $400,000.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator what he said about the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CHACE. I said the Postmaster decided that he would not carry out the provisions of that law.

Mr. BECK. We discussed that matter before. I ask what the Senator said about merchants having trouble about their invoices.

Mr. CHACE. It is a matter of common notoriety in my city that parties buying merchandise at a distance receive their samples by express before they get their invoices by mail; and it has come to be the case that when they are in a hurry to get their invoices, so as to be able to examine them before the arrival of the samples, they have them sent by express.

Mr. BECK. Samples from other parts of this country, or from abroad—which?

Mr. CHACE. I am speaking now of my own State and of different parts of the country, all about. I am simply mentioning this fact to show that the difficulty is not confined to the West. It does not arise on account of the construction of new railroads or the change in the carrying of the mails from star routes to railroads.

Mr. BECK. I can not understand how invoices from one part of the country to another can be delayed; but, as to those coming from abroad, I understand that perfectly well from the examinations the Committee on Finance have made in regard to that matter.

Mr. CHACE. I am not speaking about foreign mails.

Mr. BECK. We are not so particular about the invoice from abroad now. It is rather pro forma.

Mr. CHACE. I am speaking now about the domestic mail service within our own country and from one State to another, and not confined to any particular State or any particular locality. It is a notorious fact that the mails are slower, that they are not so well handled, that they are not so well distributed as formerly. It has always been the case that second and third and fourth class mail matter has been delayed longer than letters, but that is aggravated at the present time, and the explanation is a very simple one. Here are new men, an immense horde of them, more than forty-six thousand out of fifty-odd thousand changed suddenly, introduced into a new business with which they had no previous acquaintance, and it is not to be expected that those men on entering the service can perform the duties with the promptness and facility of old and faithful officers.

I did not rise to criticise the Administration. I have no doubt the Postmaster-General and his subordinates at the head of the departments in the Post-Office establishment have intended to give us a good and efficient service; but they have been placed in a very paradoxical position. The question with them is, how to do the service with new men, selected, not with reference to their special qualifications for the service, but solely and entirely on account of their value as political servants. How, under such circumstances, can a Department secure a good and efficient service? It is impossible.

I do not expect to go on with this discussion now, because I hope we shall have a careful and thorough investigation in response to this resolution, and then perhaps we may discuss it more at length.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I am in hopes the resolution will be adopted, so that if there are deficiencies and insufficiencies in the postal service which are inexcusable, that fact may be developed, and if there are not, that the action of the Post-Office Department may be vindicated. I should be glad if the resolution were so amended as to embrace the point suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island a few moments ago, when he charged part of the alleged inefficiency of the postal service to the appointment of new and inexperienced clerks. My understanding on that subject is that there have been fewer changes from the past administration to the present than have usually been made on a change of administration within the same party. I think that fact will be developed if the Senator will amend the resolution so as to make the necessary inquiry.

Mr. CHACE. Do I understand the Senator to say that there have been fewer changes by this Administration in the Post-Office Department than by former administrations?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir; that is it.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator is very much mistaken.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the Senator will let us settle that by amending the resolution so as to draw out the facts in that respect. The Senator suggested that 90 per cent. of the postal clerks were new appointments.

Mr. CHACE. Nearly.

Mr. REAGAN. That is news, I think, to the Department and to the country. The official report of the Postmaster-General discloses no such fact, but, on the contrary, it shows a much less proportion of changes than that. I have only read the report once, without reference particularly to that subject, but it discloses the fact that there have been no such number of changes as the Senator supposes.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. He will remember that I was alluding to the whole service in the Post-Office Department. I think if the Senator will look it up he will find that the changes in the whole Post-Office Department are, as I said, very nearly 90 per cent. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] the other day gave us very valuable statistics in regard to that matter, and, if I am correctly informed, he did not have information as to the whole number of changes made, but——

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator change the resolution so as to call out an investigation of that fact?

Mr. CHACE. There have been nearly two thousand Presidential post-offices changed out of twenty-four hundred.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to make a little statement in regard to postal clerks in Missouri? If 90 per cent. of changes had been made there the service would have been decidedly improved, and I regret exceedingly to say that no such percentage of changes has been secured.

Mr. REAGAN. Nor has any such percentage of changes been made in any other Department, and I invite investigation on that point.

Mr. CHACE. I think there is a very broad "if" in the statement of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and my friend, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], as some other Senators did yesterday perhaps, or recently at least, have called attention to the question of making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining. The Senator from Colorado says there is no more reason for making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining than there is for making the Army and the Navy self-sustaining. It seems to me, with all respect, that there is a very broad difference between the two. The Army and the Navy are for the protection and defense of the country. They are not for the purpose of carrying out any private wish, enterprise, or scheme.

On the contrary, the Post-Office Department has for its main purpose to carry the private correspondence of the people, their social correspondence, their business correspondence, to facilitate them in their private affairs; and when they are thus facilitated in their private affairs, is it right that those who enjoy its benefits should pay for those benefits, or are you to tax the people generally for the benefit of those who use the Post-Office Department?

I make this suggestion because it seems to me strange that the statement should be so often repeated that there is no reason for making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. REAGAN. I have a single remark more to make, if I am permitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that the Senator's remarks may be postponed.

Mr. REAGAN. Only a sentence or two.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I will not object.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHACE. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will permit a few minutes in regard to this resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not feel at liberty to give way. The resolution will come up to-morrow. There will be a long discussion on it.

Mr. REAGAN. The only additional remark I have to make is that the report of the Postmaster-General shows great intelligence and a thorough comprehension of the various needs of the postal service, and he has pointed to those elements in the service where there are deficiencies to be supplied, and asks the assistance of Congress in perfecting the service. The whole report shows a most careful and useful condition of the service of the Post-Office Department, and I have not heard any complaints anywhere where I have been about the defects in the service that we hear from Senators on the floor.

So I shall be glad to have the resolution adopted, and I shall be glad if the Senator from Rhode Island would amend it so as to investigate the point to which he has drawn attention.

Mr. CHACE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to give me just one moment.

Mr. BLAIR. I can not.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the remarks I made——

Mr. BLAIR. The resolution will be discussed to-morrow.

Mr. CHACE. Just one moment. I want to put in a few figures that I wish to go into the RECORD in connection with the remarks I made and the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the right to call for the regular order if he desires.

Mr. BLAIR. I will waive it for a moment.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to say that it appears by the report of the Post-Office Department that under this Administration out of 2,359 Presidential postmasters, 2,000 had been changed up to the time of this report, and out of the 52,000 other officers 40,000 had been changed up to the date of the last report.

Mr. REAGAN. Many of those are appointments and reappointments.

Mr. CHACE. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. There are exceedingly few of them that are reappointments, not 1 per cent.; and further, since that time there have been a large number of changes besides.

RAILROAD RECEIVERS.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution—morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent to present at this time a resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report, by bill or otherwise, such legislation as may be necessary to prevent the courts of the United States, in managing railroads through receivers, from depriving creditors of their liens on said railroads and corporate properties by the sale of the properties under receiver's certificates, issued under the order of said courts, whereby the title to great railroad properties and vast bodies of the public land of the people of the United States, carrying with them a power of taxation over the people, is vested in favorites and combinations of persons selected and approved by the receiver and his confederates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. CALL. I give notice that to-morrow morning I will ask consent of the Senate during the morning hour to address the Senate upon this resolution.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. KENNA. I give notice that on Thursday, as soon as the morning business is concluded, I shall desire to make some observations touching the resolution to refer the President's annual message, and in reply to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 436) for the relief of James Barnes, Joab Williams, and William Titus; and

A bill (H. R. 5352) to grant an American register to the foreign-built bark Nordstjernen.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 4271) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for prior years, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4881) making an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experimental stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto."

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to offer a resolution to be referred to a committee.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed when they report the bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors to report as to each item thereof, whether the same be contained in the bill as it came from the House or be proposed by way of amendment, the facts tending to show the importance of the work for which the appropriation is proposed to commerce with foreign nations, or among the States, and for that purpose be authorized to employ an additional clerk to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

L. B. TOWNSEND AND OTHERS.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the forbearance of the Senator from New Hampshire while I move to take up Senate bill 388, Order of Business 48. It is a bill that should be considered now, from the fact that if it is not considered at once great harm may result to many honest men. It passed the Senate unanimously at the last session, but did not get through the House of Representatives. If the Senator from New Hampshire makes no objection, I have no doubt the Senate will accord me the privilege of calling up this bill out of order.

Mr. BLAIR. I can not accede to the request. The Senator must see that the pending bill involves matters of great interest to the coming generations of this country, and I ask him not to make the request under the circumstances that now confront us. I want the regular order to go on.

Mr. PALMER. I appeal to the gentleman by stating that this will lead to no debate, and if his bill merely refers to coming generations I think that the present demands a little of our consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. I can not consent to a postponement of the bill which is the regular order.

Mr. PALMER. I move to lay the pending business aside temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain that motion.

Mr. PALMER. I move that it be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can only entertain a motion to postpone either to a day certain or indefinitely.

Mr. PALMER. I move, then, that it be postponed for half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the pending order, being the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, be laid aside for thirty minutes. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. Now I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 388.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 388) for the relief of L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovell, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett.

The bill provides that L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovell, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett, of Ionia, Mich., sureties upon the several bonds of the late J. C. Dexter, given as security for the faithful performance by him of his duties as receiver of public moneys and disbursing agent of the land office at Ionia, Mich., from 1861 to 1867, be released and discharged from all obligation and liability whatsoever on account of the bond.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TITLE TO CERTAIN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 122, Senate bill No. 1022.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1022) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands in Kansas.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does that refer to what are called the New York Indian lands in Kansas?

Mr. PLUMB. No. This is a bill which respects one quarter-section of land which was originally entered by a person under the preemption laws. After its entry it was sold by him and went into the hands of several persons and finally became a town site, occupied now probably by a thousand people. Some years after the entry, long after the sale, the Department determined that the party was not entitled to enter the land, though they had taken the money, because he had made a previous entry. This is simply to relinquish the title of the United States to the occupiers of the land.

The bill was read at length. By it all the interest of the United States in and to the southwest fractional quarter of section 31, township 16, range 16 east of the sixth principal meridian, Osage County, Kansas, is relinquished to those persons, their grantees and their successors in interest, who purchased from Samuel C. Gilliland, who entered the same on the 7th of June, 1870, but which entry was thereafter canceled.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE AT DALLES CITY.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up Senate bill No. 23, Order of Business No. 54. It is a bridge bill reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce, and it is important that it should have early consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 23) to authorize Dalles City to construct a bridge across the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Commtttee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 2, line 19, after the word "city," to insert "and approved by the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

Provided also, That said bridge, at the option of the said Dalles City, by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons or vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers, for such reasonable rate of toll as may be provided from time to time by the common council of said city, and approved by the Secretary of War, or the same shall, at the option of said Dalles City, be a free bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, line 4, after the word "expense" to insert the words:

And in the event of litigation growing out of the provisions of this act, the same shall be had in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction any part of said bridge may be located.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That such alterations or changes as may be required by the Secretary of War or Congress in the bridge constructed under the provisions of this act shall be made by the said Dalles City, at its own expense; and in the event of litigation growing out of the provisions of this act, the same shall be had in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction any part of said bridge may be located, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CRIME IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to take up House bill No. 1213, which is Order of Business No. 105.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 1213) to punish robbery, burglary, and larceny in the Indian Territory, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 1, line 6, after the word "mule," to strike out the words "or other domestic animal;" so that the section will read:

That any person hereafter convicted in the United States courts having jurisdiction over the Indian Territory, or parts thereof, of stealing any horse, mare, gelding, filly, foal, ass, mule, when said theft is committed in the Indian Territory, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than fifteen years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after the word "repealed," to strike out the words "but said act," and to insert "Provided, however, That all such acts and parts of acts;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That all such acts and parts of acts shall remain in force for the punishment of all persons who have heretofore been guilty of the crime of larceny in the Indian Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OMAHA.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider Order of Business 159, being Senate bill No. 182.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon, at Omaha, Nebr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 1, line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert the words "or acquire by condemnation proceedings, in accordance with the laws of Nebraska;" in line 11, after the word "city," to strike out the words "the plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and," and insert the words "at a cost which;" in line 14, after the word "million," to strike out the word "five" and, insert "two;" in line 32, after the word "million," to strike out "five" and insert "two;" in line 36, after the word "building," to insert "and the erection of said building shall not be commenced until after plans, specifications, and full estimates for the same shall have been previously made and approved according to law: And provided further;" and in line 43, after the word "million," to strike out the word "five" and insert "two;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or acquire by condemnation proceedings, in accordance with the laws of Nebraska, a suitable lot of land in the city of Omaha, in the county of Douglas and State of Nebraska, and cause to be erected on the ground so purchased a building suitable for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, of the custom-house, post-office, internal-revenue office, and other Government offices in that city, at a cost which shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $1,200,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no moneys appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Nebraska shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, after the site for said building shall have been purchased, to cause a plan and specifications of said building to be prepared, which said plan and specifications shall not involve an expenditure in the erection and completion of said building and approaches thereto exceeding the portion of said $1,200,000 remaining after the site of said building shall have been paid for; and no plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum so remaining after paying for the site of said building, and the erection of said building shall not be commenced until after plans, specifications, and full estimates for the same shall have been previously made and approved according to law: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed in any event to increase the cost of the site and building, including approaches, when completed, beyond the sum of $1,200,000, as provided in this section.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, line 1, after the word "million," to strike out "five" and insert "two;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $1,200,000 is hereby appropriated for the purpose of the purchase of said site and the erection of said building thereon, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. Does that bill appropriate $1,200,000?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the maximum limit for both site and building as recommended by the Supervising Architect.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 436) for the relief of James Barnes, Joab Williams, and William Titus was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 5352) to grant an American register to the foreign-built bark Nordstjernen was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RIGHT OF WAY FOR IRRIGATION PURPOSES.

Mr. TELLER. I move to take up Senate bill 425, Order of Business 32.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 425) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 11, before the word "thereof," to strike out "center" and insert "marginal limits;" and in line 13, after the word "stone," to strike out "and timber;" so as to make the section read:

That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any canal or ditch company, formed for the purpose of irrigation and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of the ground occupied by the water of the canal and its laterals, and 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof; also the right to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of the canal or ditch, material, earth, stone, necessary for the construction of such canal or ditch.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 4, after the word "individuals," to insert "on the filing of the certificates and maps herein provided for;" so as to read:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to all canals and ditches heretofore or hereafter constructed, whether constructed by corporations, individuals, or association of individuals, on the filing of the certificates and maps herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to offer an additional amendment. In line 4 of section 1, after the word "granted," I move to insert "to any individual or." I offer the amendment at the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 4, after the word "granted," it is proposed to insert "to any individual or;" so as to read:

That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any individual or to any canal or ditch company formed for the purpose of irrigation, and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSONVILLE.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the bill (S. 217) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Jacksonville, Fla., be taken up for consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 1, line 4, after the word "Florida," to insert "approved July 29, 1886;" so as to read:

That the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Jacksonville, Fla.," approved July 29, 1886, be amended by making the limit for said building $275,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 1, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, line 1, before the word "thousand" to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

That the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF INAUGURATION DAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The thirty minutes having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to allow me to call up a matter that will take but a moment—the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] has the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I will state the reason why I ask the indulgence. This joint resolution was passed unanimously by the Senate at the last Congress. It proposes a constitutional amendment in regard to extending the Congress, in order to have a longer session the second year of each Congress. If it is to be dealt with at all by the present Congress it should be done at once, in order that the Legislatures of the States, some of which are in session this winter, may have time to consider it. I do not think it will lead to any debate, and I am sure my honorable friend from New York will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is entitled to the floor upon the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts appeals to the Senator from New York to yield.

Mr. EVARTS. I yield for the purpose of that joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York yields for the purpose of enabling the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. R. 13) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. I object to any yielding that displaces the educational bill.

Mr. HOAR. It does not displace that bill, but merely puts it over informally.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator chooses to ask that the bill be laid aside informally, that is another matter; and if the Senator from New York chooses to consent to that being done, it is another thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the parliamentary right of the Senator from New Hampshire fully protected, and the pending order will not be displaced by laying it aside informally for the consideration of other business. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as part of the Constitution, namely:

"The term of office of the President and of the Fiftieth Congress shall continue until the last Tuesday of April, in the year 1889, at noon. The Senators whose existing term would otherwise expire on the 4th day of March, in the year 1889, or thereafter, shall continue in office until noon of the last Tuesday in April succeeding such expiration; and the last Tuesday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress."

The twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States shall be amended by striking out the words "fourth day of March," and substituting instead thereof the words "last Tuesday in April, at noon."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with amendments; which will be stated in their order:

The first amendment was in line 8, to strike out the words "last Tuesday," and insert "thirtieth day;" so as to read, "shall continue until the thirtieth day of April."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 13, to strike out "last Tuesday," and insert "thirtieth day;" so as to read: "the thirtieth day in April."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 14, to strike out the words "last Tuesday," and insert "thirtieth day," so as to read "and the thirtieth day of April."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 22, to strike out "last Tuesday," and insert "thirtieth day," so as to read "thirtieth day in April."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the fact of the passage of the joint resolution by the necessary two-thirds will be recorded in the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so journalized.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 615) for the relief of James B. Mitchell;

A bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 300) for the relief of the trustees of the First Baptist Church at Smithland, Ky.;

A bill (H. R. 4842) to remove the political disabilities of George W. Harrison, of Hoboken, N. J.;

A bill (H. R. 2606) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Jefferson, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 1805) for a public building at Greenville, S. C.;

A bill (H. R. 5874) for the relief of the heirs of the late Francis I. Wheeler;

A bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio; and

A bill (H. R. 363) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza L. Mace.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, the observations which I shall make upon this bill may be included within a very brief statement of my views, and a brief reference to such principal objections as I think are most worthy of the attention of the Senate.

I can not conceal from myself any more than I can from the Senate that this bill at previous sessions has received ample illustration and elucidation, full argument upon the Constitution, and full discussion of the topics of prudence and expediency. I can not, therefore, think it worth while at all to renew those agitations or those discussions. It is rather that I would wish to state what I regard as the nature of the bill, both in its principal purpose and in the safeguards and prudential regulations which accompany the principal measure, that I now occupy the floor.

I am unable to distinguish this bill, either in the constitutional support for it or in the wisdom or regulation of its methods, from the method which was conducted in the examination by the trustees of the Peabody fund, which resulted in the memorial presented to the two Houses of Congress, and which had the support, in the constitutional and in all the considerations of the welfare of the country, of so competent an adviser and so competent a commentator as Mr. Alexander H. H. Stuart, of Virginia.

So far as I can see, whatever may be thought of particular arrangements in applying so large an endowment, and whether there may or may not be embarrassments or impediments which should be avoided as far as possible in that benevolent distribution, I think it is entirely true that the purpose is precisely that which the great benefactor, Mr. Peabody, had in his mind when he laid out the distribution of his wealth. I think the methods of distribution and the guaranties of its proper application are that when this endowment, proceeding from the General Government for the general welfare, falls into distribution in different States (which is but another form of saying in different managements for the same object, and to the same end), in these regards it is the policy which was the result of our experience for twelve years, bringing the managers of our institution into the closest and most confidential and frankest relations with the governments, with the institutions of learning, with instructors, with guides, with teachers. Such was our experience and the result, which we had the honor to present to Congress as a guide and an inspiration so far as Congress might regard it from a worthy source, and in this bill it finds substantially its reproduction.

Now, for the outset, as the bill passed the Senate at the last Congress with only 11 votes against it, which were nearly equally divided—6, I think, on the Democratic side and 5 on the Republican, or the reverse—I can hardly think that we can treat the constitutional question as one that is to enter very largely into the minds and opinions of those who are to vote now presently upon this bill. It would be a hopeless task, if I held the measure unconstitutional, against such a front of security and cohesion as is presented by that vote, to attempt to change or overpower that conclusion. So it must be regarded really rather as a conscientious duty upon disputants here to lay out their own grounds and their own opinions, which are apparently so averse to the settled and the solid judgment of the Senate.

I shall have no occasion to defend my opinions, which concur entirely and as only one of the many who entertain the view expressed in the almost solid vote of the Senate. I believe indeed the argument upon the matter principally in dispute, and in which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] took a principal part, and in which I had the honor to take some share in contravening his views, turned upon the point of a conceded right on the part of this Government to apply the funds which were derived from the sales of public lands to just such a measure as this—I mean just such a measure in principle and in purpose of applying the resources of the nation to the educating of the illiterate children of the nation.

Then the point was made that that being a trust estate, and the description of the trust being for the common benefit and general welfare, it was a proper adherence to the trust. But when we came to the trust power in the Constitution itself applicable to taxation and the wealth that is collected by its means, we were told that the construction of a trust power was not controlled by the same considerations which had disposed of the fidelity of the trust estate. I was unable then, I am unable now, to make this distinction.

Whatever may be thought of the range of the power of taxation, the phrases "for the common defense" and "general welfare" are quite as extensive, and, for the purposes of the present legislation, the identical matter is covered by the phrase in the endowment of the Northwest Territory, the cessions from the States, and subsequent securities by which the public lands can be devoted to the purposes of education.

I shall therefore dismiss the constitutional question there. Whatever place there might have been for a right to apply the wealth raised by taxation outside of the particular incidents and forms for the application of it given in the phrases of the Constitution in the separate clauses, whatever may at one time have been thought as to the necessary restriction of the administration of the wealth of the country to those specific purposes, has long passed away, and now in manifold forms of the material welfare of the country we are able to distribute the common wealth among the different States in aid of their occasions, local or particular, in the incidents of their climate or of their exposures to mischief.

There is nothing left for us to argue about the application of our wealth for the general welfare in these various forms of distribution, except that it must be limited by some necessary logic, for certainly no such phrase of demarkation can be found in the Constitution. It must be limited to what is called material welfare in providing for rivers and harbors, for guarding against infections, for controlling interstate commerce, for determining the interests in the various forms by which this or that industry may be needed and may be favored.

What is there in the Constitution, then, in any of its inferences, what is there in any logic that makes it for this country, looking in the face a great moral, a great social, a great political need on one side, and a great political duty in regard to all of these on the part of the United States, by which we are withheld, that we must find this great conflict between ignorance and debasement confessedly arrayed against freedom and the perpetuity of freedom in this country? What is there that obliges us to bend our front before this rising invasion, and by which we must be overpowered because we have no opportunity and no faculty and no right to meet at the right time by appropriate, adequate, and seasonable remedies when our resources are abundant for that purpose?

You must, after all, come back to the great work of our fathers in making a nation and providing it with a Constitution, and the later generation that has advanced and purified that Constitution, and has wrought out greater unity in the political bands and in the exercise of power to maintain it against all comers. You must hold that after all we must find as new occasions arise, new dangers threaten, new evils are to be redressed, and new means and methods are to be exerted for the redress, there is a halt and a limping step in this Constitution of ours that sometimes never can measure by the need and necessity of the commonwealth the right and the power to redress it.

I will agree that nothing is more important than that the lines should be well marked between what can not be traversed across the lines of a State, the power of the Federal Government, and the integrity and security against such invasions by the State; but I can not suffer it to be put upon a distinction between moral, intellectual, social, political needs in the minds and the hearts of the people upon whom the whole fabric of this Constitution and of this free, strong, powerful nation rests. You must find some other line of demarkation than that.

Certainly if you consult the opinions of the great founders of our nation, if you look to Washington, to Jefferson, to Adams, and to Madison, you will find that all those great champions of liberty, those great founders of this great state, put at the bottom of it education, intelligence, integrity, virtue—not a creature in any of these elements of material prosperity, nor concerned with the distribution of bounty for the mouth of the Mississippi or the harbors on the Great Lakes; and yet confessedly in the great experiment that with faith and fortitude was thus launched upon the stormy sea of human passions and human interests, this was the very thing without which the life of the nation must succumb, without which freedom must be usurped by power, without which the fabric would totter to the derision of the philosophers of older schemes of government who derided our attempt when it was commenced.

I will not repeat the terse, compact expressions of these great men. They appear selected by Mr. Stuart in the report which we made, and which was presented to the two Houses of Congress, and appear in the observations with which the Senator from New Hampshire has accompanied his protection and advancement of this bill.

But there is no mistaking the answer if the question had been put to one of those men, when the Federal Government has ample resources and the immediate occasions and most pressing duties of the growing nation are accomplished, when you all speak of this basis not only of our freedom but the only security for its permanence, would it be in the power of this great Government, rather than it should see virtue sapped before its eyes by ignorance and vice, that our material prosperity and our great wealth must remain in the Treasury before this remedial agency could be used to meet and reverse this incursion?

I think there is no mistaking it, for it is in every one of the words used in those weighty phrases, in the solemn admonitions which a nation ought to have listened to, which it did listen to, and which, Senators, I persuade you, the people of this country, North and South, do listen to and wear as a frontlet between their eyes in their judgment and in their purposes concerning the welfare of this country.

I now come to the principal feature of this bill. In the first place, the bill adheres to the proposition that we are not to undertake the regulation of the instruction of the schools and their management inside the States. We are offering an endowment in aid of the resources and of the activities and of the desires of the different States. We are not undertaking to coerce in the least degree the acceptance or permission on the part of the States to meet and accept this proposition or to reject it. Then we are careful, after this endowment is pressed upon them and is accepted by them, to effect no other coercion, or persuasion, which is a better phrase for it, to use and employ these agencies and these resources which shall in the least enervate their domestic interests or break down the zeal and the virtue of their own endowments in the same direction.

Beyond that, although they protect their funds, their principal being supplemented or reduced by our added aggregate wealth, we also do not compel in the least that taxation for a dollar shall be pressed there beyond their present purposes and their present laws. We hold before them no compulsion that they shall raise from their own resources, by taxation or otherwise, an equal amount to that which we offer them.

We guard, then, on the one side and on the other against any encroachment upon the freedom and the ease of the States in meeting this endowment, first, by saving them from any fear that our endowment may check, or nip, or divert the growing zeal, and growing duty, and growing performance of duty among their own people by their own taxation. We say to them, "You are to receive from us under this distribution no more than you raise yourselves."

On the other hand, as I say, neither by undue excitement nor by any menace of withdrawing aid do we urge the taxation beyond the easy and proper assessments that may be laid. We say to the States, "Whatever you raise, and only that amount, you shall receive; and if you raise up to the amount that we offer, then you have a doubled fortune." So, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me, all this apprehension of the pressure on the people of Alabama, whom he so ably represents and defends in their institutions, in their policy, in their customs, in their tendencies, it seems to me, swings entirely free of the measure of this bill.

If the Senator should put it upon the ground that if a stimulant is offered to their activity, a support and aid to their own sacrifices and self-denials, and then comes in the double blessing of our endowment and their own stimulated activity, shall it be said for any State, shall it be said by any Senator representing a State, that that is a dangerous insinuation, a seductive and beguiling influence to proceed from our endowment?

Indeed, Mr. President, I can see no other result to that method of reasoning than a serious conclusion that it is better that things should remain as they are—a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to sleep. Those who look at the situation of illiteracy produced by occasions for which the States most to be affected by these endowments are not responsible in their voluntary action, it seems to me that those who look at the aspect that I do, should say that this is no time for anybody at the North or at the South to wish to fold his hands in sleep any longer. I believe that there is no time to deal with a discovered and a growing and a dangerous condition in education, in ignorance, in debasement, so good as the earliest time at which the mischief and the danger are appreciated.

But it is said that in undertaking to see by the provisions of the bill that the money appropriated from the Treasury of the United States, though committed to the whole agency of the States themselves, it should be committed to an agency that is already engaged by solemn obligations on the part of the States that the management and administration shall be conducted according to the purpose of the appropriation and to accomplish the result of it. If we can do that about a river and harbor bill, or any appropriation that we make for any material interest distributed through this wide country, we can retain the guaranties appropriate to the situation to secure the money that we appropriate at the points and in the manner and at the time suitable to accomplish the results.

We are brought back to the old question then, and the only question, whether we can deal properly with this matter of enlightenment, of instruction, of securing the suffrage against debasement and against oppression and fraud. After all the refinements of criticism which have fallen upon this measure, introduced and defended by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], it will be found, I think, in a candid judgment, that the objections go to the bottom of the scheme on the part of this Government to aid the States in relieving them from an oppression of ignorance which they are not themselves competent to deal with. Nor can we gather any instruction from the previous experience of this Government in leaving to the States the entire unaided administration of the subject of education.

Undoubtedly if there is anything which can be properly applied in our distribution of power between the State and the Federal authority, the subject of schools, school management, school regulations, is within the domestic interests of the State. No doubt that is so, and no doubt there must come some situation where it ceases to be a subject only of domestic regulation and domestic control, where the General Government and its resources and its administration of the scheme are to be invoked.

I will agree that outside of the general and liberal method by which to every nascent State we have given the means of education freely and richly out of the public domain, as to the growing States certainly upon the line of parallel where free labor alone was maintained, there could be no need; for if settlers were rude and if they were poor, every one of them carried with him the hope of ceasing to be rude, and the hope of not growing poor lay in the education which in their cradles at home had been the nursery of the wealth and the strength of the people about them. So, as the progress of population overran from the Southern States into other populations and other fertilities comporting with their own, the same system, the same methods, the same distribution of what was possible, and the same denial of education that was not possible, would find its way in these progressive waves of population out from the Southern States of the original thirteen.

But there have been some things done since then. Our Constitution, which adopted as its political citizens the citizens of the States, has now itself made by its original fiat the condition of citizens of the United States; and it has not only done so in that broad relation, but it has undertaken to fix the citizenship of every one within each State when it declares that the citizen of the United States, so pronounced by the amendments to the Constitution, shall be a citizen of that State in which he resides. There is a change at once at the basis of everything.

Besides that, we have undertaken to change the social relations at the South by the power of this Government, as first shown in war, and again in the amendment of the Constitution, and that, one of the greatest changes which ever took place in human affairs, and, as it were, after a long, and dark, and bloody struggle by force, peacefully now takes its place among the institutions of the country, to be cherished and defended and made vigorous and prosperous in the future pathway of our fame and glory.

We stand differently to that from what we did to those purely domestic nurseries of education which could fitly be cherished and strengthened by such resources as they in their own population could supply. Here we have not children as nature brings them into life to draw their early nutriment from the mother's breast and the father's protecting care, and not less in their hearts and minds than in their feeble bodies, but we have thrown upon a community covering a vast area and counting an immense population, people of all the ages from infancy to declining age, and they are all ignorant in the sense in which we would wish to have them adequate to citizenship and the duties of citizenship.

We see, too, that the great population to which I have referred is incapable of mingling in the streams of our posterity, however remote we may think of it, in the sense that they will be of the same blood and of the same nature; and now we are confronted with the proposition that either the communities upon whom these immense obligations and immense burdens are thus thrown are adequate to deal with them, now henceforth sufficiently full of them, and if that be so, thank God that no aid is needed from the general resources of the Government, or the alternative that this Government had power to accomplish so grave, so thorough, so universal, and so perpetual a change, and we have no methods and no weapons except those of war and of contumely, or of pharisaic preference of our superiority.

If the Constitution drives you and me, Mr. President, to these conclusions, let our consciences be clear; but we will appeal to the two Houses of Congress and we will appeal to the judgment of the people of the country whether this great power of the Federal Government towards these communities at the South has in it only the old-fashioned notions of hostility and of suppression. Senators must consider whether the old habits by which the old conditions of things made them tolerable and sensible remain tolerable and sensible under the changed aspect of this great population and great area of our common nation.

For myself I do not look with any complacency upon either that political scheme or that personal or social feeling which treats the situation at the South as the situation of the South. It is the situation of the United States, and there is not one near interest felt by those who are associated in the neighborhood and in the corelations of local and of State obligations and duties that is really nearer in a constitutional point of view or in the love of this common country of ours—that is nearer to it than the Senator from New Hampshire, or the Senator from Connecticut, or the Senator from Illinois who sits near me. It is our country, and while we talk about the superficial phrases of unity, let us understand that in bearing one another's burdens, and in covering one another's infirmities and corroborating everything and disparaging nothing is that unity in America at which we aim on one side and the other of the old divisions between the North and the South.

After all we must come back to it that somehow or other we are enchained by our Constitution, that we can deal only with material prosperity and not regard and not work at what is all material prosperity, all strength, and all power in this nation, in the hearts and minds of the first planters who landed on Plymouth, and in the great statesmen of the Revolutionary period whose names I quoted, for you have said and felt from the beginning that all this is but "tinkling brass and sounding cymbal" compared with a great, elevated, instructive, moral, dutiful people. I must find, then, some higher barrier for me to surmount before I can reckon among the faculties, the opportunities, and the duties which belong to the people of this country, that we shall be of one heart and of one mind; and that instead of being critical, instead of being supercilious, we are to hasten to bring gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, and place them on this altar of our common country, that the prayers which ascend from it may have an assurance of acceptance from being attended by a spirit of self-denial and of sacrifice.

As an impediment of an inferior character, and without offense to an opinion of the honorable Senator from Alabama to criticise his construction of the constitution of his own State, which, so far as I can see, he has raised as the principal obstruction, certainly of a grave character, to the acceptance by his State of the endowment which is offered by this bill, I will call attention to the phrase in the constitution of Alabama in which he thinks he finds an insuperable obstacle to producing any congruity between the provisions of this bill and the requirements of the Alabama constitution. His point was that we have provided that these endowments as they are supplied from year to year are to be distributed and managed and applied year by year, from time to time, under the regulations which are provided by the bill through the agencies of the State, and he thought he found in the constitution of Alabama an absolute and inexorable requirement that whatever came from the United States (and that covered in his judgment this form of aid that was administered) must be made an effectual and secure fund, not permitted to be distributed in actual enjoyment. If the courts of Alabama have passed upon this question, and have held in due form that the honorable Senator's construction of this clause of that constitution is the right one, and my observations and criticism shall have been already adjudicated insufficient, I shall need to apologize; but in the absence of any such adjudication I beg to ask the attention of the Senate to this obstacle that he raises. This is the clause:

The principal of all funds arising from the sale or other disposition of lands or other property—

"Funds arising from the sale or other disposition of lands or other property." That is the subject-matter which is disposed by the constitutional clause—which has been or may hereafter be granted or intrusted to this State—

That is, lands or other property, subject to sale—or given by the United States for educational purposes, shall be preserved inviolate.

What is that but the ordinary provision, where a fixed property in land or otherwise has been donated by the United States of America, that the fund must remain inviolate and the income only be used? But does this bill carry to them land or other fixed property donated in the form of a fund to remain, and the fund to give income? Not the least. Neither trait applies to this measure. This money is not land or property in that sense, and it is not to draw interest, nor can it draw interest. The requirement of this bill, the measure of it is that not a dollar which is to flow into a State through this bill is to be put at interest, or is to gain for a State her education in the future; it is for the time, as an original flow, not into a reservoir, but for irrigation that is wasted unless it is well applied.

So I must think this constitutional impediment in the State of Alabama does not exist, and yet the honorable Senator thought that we were entangled in a result which might impoverish or reduce the enjoyment by Alabama of any portion of the money thus to be distributed.

Beyond these impediments, I would ask the Senator from Alabama, or any other champion of opposition to this bill, if he would rather that we should have made these appropriations without the safeguards I have insisted upon? Would he have us on constitutional grounds, or on questions of preserving the moral integrity of the various States, make this appropriation without the State in its autonomy accepting and agreeing to it? This is a novel criticism upon the independence of the States, which we acknowledge to begin with. Should we then require it to be done by bill or joint resolution, and not left to educational societies or organizations of schools to accept these driblets from time to time? No, we have respected to the very last letter the integrity of the States, and leave it to them as an original question whether they will accept any portion of this endowment or not; and if there are moral, if there are social, if there are sentimental objections, very well, we go on our way increasing only the advantages which are given to other States that wish for them.

But the honorable Senator finds great occasion for objection to that clause, as if the State of Alabama would be coerced into taking it when they thought it would ruin them, because they feared that Georgia would get more. If Georgia is going to be ruined by taking more, why should not Alabama be quite unconcerned about Georgia, if Alabama had been virtuous enough to protect her population and her schemes of education from this corruption?

Then we go a little further into the general subject of education and at the bottom, in the exposition which very intelligently and very respectfully the Senator from Alabama has displayed before the Senate he thinks there is nothing so bad to the family as to have schools at the public expense. He thinks that it enervates the family circle and tie, and although he thinks that of the colored people is and has been looser than was and is desirable, yet there is some subtle way that when you have got a family thus loosely held together, either in the sense of filial piety or of paternal protection, and when both parents and children altogether are in the very abyss of ignorance, the only safe way down South is for the old colored people to lift the young people up!

Well, this family, moved out of sympathy and sentiment for the great relation of the family, seems to find no substantial support either in this whimsy that the old man will educate his sons if he knows that he can spare something from his whisky and his tobacco, and see the children coming up under the mild radiance of education, and he may become himself a school visitor and a member of the board, and that reacting agency on the motives of the parent is to be found an adequate remedy for all these dangers, so great enemies to the family relation.

But, Mr. President, we do not need to fear these chimeras, even if they were not impossible in the situation which I have adverted to as a need for agency of removing mischief. From the time that the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth, were they not endued with all the duties and affections of family, and was it not the first thing in the institution of that nascent community to declare that it was the interest of the state beyond and over and above that of the family, that it was the interest of the state, not that all should be learned, but that none should be ignorant? And they did not leave it to these sentiments of affection between parent and child, though they were in a pious community in which all these affections had been developed in the strongest and clearest light. They said the state can not suffer anybody to be ignorant while there is in the power of the state the means of wealth and the means of education. And now are we to be told that this great principle which no community in which these ideas spread ever could reject, and that now is just as much a part of the strength, morals, religious, intellectual love of liberty and knowledge of law, which can not fail, has caused us to run a terrible risk all these two hundred and fifty years lest the family relation should be endangered by public education?

Will you take Dakota or some remote, unsettled region that will make a new gospel of filial and paternal education that is to break down the common school, or will you take the hierarchical system of priestly education that shall break down the common school? I would not like to begin in any small settlement on the farthest frontier, I would not like to begin it in Massachusetts, which ought to know best on the subject from her long experience. We have arrived at a period where the people of this country have made up their minds that there shall be no ignorance where it is in the power of the State, and I may say the United States, to prevent it.

To be sure, a superintendent of schools in Worcester, of all places in the world and of all positions in public confidence and in public administration, has written a letter, has sent an arrow, a poisoned arrow, in favor of ignorance from that privileged center, an arrow that would have been wholly harmless if it had remained in the quiver of a New York newspaper. But a Senator has raised it with an encomium upon the writer, an encomium on principle, and he has launched from his strong bow this arrow that would otherwise have fallen harmless. I will let this gentleman represent his own view of the topic about which he is writing, and then see what his judgment is about that institution at home in which he prides himself, I dare say, or at least finds the means of influence and support in being a superintendent of common schools in Worcester. These are the reasons which this enlightened educator gives why it would do harm for us to give of our wealth towards public education at the South:

> In the first place, the people of the South have awakened to the necessity of public education, and they are at work actively and successfully in the right direction. It is only through this public, active interest that a good system of schools can be either established or maintained.

Agreed, but is not a little money to be used in this active and successful pursuit of knowledge? Is it not useful even in Massachusetts that a salary should be attached to the office of superintendent of schools? And is it not desirable that there should be some treasury from which these influences of material aid shall correspond with an active service? Why, Mr. President, that is the bottom of the movement where there is this activity, this desire, this hunger and thirst for education and knowledge, and we are to be told now by a superintendent of schools in Massachusetts "leave them to themselves." That is a noble condition of mind. Well, how long before that activity and that hunger will fail for want of means to accomplish the result within this generation, within this day, within our time? But the next reason:

> Secondly, the people of the Southern States are as able to establish their schools—

Listen, now, to this wise judgment of the great situation at the South and of the great and common condition of the Northern people:

> Secondly, the people of the Southern States are as able to establish their schools as any of the new Western States have been or are to-day, and as well able also as any of the older States were at the beginning. The argument that those States formerly slave are poorer than they were before the war by the value of the slaves is fallacious, since a free man is worth more, and not less, than a slave to any community.

These are the reasons of a superintendent of common schools about the similarity in the situation between the great population of the South as it lies before us under the social catastrophe that precipitated both poverty upon them and needs and burdens of education not proportioned to a growing community either early in New England or late in a frontier State. These are the ideas that the honorable Senator from Alabama has sought to educe under the great name of Mr. Marble to sustain his views about having the South let alone. But further:

> Thirdly, I feel sure that a large distribution of money from the surplus in the Treasury would not all find its way into the school-rooms, but would be to a large extent frittered away in the course of the distribution, and that instead of a healthy emulation to see who will do best in establishing schools of their own, and thus attracting business and population, as they do in the West and are doing in the South, there will arise a pernicious strife to see who can gobble up the largest share of the loaves and fishes.

Well, I leave that to be met by the representatives of the different communities.

Does the money drawn from the treasury of Massachusetts or of New York enervate or is it the subject of dilapidation? You talk of these great sums. The city of New York spends in education within its own city boundaries nearer four million than three million dollars a year, and that tax-burdened community, despoiled in many respects by worthless or corrupt applications, never grumbles about that school-tax. Any efforts that are made in a mere notion of economy and reducing the people's burdens never affect the school-tax. There is no question in the public opinion of the honesty and the intelligence of that distribution. When you have a condition of things where a State is impoverished and has a burden abnormal, wholly unsettled by the ignorance that is thrown upon it, are we to be turned off by namby-pamby talk, such as "Why, you will get along just as well as they do in New England and just as well as they do in the West?" It seems to me to be paltering with serious considerations to present these ideas. But last:

> Lastly, I oppose this move, as I do other innovations of similar injurious character, on the general principle that in this country it is the duty and the privilege of the individual to provide for himself and take care of himself; and it is not the duty of the Government to act the fond parent towards the people of this country. If the people can not take care of themselves, and if the Government must then take care of them, we reduce ourselves to an absurdity, since the Government is nothing but the expression of the people's will.

Look at the absurdity of such paltering from New England and a New England school and a New England superintendent, to say that the principle upon which this country has grown is that a man shall take care of himself, and that parental education is the proper mode to secure free and equal representation in politics and government. Good Heavens, what a fate, if we are to be crushed by paternal education through public schools! How have we ever managed to get along with this crushing weight of paternal education upon our shoulders for two hundred and fifty years!

No, Mr. President, the Senator has been too hasty in clothing with interest and dignity these strange lucubrations of a Worcester school superintendent. We shall not change our view about this bill on the arguments of Mr. Marble, although we may do so upon those of the Senator from Alabama.

Perhaps I have taken more time than I should in a somewhat discursive examination of the matter; but there was a question asked by the Senator from Texas, not now in his place, of the Senator from New Hampshire, when the credit—whatever it deserves—from the memorial of the Peabody trustees was the subject of consideration and question, whether this report under the eminent names of Mr. Stuart and the present Chief-Justice carried any such notion as that this mode of the introduction of means and the distribution for its application to the State was included in the observations of that report. Let me read from it:

> The only remaining points which seem to demand a passing notice from your committee are, first, the mode of administering the assistance; second, the extent to which it should be carried; and, third, the period for which it should be continued.

I take up the mode of administration:

> The experience of this board has demonstrated the propriety of using the officers connected with the school system of the respective States as agents in the application of the funds of the Peabody board to the purposes of the trust.

Now, mutatis mutandis, is not that, I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire, the method by which the aids of this Government are to be used and applied under the bill? Precisely.

> All the Southern States seem now to have awakened to a sense of the importance of a general system of free schools. Most of them have organized efficient systems of instruction so far as their limited means will allow them to go. Faithful and competent officers have in most instances been put in charge of them. These agencies are too important to be overlooked. Their employment, as means by which the bounty of Congress can be bestowed, is recommended by considerations of economy; and their use would tend also to avoid local jealousies and promote harmony and unity of action.

And, now, as to the education, so far as it is entered upon in this bill and which has been made a matter of comment, the Senator from Alabama expressing a wish that the people about him should not be so super-educated as they are in New Hampshire, let us see how this report under the great name of Thomas Jefferson enlarges upon the topic and the method that this system of public education should pursue:

> Thomas Jefferson, who in the latter part of his life bestowed much labor and thought upon the subject of popular education, in describing the proper subjects and limitations of primary education, says:
> "These objects would be—
> "To give to every citizen the information he needs for the transaction of his own business.
> "To enable him to calculate for himself, and to express and preserve his ideas, his contracts, and accounts in writing.
> "To improve, by reading, his morals and faculties.
> "To understand his duties to his neighbors and country, and to discharge with competence the functions confided to him by either.
> "To know his rights; to exercise with order and justice those he retains; to choose with discretion the fiduciary of those he delegates; and to notice their conduct with diligence, with candor, and judgment.
> "And, in general, to observe with intelligence and faithfulness all the social relations under which he shall be placed."
> To instruct the mass of our fellow-citizens in these their rights, interests, and duties as men and citizens, being then the objects of education in the primary schools, whether private or public, in them should be taught reading, writing, and numerical arithmetic, the elements of mensuration (useful in so many callings), and the outlines of geography and history.

Will that measure of instruction super-educate the people of Alabama? Is there such a complacent and complete assurance, as the thing now stands, that it is as dangerous to go a step higher as it would be to fall a step lower? I imagine we shall not hear much of any of the dangers which come from the degree of education that this bill undertakes to prescribe as conditions of the useful application of its funds.

And now, Mr. President, the great population of the South does not stand still. It has not stood still for two years or more that I have had a certain share of responsibility about this bill in this Chamber. It will not stand still for the next year. The tendency from gravitation, without resistance from reason and aim, will go on and on and on; and if education is not to dissipate this dark cloud of ignorance, then the cloud will grow darker and larger. If ignorance can not be lifted from that low level at which it now rests, it will not stay there, but go lower and lower, and it will become brutal and savage and hostile to society.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] if he desires to go on now. I wish the Senator to take the floor, but after he has taken the floor I desire to introduce a few figures before the adjournment.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on the bill now before it, but I prefer to do so to-morrow, as we have nearly reached the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to supplement the statements of the Senator from New York by referring to some figures as to the increase of the colored population at the South. At the same rate of increase which took place between 1870 and 1880 the colored population of the South to-day is not far from 9,000,000, and it will be at least 10,000,000 by the time the census of 1890 is taken.

In regard to the funds of the different States from which they now support their common schools, I read from the report of the superintendent of Nebraska, as quoted in the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1885–'86:

> Missouri.—Permanent fund, $10,284,000; annual interest on the permanent fund variable, sometimes reaching $800,000; minimum price of land, $1.25 an acre.
> Indiana.—Permanent fund, $6,328,690.89; annual interest, $665,262.11. The State has borrowed and pays interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on $3,904,783.21. The remainder is loaned on real estate at 8 per cent., and is managed by the county auditors.
> Minnesota.—Permanent fund, $7,250,000; annual interest, $335,000; minimum prices of lands by statutes of 1878, $5 per acre; estimated future of fund, $18,000,000.
> Iowa.—Permanent fund, $4,127,510; minimum price of land, $6 per acre, but may be sold at an appraised value not less than $1.25 per acre; fund distributed to the counties, which pay the State 6 per cent.
> Kansas.—Permanent fund, $4,000,000; estimated future maximum, $10,000,000; annual interest, $400,000; minimum price of land, $3 per acre.
> Michigan.—Permanent fund, $3,838,728.27; the annual interest amounts to $260,853.32; by the statutes of 1882 the minimum price of the common-school land was fixed at $4 per acre; the minimum price of the university lands was fixed at $12.
> Ohio.—Permanent fund, $3,826,171.27; estimated future maximum, $4,000,000; annual interest derived, $229,452.76.
> Wisconsin.—Permanent fund, $2,953,528.58.
> Tennessee.—Permanent fund ascertained and declared by law to be $2,512,000, which constitutes an irreducible debt of the State and bears 6 per cent. interest.
> Colorado.—Permanent school fund, $151,457.53; unsold land, 2,500,000 acres; minimum price of land, $2.50 per acre; the State pays interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on the permanent fund.
> Nebraska.—Permanent fund, $4,904,119.21; annual interest, $291,352.60; minimum price of land, $7 per acre; estimated future maximum fund, $20,000,000.

This shows the extent to which those States have already been assisted by benefactions of public property. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is not now in his seat, but I see the junior Senator [Mr. BATE], and therefore I will call his attention to a circumstance that both will recollect. The other day, when I included among the States that had sanctioned this bill by legislative action their own State, they both said it was otherwise, as they understood.

I have just received a letter addressed to myself, in which the writer says he saw what was said in reference to the Tennessee Legislature having passed a resolution instructing her Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for this bill, and goes on:

> I also noticed Senator HARRIS's denial of the same. I thought at the time your position was correct and that Mr. HARRIS was wrong. So I concluded to see Col. A. S. Colyar on the subject. He told me yesterday that you were correct. Colonel Colyar is editor of the Daily American, published at Nashville, and is one of the most influential men in our State, and stands first as a lawyer at the Nashville bar. There are a large number of people in Tennessee who are exceedingly interested in your educational bill, and would be very much rejoiced if you could get it through this session of Congress, etc.

He says further:

> The Blair bill is gaining friends daily, and would be universally indorsed were it not for Mr. HARRIS's influence, and only needs to be discussed to become so. He has great political power in this State, etc.

That is undoubtedly true. The writer speaks very complimentarily of the influence of the Senator [Mr. HARRIS], and he thinks the influence of that gentleman has had much to do with preventing expressions in favor of the bill. Further:

> I have heard men of some intelligence argue that the bill provides that "negroes and whites shall be educated together."

I merely call attention to the indorsement of the bill by the Legislature of Tennessee, which this writer states on the authority of Colonel Colyar.

Mr. BATE. I think the Senator from New Hampshire will find upon proper investigation that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] correctly stated the other day that that question has been repeatedly before the Legislature and no instructions given him. During the two preceding Legislatures I had no opportunity, as the executive, to pass upon it, for the resolution did not pass the Legislature, although introduced. Furthermore, the gentleman referred to—Colonel Colyar, and from whose letter he reads—is able, and has been earnest and enthusiastic in his advocacy of the Blair bill.

Mr. BLAIR. He states it on the authority of the Nashville American.

Mr. BATE. Yes, but he is the editor of the Nashville American. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires to know accurately about this matter the best way is to refer to the record of the Legislature o Tennessee. I am quite sure that my colleague is correct in his statement. As to his influence in the State that is deserved, but if I recollect aright Senator HARRIS never spoke on the bill, either against or in favor of it; but the people of their own volition have well defined their position on this measure, and during the last canvass in our State, although in some counties it was made quite an issue, scarcely a Democrat was elected to the Legislature who advocated it, and in my opinion it would be worse off to-day than heretofore so far as the number of its friends in the Legislature is concerned.

Mr. BLAIR. I have some information that does not seem to correspond with that of the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 1, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

SUPPORT OF CONVICTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Attorney-General of a deficiency in the appropriations for the support of convicts for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INSIDE DOORS, PENSION BUILDING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Commissioner of Pensions of an appropriation, to be immediately available, for inside doors of the Pension Office building; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN AGENT, MACKINAC AGENCY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommending that the compensation of the agent at the Mackinac agency be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC-LAND SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional estimates from the Secretary of the Interior for the public-land surveys for the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REVETMENT WORK ON WILLAMETTE RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from the Chief of Engineers in relation to the proposed revetment of the Willamette River, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of expenditures from the contingent fund of that Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting his annual report for 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT KENNEBEC AND PENOBSCOT RIVERS, MAINE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports of examinations and surveys of the Kennebec and Penobscot Rivers, in Maine; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS, ETC., REFERRED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, laid before the House Senate bills and a concurrent resolution; which were referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 191) to make an additional appropriation for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the late John A. Logan—to the Committee on Printing;

The bill (S. 455) for the relief of Andrew J. Lindsay—to the Committee on the Judiciary; and Concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 20,000 copies of the first annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with appendices—to the Committee on Printing.

INVESTIGATION OF THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the House that the resolution in relation to the investigation of the Printing department of the Government, passed on yesterday, seems to be in the form of a standing committee with two additions, which the Chair thinks is anomalous. It should be denominated a special committee, consisting of the Committee on Printing and two additional members; and in order to make the matter formal, the Chair would suggest that the committee be known as a special committee. It can not be a standing committee, and must be something else. Therefore, if there be no objection, the Chair will cause it to be entered upon the record as such.

The Chair will name the two additional members to constitute the special committee, and appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BACON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BARRY, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WOODBURN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER AT JEFFERSON.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill I send to the desk, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2006) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Jefferson, Mo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Unless the reading of this bill is called for I will state that it is in the usual form, and is identical with the bills which the House has been passing heretofore without objection. It covers all the points insisted upon by the War Department, and I ask consent to dispense with its reading.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the bill?

Mr. BLAND. It provides for building a bridge across the Missouri at or near Jefferson.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this bill been reported by the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. BLAND. It has been favorably reported by the committee, and is now on the Private Calendar.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES BARNES AND OTHERS.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 436) for the relief of James Barnes, Joab Williams, and William Titus be taken from the Private Calendar and be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named persons the sums hereinafter mentioned:

To James Barnes, of Ogalalla, Keith County, Nebraska, the sum of $20.

To Joab Williams, of Ogalalla, Keith County, Nebraska, the sum of $20.

To William Titus, of Ogalalla, Keith County, Nebraska, the sum of $20.

The above-named to receive the sums mentioned in full compensation for damages sustained by reason of the destruction of crops by mules belonging to the command of Colonel Forsythe, Seventh United States Cavalry, in August, 1877.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope a word of explanation will be given in regard to it.

Mr. DORSEY. When Colonel Forsythe, in command of the Seventh Cavalry, was moving from Fort Meade, Dak., to Fort Riley, Nebr., he stopped over night at Ogalalla, Nebr., August 15, 1877. The mules of his command were being herded on the prairie. A passing train frightened them and they broke away and destroyed the crops belonging to the men whose names appear in the bill.

Under our State law the owner of the crops might have impounded the mules and held them for such damage as might be ascertained by three men until paid by the Government. Colonel Forsythe gave the necessary papers to these gentlemen to prosecute their claims before the Treasury Department. The Comptroller reports that while the claim is just and valid he can not pay it to these parties. So we come here for relief. It is a matter of about $65. That is all the sum that is involved in this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is all right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DORSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY BY COL. W. E. MERRILL.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House a survey, or copy thereof, made by Col. William E. Merrill, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, or under his direction, of the harbor of the city of Madison, Ind., and portions of the Ohio River connected therewith, and plat thereof, if such survey and the plat thereof have been completed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTER TO BARK NORDSTJERNEN.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill which I send to the desk be considered and passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5352) to grant an American register to the foreign-built bark Nordstjernen.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue an American register to the foreign-built bark Nordstjernen, wrecked or disabled in or near the waters of the United States and towed into a port thereof; said vessel having been condemned and ordered to be sold, and bought by citizens of the United States, by whom said vessel has been repaired at an expense of more than five-sixths of the present cost thereof.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries whether the report in this case has been printed?

Mr. DUNN. I have asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill. The report is at the Clerk's desk. If the gentleman from New Jersey desires it to be read, I will ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is satisfactory.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. I ask if the statute does not already cover this case? I understand the statute allows such vessels to receive an American register where the expenditure is two-thirds of the value of the vessel.

Mr. DUNN. That is, provided the wreck occurred within American waters. In this case there was a doubt whether it was within the jurisdiction of the United States or not, and the Treasury Department resolved that doubt against the vessel instead of in its favor.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill is all right. It simply covers a technical point.

Mr. BREWER. That is satisfactory.

The bill was passed.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6363) regulating the granting of pensions to certain disabled soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARY EVERINGHAM BROWN.

Mr. FORD. I ask unanimous consent to take up for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 880) granting a pension to Mary Everingham Brown. This is a bill to pension an army nurse who is now old, poor, and helpless, and liable to become a public charge. The bill has been considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A MEMBER. Has the committee reported favorably?

Mr. FORD. The committee has made a unanimous report in its favor. This is a meritorious case and I hope the bill will be passed at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FORD. I find upon examination that although recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions yesterday it has not been reported to the House. I ask unanimous consent, however, to put the bill on its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. That can not be done, since the bill is not here.

Mr. FORD. Then I withdraw my request for the present.

TARIFF ON IRON, ETC.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of citizens of Johnson City, Tenn., of both political parties, protesting against the reduction of the tariff on iron, coke, ores, etc.; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. The petition is as follows:

Resolutions unanimously adopted at a meeting of citizens in Johnson City, January 25, 1888.

Whereas the development of the iron industries of Tennessee is the only hope that we have in the future for the growth and prosperity of this section; and

Whereas a bill is now being prepared, with the approval of the Ways and Means Committee in Congress, by which it is proposed to remove the duties on soft coal, coke, iron, and ores, and to reduce the duties on manufactured articles relating to that great industry; and

Whereas the passage of that bill will inevitably result in the destruction of our great and growing iron and coal interests: It is therefore,

Resolved, That we do most earnestly protest against the passage of such bill, and earnestly urge upon the Representatives in Congress from the State of Tennessee that they use their every effort to prevent the passage of such bill.

And be it further resolved, That the sentiments of this meeting be taken in the form of petitions, and these resolutions, together with such petitions, shall be forwarded to the Representatives in Congress from the State of Tennessee, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

J. C. HARDIN, Chairman.
J. J. WEILER, Secretary.

JOHNSON CITY, TENN., January 25, 1888.

To the Honorable Representatives and Senators of the Fiftieth Congress:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Johnson City, Tenn., in mass-meeting assembled, without regard to party affiliations, do petition your honorable body that no measures shall be passed effecting a reduction of the present existing tariff upon iron, iron ore, or coal.

[Signed by 72 Democrats and 77 Republicans.]

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, the Committee on Printing was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4985) to prohibit certain printing by authority of the United States, and it was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

GEORGE W. HARRISON.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4842) to remove the political disabilities of George W. Harrison, of Hoboken, N. J.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORRIS A. BROWNE.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5859) to remove the political disabilities of Orris A. Browne, of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PAUL F. FAISON.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4694) to remove the political disabilities of Paul F. Faison; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARIA SYPHAX.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3441) declaratory of the meaning of the act entitled "An act for the relief of Maria Syphax;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS, ALABAMA.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4470) to regulate the jurisdiction of the United States district judges of the courts over which they preside in the State of Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL-BANK DEPOSITS IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. DINGLEY, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2012) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to invest the lawful money deposited in the Treasury in trust by national banking associations for the retirement of their circulating notes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

READING RAILROAD TROUBLES.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a substitute for the resolution offered by Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, on the 16th of January, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, providing for an investigation by that committee of the Reading Railroad troubles with reference to their effect upon interstate commerce; and moved that the substitute be referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, there is a statement of the views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce in regard to the Reading lock-out which they desire to submit. One of the members of the committee who unites with the minority has not yet signed the statement, but he will do so, and I want to give notice now that I propose to call the matter up later in the day.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Chair whether this proposition coming from the Committee on Commerce is in the nature of an inquiry under the rule so as to be entitled to a privileged status here. I ask the Chair to rule whether it is an inquiry of that nature, or whether it is outside of the range of privileged resolutions of inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolutions of inquiry contemplated by the rule are directed to the President, or to heads of Departments, and have a certain privilege, but this is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. What I ask is that the Chair will rule on that very point, whether this is or is not privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the Chair understands it, this resolution is not privileged; and the gentleman reporting it does not so claim. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] asks that the views of the minority may be printed with the report of the committee.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee and the views of the minority be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order. Even unanimous consent would not make it in order in this hour.

The substitute was referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. CLARDY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; and they were severally referred as indicated:

The bill (H. R. 1373) prohibiting the purchase of goods which are in whole or in part manufactured by convict labor—to the Committee on Labor.

The bill (H. R. 4458) for the construction of a bridge across the Big Wind River, on the Shoshone Indian reservation, in the Territory of Wyoming—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 5671) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

BRIDGES OVER MUSKINGUM RIVER, OHIO.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4327) regulating the construction of bridges over the Muskingum River, in Ohio; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PORT OF LAMBERTON, N. J.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1640) to change the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY E. HOPKINS.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4002) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LAND IN AUSTIN, TEX., FOR EDUCATION.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2993) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Austin, Tex., a tract of land in said city for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 4304) to amend the postal laws; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back adversely the bill (H. R. 4336) regulating rates of postage on second-class mail matter at letter-carrier offices. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] desires to submit a minority report on this subject; I therefore ask that the bill be placed on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, leave will be granted for the filing of a minority report, and the bill will be referred to the House Calendar.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BLOUNT also, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4910) to amend section 14 of the act approved March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," and relating to second-class mail matter; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first-named act; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHITE], not now present, desires to present hereafter the views of a minority of the committee on this subject. I ask that this privilege may be allowed, and that the minority views, when presented, be printed with the report of the majority.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PROCEEDS OF PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McKENNA, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (S. 418) granting to the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON. I desire permission to file a minority report in this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

LAND DISTRICTS IN OREGON.

Mr. HERMANN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 1762) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BLACK BOB BAND OF SHAWNEE INDIANS.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. 6364) to provide for the sale of land allotted and patented to certain members of the Black Bob band of Shawnee Indians, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS. There was no bill on this subject referred to this committee, but the attention of the committee was called to the subject by an executive document, and on that executive document this bill has been reported to the House.

CHOCTAW COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4643) to authorize the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOEL J. GOSS.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill for the relief of Joel J. Goss; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. BROKENSHAW.

Mr. CHIPMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 418) granting a pension to William H. Brokenshaw; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY EVERINGHAM BROWN.

Mr. CHIPMAN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 880) granting a pension to Mary Everingham Brown; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MISS CAPPIE HARSH.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5766) granting a pension to Miss Cappie Harsh, daughter of Daniel Harsh; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. JOHNSTON.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 221) increasing the pension of John C. Johnston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY S. LOGAN.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3191) granting a pension to Mary S. Logan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the minority of the committee in the two cases just reported be allowed to file their views, and also that their views be ordered to be printed with the majority reports.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

APOLLINE A. BLAIR.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 574) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apolline A. Blair; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the minority of the committee be allowed to file their views in that case and that they be ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ELIZA J. CURRIER.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 441) granting a pension to Eliza J. Currier; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EVERARD FLYNN.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4835) for the relief of Everard Flynn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HANNAH C. DE WITT.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 823) granting a pension to Hannah C. De Witt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. ESTHER B. HAYFORD.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 369) granting a pension to Mrs. Esther B. Hayford; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY MORFORD.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 806) for the relief of Mary Morford; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JULIETTE STONE.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions (by Mr. GALLINGER), reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 628) granting a pension to Juliette Stone; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HARRIET V. STOCKTON.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3711) granting a pension to Harriet V. Stockton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES WOODY.

Mr. SCULL, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2806) to increase the pension of James Woody; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JACOB CRAMER.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 855) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob Cramer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BLISS. A number of bills have been referred to the Committee on Pensions which I am instructed by that committee to report back for reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which they belong.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the change of reference be made through the petition-box. If made in open House it puts them in a position to which they are not entitled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The changes will be made through the petition-box.

WASHINGTON L. PARVIN AND OTHERS.

Mr. HIESTAND, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4900) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Green; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF MISSOURI MILITIA.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 473) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be examined certain vouchers filed, or to be filed, by the State of Missouri, or her agent or agents, for sums claimed to be due from the Government of the United States on account of payments made by said State since April 22, 1882, to the officers and enlisted men of her militia forces, for military services rendered to the United States in the suppression of the rebellion, as evidenced by the proper pay-rolls heretofore filed with, examined, and accepted by the Government of the United States, and to report to Congress; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I am also instructed by the committee to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would ask if this resolution was referred to the gentleman's committee?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It is a resolution which I am instructed by the committee to report to the House and ask its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can make that request at another time, but not in this hour, as it is not a resolution which was originally referred to the committee and now reported back.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Very well; I will withhold the resolution for the present.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that on Friday last the consideration of private bills on the Calendar was objected to. Two of those bills were referred, by the action of the House, to the Committee on War Claims. The committee now finds itself in possession of a bill in one of these cases, and have instructed me to report it back to the House favorably, and ask that it be allowed to take the place upon the Calendar that it occupied before its reference to the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that would be a very dangerous precedent in this hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair could not entertain that proposition in this hour. It would probably lead to debate and would not be in order. However, the Chair will ask if there be consent to the request, as the Chair can not regulate the Calendar of the House.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I suppose the House could fix the order of its business on the Calendars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BLOUNT and others objected.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Then I will withdraw the report for the present.

FIDUS LIVERMORE.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3758) for the relief of the legal heirs of Fidus Livermore, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

N. C. PERKINS.

Mr. CROUSE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 2917) for the relief of N. C. Perkins, administrator; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTHORNE, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES MILLINGER.

Mr. PENINGTON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 31) for the relief of James Millinger; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

B. M. M. PARISH.

Mr. PENINGTON also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 322) for the relief of B. M. M. Parish; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LAURA E. MADDOX AND OTHERS.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 6365) for the relief of Laura E. Maddox, widow and executrix, and Robert Morrison, executor of Joseph H. Maddox, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NEW MADRID, MO., LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. LATHAM, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4556) to confirm the New Madrid location survey, No. 2889, and to provide for the issue of patent therefor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the joint resolution (H. Res. 62) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Labor with the recommendation that it lie on the table, and that there be adopted a concurrent resolution as a substitute therefor.

The proposed substitute was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT FOR 1886 AND 1887.

Mr. HIESTAND, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the concurrent resolution to authorize the publication of the Smithsonian report for the years 1886 and 1887; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF READING RAILROAD.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, filed his individual views as a minority report on the proposed investigation touching the alleged interference of the Reading Railroad with interstate commerce; which was ordered to be printed with the report of the majority of the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now call committees for one hour for the consideration of bills.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire under instructions of the committee to call up the House resolution in relation to fixing a day for the consideration of business of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, February 21, 1888, after the hour for the consideration of bills reported from committees, be fixed for the consideration of such bills as may be indicated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the bills reported by said committee, and that this order shall continue from day to day until the House shall otherwise order, not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills or prior special orders.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to offer a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. But before the gentleman from Texas offers the substitute, I make the point of order that this resolution is an amendment to the rules of the House, and should have been referred originally to the Committee on Rules, and that it comes here without the jurisdiction of the committee that has jurisdiction of the subject; and that it can only be considered by unanimous consent in the House.

Mr. MILLS. That point of order is made too late.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; this is the first time the resolution has been called up for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that there may perhaps be an arrangement made as to this.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not want to yield the point of order on these matters, because it is very important. Here we are beginning what we did last session through the Committee on Rules always. Now we are advancing another step and allowing a committee to make a proposition to amend the rules and then come in during the consideration hour and get the resolution passed by a majority vote when it ought to have gone to the Committee on Rules, which has charge of this thing.

If we allow such resolutions to be referred to committees on Monday during the call for resolutions, and then let such a resolution be called up in the consideration hour, committees by a majority vote can fix all the time of this House from now until the middle of summer for the consideration of bills out of their order. Why have we a code of rules at all, if each committee can come through this channel and ask the House to change the rules and assign special orders for the consideration of business?

Mr. MILLS. I think the objection might have been good if it had been made in time. But the House has already spent some time in the consideration of this subject, and I think we have reached a point when an understanding may be arrived at.

Mr. RANDALL. In confirmation of what has just been stated by the gentleman from Texas, I desire to say that the point made by the gentleman from Illinois, to my mind, is properly made. But this matter was discussed fully. There was a controversy over it; and I ask the gentleman from Illinois not to embarrass the Chair by making this point on this particular occasion. I will co-operate with him and be as watchful as I know how on all future occasions in like cases, and see that all such propositions go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. I hope the consideration for any trafficking that is going on upon the other side of the House may be stated more distinctly.

Mr. RANDALL. I am unable to hear what the gentleman from Maine is saying.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I could get the consensus of the Committee on Rules, I would be glad to have it. I should like to have the co-operation of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I do not know what the consensus would be under such circumstances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from South Carolina if the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds by the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. It was referred to the committee, was reported back, and is now in possession of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was not that reference made during the call of States on Monday for the introduction of resolutions?

Mr. DIBBLE. It was not, sir; but it was on the House Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. I mean when it was introduced into the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. It was introduced regularly on the call of States.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order, whatever it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This resolution was referred to the committee by the House, and they have a right to report it back. The only exceptions under the new rule are as to petitions and private bills. The Chair will have read the rule which applies.

The Clerk read as follows, from clause 2 of Rule XXII:

And an erroneous reference of a petition or private bill under this clause shall not confer jurisdiction upon the committee to consider or report the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That refers to private bills only, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to ask whether, in the judgment of the Chair, this is not changing the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would not consider it a change of the rules. The rules require a reference to a committee; that reference has been made, and the resolution is now reported back in pursuance of that reference.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am speaking of the effect of the resolution itself; I ask the Chair whether the resolution does not change the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair repeats what he has already said. This resolution was referred by the House, under the rules, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is not a private petition or memorial or a private bill, and therefore it can be reported back by the committee, as it has been, and the Chair thinks it is now in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Chair has not answered my question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What the Chair has said implies an answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. SPRINGER. My question is whether this resolution does not work a change in the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided the point.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the substitute which I have offered be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday the 21st, Wednesday the 22d, Thursday the 23d, Saturday the 25th, and Tuesday the 28th days of February, after the hour for the consideration of bills, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; that during said days at 5 o'clock p. m. the House shall adjourn; that no dilatory motions shall be entertained by the Chair while the House is considering any of said bills, and that thirty minutes' debate shall be allowed on each bill, fifteen minutes of which shall be given to those supporting, and fifteen minutes to those opposing the bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas will be accepted by the committee in place of the resolution which they have reported.

The substitute was adopted.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. I think, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the time for observation has passed, only I am glad to see the Democratic House change the rules in the same manner that seemed so violent to them in election cases. It shows that they progress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PUBLIC BUILDING, GREENVILLE, S. C.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration House bill No. 1805, to provide for a public building at Greenville, S. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase, or otherwise procure, a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Greenville, in the State of South Carolina, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, internal-revenue office, and for other Government uses. The site and building thereon, when completed, upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $100,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000 for site and building: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys, shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of South Carolina shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same for all purposes, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. DIBBLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. PERRY].

Mr. PERRY. A similar bill to this has passed the House some half dozen times, and has failed to become a law only for want of time. The report of the committee states the facts upon which the appropriation is asked for. A term of court is held at Greenville, and has been held there for several years; the district attorney, the district judge, the circuit judge, the grand jury at every term of the court have all reported that a building is absolutely necessary. There is a deputy collector there; there are two United States commissioners and a United States marshal, and a very large amount of business is done in the United States courts at every term. The regular term of the court is held in August, and it has been necessary to hold an extra term every year in February. All these facts are stated in the report of the committee, and unless some gentleman desires to make some further inquiry in regard to the matter, I ask that the bill be put upon its passage. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

A MEMBER. What is the population of the town?

Mr. PERRY. About 10,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. DIBBLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1805) for a public building at Greenville, S. C., having had the same under consideration, begs leave to report as follows:

That similar bills were introduced in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses, and in each instance were reported favorably; in the Forty-sixth Congress the bill was reported favorably by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and had passed the Senate, and in each Congress failed to become a law only from the crowded state of the Calendars.

The grounds in favor of this bill are briefly as follows:

The city of Greenville is the third city in population and importance in the State of South Carolina, and is rapidly increasing in both particulars, an official census, recently taken, showing an increase of population when compared with the census 1880 of over 25 per cent. It is the largest city in the western district of South Carolina, and is in the center of said district and in easy railroad communication with every section of it, by lines converging to and crossing each other at that point.

The United States court, exercising district court and circuit court powers, is held there regularly, and at no other point in the western district, embracing one-half of the State. So large is the amount of business there transacted that its dispatch has required, during the last few years, an extra term of the court every year in addition to the regular terms designated by statute. The late United States district attorney, in a letter on the subject, says:

"A Government court-house is a necessity. More than two-thirds of the business of the United States in this State is done in the district court at that place (i. e., at Greenville). The dockets contain from four hundred to seven hundred cases for trial.

"The United States courts are now held in the county court-house, where there are no accommodations at all suited for the United States."

The district judge upon this subject says:

"There is next to no accommodation for our officers—marshal and his deputies, clerk and his deputies—and no provision at all for the safe, methodical, and decent care of the process and papers of the court."

The circuit judge (Judge Bond) says:

"It is a disgrace to the country to hold the court there in the way it is now done. And I despair of making any of the court's proceedings effective or impressive while it is held in a hired building not under its own control."

The present United States district attorney says:

"Should the South Carolina Legislature change the time for holding the State courts for Greenville County so as to conflict with the time fixed by law for holding the district court of the United States, the United States Government would have no place to hold its court."

There is equal necessity for suitable accommodations for the postal business. As far back as 1879, 326,570 packages of mail matter were handled, and since that time the volume of mail matter has largely increased with the growth of the city. The post-office at present is kept in a rented building, and rents are continually advancing, increasing the expense of a suitable rented building year after year. The postmaster says:

"It is inadequate to the increasing business."

In view of the foregoing facts your committee recommends that the sum of $100,000 be fixed as the limit of cost of the site and building provided for by the bill under consideration. In the judgment of the committee the sum mentioned will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide a building which will afford ample room for the present and prospective needs of the Government without a further appeal to Congress for an extension of the limit of cost.

Your committee therefore recommends that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ASHEVILLE, N. C.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call up for consideration the next bill on the Calendar, the bill (H. R. 1697) for the erection of a public building in the city of Asheville, N. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a suitable site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story, for the use and accommodation of the courts of the United States, post-office, and other offices of the Government, at Asheville, N. C. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $150,000, which said sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor place for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $80,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building independent and unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of North Carolina shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. DIBBLE. There is an amendment reported by the committee to this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. If my memory serves me correctly, this is a bill which was vetoed at the last session of Congress by the President of the United States.

A MEMBER (to Mr. RANDALL). You need not say anything about that.

Mr. RANDALL. A gentleman suggests to me that I need not say anything about that. I withdraw my inquiry. [Laughter.]

The report (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, having had House bill 1697 under careful consideration, submit the following report:

A similar bill having been favorably recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Forty-ninth and prior Congresses, and your committee having, after careful consideration, arrived at the same conclusion, adopt said reports, which are hereto annexed, embodying therein such alterations and further statements of facts as the changed circumstances which have been caused by the constant and rapid growth of said city since the adoption of said reports have rendered necessary.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, with the following amendments:

In line 12 strike out the words "and fifty."

In line 23 strike out the word "eighty" and insert the words "one hundred."

[House Report No. 391, Forty-ninth Congress.]

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, having had House bill 1697 under careful consideration, submit the following report:

A similar bill providing for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C., passed the Senate of the Forty-sixth, the Forty-seventh, and the Forty-eighth Congresses, and in each of said Congresses received a favorable report from the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but failed to pass because it was not reached on the House Calendar.

As your committee, after careful consideration, have arrived at the same conclusion, they annex herewith a copy of the report of the committee of the Forty-eighth Congress for information, and which they adopt as part of this report, with the following additional statement of facts as ascertained by this committee, namely:

That since the date of said report the Asheville and Spartanburgh Railroad therein mentioned has been completed, and the branch of the Western North Carolina Railroad is now running within a short distance of the North Georgia line; that the shops and offices of said railroad company are to be located in said city; that among other costly buildings constructed in said city there is now being built a large hotel at a cost of $100,000 [the capacity of which has since been doubled, and a large cotton factory has also recently been completed and other factories are to be built]; that the population, business, and wealth of the city are rapidly and constantly increasing [the assessed value of the property has nearly quadrupled in the last four years, and the population since 1880 has increased about same proportion. The revenue from the post-office has so increased since this report was made as to entitle the city to free delivery under the act of 1887]; that the rents of the offices and buildings used by the Government are also increasing; that on account of the establishment of additional State courts held in said city it often occurs that the terms of the United States circuit and district courts conflict with those of the State courts, in which case the United States courts are held in some other hall, at much inconvenience and annoyance; that the business of the United States circuit and district courts has increased; that there being no spare rooms in the county court-house, the office of the clerk of said courts, together with all their records, have necessarily been removed to rooms in the second story of a brick building at a distance from the court-house, where they are without protection, and in case of fire their destruction would be inevitable.

The State court-house, in which the United States courts are at present held, has been presented by the grand jury of that court as being too small and inconvenient to accommodate the court and its officers, and that the noise and confusion caused by its bad construction and immediate proximity to one of the principal thoroughfares of the city constantly interrupt the transaction of the public business, and at times cause a suspension of court proceedings.

"[House Report No. 1298, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds submit the following report upon the bill (H. R. 1125) to provide for a public building at Asheville, N. C.:

"By the act of June 4, 1872, the State of North Carolina was divided into two judicial districts, Asheville being situate in about the center of the 'western district.' This division divides the State, as to territory and population, about equally, there being forty-five counties in the western district, comprising an area about 300 miles in length and about an average of 150 miles in width. The business done in the United States courts at Asheville comes from about thirty counties of the district, the balance of the district going to Greensborough, Statesville, and Charlotte.

"There is no Government building within this vast territory west of Greensborough, the almost entire body of the western district being west of Greensborough.

"Much the largest portion of the business of the district, both criminal and civil, is done at Asheville, being the central point. The report of the Attorney-General shows that the causes pending in the 'western district,' in which the Government is a party, are largely in excess of those pending in the 'eastern district.' It appears that while the court is held in four places in the said western district, the greater portion is done at Asheville, there being as many as from four hundred to five hundred cases on the docket at that place at one time.

"The city of Asheville, with its adjacent growing villages, has a population of from 6,000 to 8,000, and now rapidly increasing in consequence of its peculiar geographical and commercial position.

"The Western North Carolina Railroad reaches Asheville, and there diverges, one branch going north, via Knoxville, and within eighteen hours' run of Louisville, Ky., the other going west toward the North Georgia line; while the Asheville and Spartanburgh Railroad only wants the completion of 20 miles to connect Asheville with Charleston, S. C., by a travel of twelve hours or less. Asheville is, therefore, the center of this great western portion of North Carolina through which the great railroad lines mentioned must pass. Other railroads are in progress destined to reach this point.

"Asheville is a great summer resort, having several of the finest hotels in the State, and is easily accessible from all directions.

"Sixty or seventy mercantile establishments, including several wholesale houses, are being supported in the city. There are four or five large warehouses for the sale of leaf-tobacco, while several tobacco manufactories are engaged in the manufacture of tobacco. It is the center and terminus of nine different mail routes, and the post-office receipts and disbursements, including the money-order business, amount to about $128,000 annually. The Post-Office Department, the internal-revenue department, and the judiciary department all have offices, kept from year to year, in the city, at an estimated cost of $—— for rents. It appears that the district and circuit courts are held twice in each year, and that the State courts have in some instances given way to accommodate the United States courts.

"The committee are of the opinion that it would be economy in the Government to erect a building, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. REED. I would like to know whether the other bills which were vetoed by the President are to be presented.

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] can probably explain wherein this bill may not be obnoxious to the President's objections, as the other bill was. Besides, since the last session of Congress the President has visited Asheville and has seen for himself the growth and greatness of that mountain city.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to know the population of the place.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Between eight and ten thousand—about the same as Greenville, S. C., for which a bill was just passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments reported by the committee and just read as a part of the report.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. The two amendments are to the same effect; they limit the expenditure to $100,000; that is all.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SPRINGFIELD, MO.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, United States land office, and the United States Signal Service, and for other Government uses at Springfield, in the State of Missouri. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $100,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Missouri shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The report (by Mr. WADE) is as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred House bill No. 1611, beg leave to submit the following report:

The city of Springfield is the metropolis of Southwest Missouri. It is 240 miles from St. Louis, 200 from Kansas City, and 360 from Memphis, Tenn.; has six lines of railroad, which make tributary to it a large territory unsurpassed in agricultural, mineral, stock-raising, and timber resources. Its wholesale trade extends over Southwest Missouri, Northwest Arkansas, and the Indian Territory, and amounts to several millions yearly. It has four national and three private banks, three lines of street railroads, electric lights, and gas and water works. Its educational advantages are unsurpassed. Drury College and Lorretta Academy furnish the higher education, while the public schools, with eight large buildings and a corps of sixty-five teachers, supply those seeking a common-school education with facilities to that end unsurpassed in the nation.

The manufacturing, milling, and lumber interests of Springfield are extensive and rapidly growing. The shops of two great trunk-line railroads, namely, the Kansas City, Springfield and Memphis, and the St. Louis and San Francisco, are located here, which employ over two thousand men.

The city of North Springfield was incorporated with Springfield last spring, giving the city a population of more than 20,000, making it the fourth city in population in the State. Its location and commercial advantages and manufactures will, in the near future, increase its population to 50,000, and raise it to the rank of third city in the State.

The postal service of Springfield employs, since the consolidation of the office of North Springfield with it on 1st of the present month, fifteen persons. The gross receipts of the Springfield post-office for the year 1886 (including North Springfield) were over $23,000, an increase of over $4,000 from last report.

The rent paid for building for post-office is $1,050; for land office, $300; signal office, $300; United States court-room and offices, $1,200 (this item is paid by Greene County), making a total expenditure for rent for buildings in Springfield for Government use of $2,850.

A bill for a Government building at Springfield was passed last Congress and vetoed by the President on the grounds that no rent was paid for the building used as a post-office, and that there was no United States court there. Since then a United States court has been established there, the post-offices of Springfield and North Springfield consolidated, and rent sufficient is now being paid to warrant the Government in erecting a building, leaving out of consideration the better facilities for transacting the business. In view of the facts set forth, and in consideration of the necessity for a building sufficient to meet the wants of the Government, we recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MONROE, LA.

Mr. DIBBLE. I next call up the bill (H. R. 1483) for the erection of a public building at Monroe, La.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Monroe, in the State of Louisiana, a suitable, substantial, and commodious public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, internal-revenue, land, and other Government offices: Provided, That no money appropriated for said building shall be expended until a valid title to the site selected shall be vested in the United States, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, nor until the State of Louisiana shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same for all purposes during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of said State, and the service of civil process therein. The plans and estimates for said building shall first be prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the cost shall not exceed $100,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the same herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. And no purchase of site nor plan of said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000, which sum is hereby appropriated for the same, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. NEWTON], if he desires to explain this bill.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. NEWTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred House bill 1483, submit the following report:

Monroe is the largest and most important town (or city) in the State of Louisiana north of Red River. It is situated on the Ouachita River at the junction of the Vicksburgh, Shreveport and Texas Pacific Railroad. It is a large shipping port for both, and largely controls the commerce of the same, amounting annually to from fifteen to twenty millions by the river alone. It has several large and extensive industries. Two or three important lines of railroad are projected through the city.

There is no public building at Monroe belonging to the General Government. The necessity for one is great. The importance of having one for the use of the United States courts (which have more business at Monroe than at the other three places where courts are held in the western district of Louisiana) is attested by the following extracts from letters of the judge and chief clerk of the United States court which sits there, the same being on file with your committee.

In a letter from the judge of said court, he says:

"The United States court sessions held at Monroe are the most important in the district; we try more cases there than we do at all the other places in which we have court. The court is in session at Monroe about three months of the year, and is busily engaged during the whole time. I do not now remember the number of suits on the docket at Monroe, but I expect to be engaged there at the April term for six or eight weeks.

"Monroe is in a rich and populous part of the district, and its proximity to that part of the Mississippi River which divides Mississippi from Louisiana will always induce most of the litigation in the United States courts for the western district of Louisiana to be disposed of at Monroe. The Government rents a large room for holding sessions of the court at Monroe, but provides nothing else in the way of accommodations for the officers of the court. The clerk has no office, and the papers filed in the court are at the mercy of all sorts of accidents. The marshal has no office; I do not know how he keeps or takes care of his papers."

[Extract from letter of chief clerk.]

"I write to urge the necessity of an appropriation for the erection of a public building (United States court-house) at this place.

"The business in the United States courts here is constantly increasing, and as a matter of fact, which can be substantiated by the court records, there are a larger number of cases on the docket at this place than at all the other points in the district combined.

"In the building (Masonic Hall) now rented by the Government for use as a court-house there are no rooms for use of the judge, officers of the court, or the grand and petit juries. In fact, the marshal has been compelled to rent two rooms over a bar-room two blocks from the court-house for the use of the juries.

"I am compelled for safety to keep the books and records of court in my room at my boarding-house."

A petition signed by all the lawyers and leading citizens of Monroe and the country adjacent thereto substantially sets forth the above facts also, and asks for a public building at that place. Monroe is also a large mail-distributing point and has no suitable post-office, nor has it accommodations for the deputy internal-revenue or other agencies of the Government.

From these evidences it appears:

1. That the business of the courts at Monroe is constantly increasing, and that there is a larger number of cases there than at all the other places in the district combined.

2. That there is no place of safety in which to keep the papers and records of said courts, in which are involved large amounts and important interests.

3. That the clerk is compelled, for safety, to keep the books and records of the court in his room at a boarding-house.

4. That the marshal has no apartments owned by the Government in which to convene the juries, but is compelled to rent rooms for that purpose at a distance from the hall in which the court holds its sessions, and has to keep his papers and documents as best he can.

5. The United States courts hold sessions at Monroe twice a year, during which it sits about three months, and it has a large and increasing business.

It appears that Monroe is an old and substantial city; that it has a steadily-growing influence and population; several large and important industries; an extensive trade; is located in the heart of a district embracing a population of about 180,000 people, who transact there all the business they have before the United States courts.

The Committee on Public Buildings of both Senate and House of the Forty-ninth Congress made a favorable report on a similar bill, which bill was finally passed by both Houses of said Congress, having finally passed the House in the last days of the second session, and was not returned by the President by the adjournment, and failed to become a law.

Your committee, therefore, report favorably on the bill submitted to them, and unanimously recommend its passage.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask whether there is a second or a third class post-office at this town?

Mr. NEWTON. A third-class office.

Mr. STEELE. The salary of the postmaster is $1,500?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. I am in favor of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PORTSMOUTH, OHIO.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and for other Government uses, at Portsmouth, Ohio; the site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $60,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $60,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Ohio shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. DIBBLE. Unless some debate be desired, I will move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BLAND. We had better have the report read.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. KENNEDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred House bill 1712, submit the following report:

Portsmouth is situated on the Ohio River, at the mouth of the rich Scioto Valley. It is 100 miles from Columbus and about the same distance from Cincinnati. There is no public building for the transaction of the business of the General Government nearer than these points. It has a commanding position on the Ohio River, and a large portion of Southern Ohio, of Eastern Kentucky, and of West Virginia is, in a business point of view, tributary to the city. North of it lies the famous Scioto Valley, rich in its soil and products and in the enterprise and thrift of its citizens. This valley is the natural thoroughfare, by rail and canal, from Southern Ohio to the central and northern portions of the State. The city stands on the border of the great coal and iron fields of the Hanging Rock region, and is in easy access to the rich coal and iron belts immediately across the Ohio River, extending through Northeastern Kentucky. Thus situated in the Ohio Valley, Portsmouth is the center of a fertile region, rich in iron, coal, stone, fire-clay, timber, etc., to all of which it is easily accessible, and from which flows to it a large and steady stream of trade and commerce.

COMMERCIAL IMPORTANCE.

The sales of general merchandise by Portsmouth merchants of goods not manufactured there exceed in amount the sum of $5,000,000 per annum, while the amount of wares manufactured at the various factories within the city and in its environs will reach a still greater amount, showing that the annual commerce of Portsmouth is more than $10,000,000. The goods manufactured in Portsmouth consist of manufactured iron, steam-engines, stoves, road-scrapers, steel springs, wagon stock, wagons, buggies, wheelbarrows, railroad cars, fire-brick, sawed stone, furniture, boots and shoes, paper, soap and candles, brooms, saddles and harness, woolen goods, cooperage, distilled spirits, beer, cigars, etc.

THE POST-OFFICE.

The post-office is in a small building, crowded and inconvenient, neither affording the postmaster proper accommodations for the prompt and convenient transaction of business nor meeting the wants nor convenience of the public. This post-office distributes letters over numerous routes, sending out and receiving between twenty and thirty mail-bags daily. It rents 878 boxes and sells $9,360 worth of stamps annually. As a money-order office it pays out an average of $26,000 per year, and the average net revenue of the office is more than $7,000 per year.

INTERNAL-REVENUE OFFICE.

The office of the United States internal-revenue collector for the Eleventh district of Ohio is located at Portsmouth. During the past twenty years the main office has been located in that city with the exception of four years. This might in a measure be accounted for by the fact that Portsmouth, by its mail facilities and railroad and river connections, is eligibly situated for the frequent and rapid transmission of the public business, but also from the fact that the revenue records show that, with the exception of Cincinnati, Portsmouth has paid more internal-revenue taxes during the period mentioned than any other city in the State. The revenue district is composed of twenty-five counties, the revenues of which now reach in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 to $1,200,000. During the last revenue year they amounted to $1,058,000. The official records show that the distillery of George Davis & Co., of that city, has paid, from the years 1879 to 1883, inclusive, seven years, the sum of $3,108,418.90 as taxes on distilled spirits, making an average of $444,059.98 paid per annum, or about one-third of the revenues collected in the entire district. To this can be added the taxes paid by the brewers, cigar manufacturers, etc., of the city for stamps.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER, ETC.

The office of United States commissioner is considered an important one at that point. In addition to the ordinary duties of such officer the situation of Portsmouth upon the Ohio River, its large steam-boat and maritime interests, bring to that office much litigation under the marine laws and add to its importance. In addition to this the river and light-house service, which has grown to be a matter of Government concern, could be greatly accommodated by the construction of a public building at that point.

By act of Congress passed June 16, 1880, Portsmouth was constituted a port of delivery within the collection district of New Orleans, and from estimates made it is evident that there would be not less than $200,000 worth of various goods imported annually, consisting of queensware, leather, books, silk, medical supplies, liquors, cigars, and many other articles, in case proper facilities are offered.

FACILITIES FOR TRANSPORTATION.

The railroad connections are as follows: The Scioto Valley north to Columbus (connecting there with the great lines east and west) and south to Ashland, Ky., connecting there with the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, forming a direct line to Richmond, Va., and the Southeast; the Cincinnati, Washington and Baltimore Railroad and its connections north, east, west, and south; the Cincinnati and Eastern, affording a direct connection with Cincinnati. A belt road is now being built which will give unequaled facilities to the shipping and manufacturing interests of the city. Good free turnpikes extend in all directions from the city to the county limits, concentrating the trade of the county and largely of the adjoining counties in the city. In addition to this the Ohio River, that great artery of commerce, affords frequent and cheap means of transportation and exchange. Local daily packets ply from Portsmouth to points above and below, while larger steamers touch the wharf daily passing and repassing from Cincinnati to points above, to Huntington, Gallipolis, Pomeroy, Wheeling, and Pittsburgh. Portsmouth, it might be added, possesses one of the finest harbors on the Ohio River. In the lowest stage of water the largest steamers, loaded, can float with safety.

GOVERNMENT RENTS.

The rents now paid by the Government for public offices in Portsmouth, the post-office, revenue, etc., now reach nearly $1,000 per annum. But this rent does not provide such offices or accommodations as the Government should provide or the public welfare demands. The post-office rooms and facilities are not at all adequate to the proper discharge of the postal business. If suitable quarters were provided, as they certainly will be in the near future, even if a public building is not erected, the rents will reach from $1,200 to $1,500 per annum. But even this would not secure the Government records and property from the dangers of fire.

The city has a population of 15,000, and is rapidly increasing each year.

We recommend that the accompanying (substitute for House) bill (1884) do pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. Portsmouth, Ohio, is evidently an important point; but for information possibly in the future I desire to ask whether United States courts are held at that place. From the reading of the report I did not understand whether such is the fact.

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY] who made the report will explain that matter.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON]. In his absence I will say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that the United States courts are not held at Portsmouth. But it is a thriving, growing place on the Ohio River, with a population of 15,000. It has a post-office, internal-revenue office, and United States commissioner's office.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman's explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. KENNEDY. A similar bill was passed in the last Congress.

A MEMBER. What is the limitation of cost?

Mr. KENNEDY. It is not to exceed $60,000.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

BUILDING FOR CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER OF THE ARMY.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4359) for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, and also for the erection of the necessary store-houses for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C., reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site containing about 54,000 square feet of ground, and the building thereon, on the northeast quarter of square numbered 25, corner of Twenty-fourth and M streets northwest, Washington, D. C., belonging to David Fergusson, for use of the Signal Bureau of the War Department, and cause to be erected, on such portion of the site as is not now occupied by buildings, substantial and commodious buildings, with fire-proof vaults, for use as store-houses for the accommodation of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and for other Government uses, at Washington, D. C. The site and building thereon, including the store-houses, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $150,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection or purchase of a building, including the necessary store-houses, which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no site nor plans for said building or buildings shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum of $150,000 for site and buildings; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by a space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of the said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "dollars," where it first occurs in the bill, insert the following: "Provided, That not more than $112,000 be paid to Mr. Fergusson for the property herein referred to."

Mr. DIBBLE. The members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have thoroughly inspected this building which it is proposed to purchase for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and they not only think that its purchase is necessary, but also that it is a very profitable investment for the Government; besides, the Government owns the remainder of the square on which this building is located. The committee agree that the sum of $112,000 is a low price for this property, and that with the remaining $38,000 of the $150,000 appropriated the Chief Signal Officer of the Army will be able to construct necessary store-houses. I ask that the amendment be agreed to, and the bill as amended laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. WILKINS. The House should know this is an entirely new building, and has never been occupied by anybody.

Mr. MILLIKEN. By this purchase the Government will save $4,000 and more of rental for a lot of old buildings which are coming down upon the heads of those who are compelled to occupy them.

Mr. RANDALL. Does this bill provide for the vacation of those buildings which are now rented? Is not this to build others?

Mr. WILKINS. No; this building is already constructed and ready for occupancy.

Mr. RANDALL. But it does not provide for the vacation of the rented buildings.

Mr. MILLIKEN. When the Signal Service moves away from the building it now occupies into the new building, then the Government will be saved the payment of all the rental it is now under.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not give notice for its vacation?

Mr. DIBBLE. That is not in the jurisdiction of our committee, but no doubt it will be done.

Mr. RANDALL. Read the report.

Mr. DIBBLE. The matter is perfectly clear, and I do not suppose the gentleman will insist on his demand for the reading of the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4359) for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, for the erection of the necessary store-houses for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C., submit the following report:

This bill authorizes the purchase of the northeast corner of square No. 25, bounded on the north by M street, on the east by Twenty-fourth street, and south and west by the grounds of the Columbia Hospital, for the use and occupancy of the Signal Service Bureau of the War Department.

The property proposed to be purchased belongs to David Fergusson, esq., and comprises 54,000 square feet of ground, upon which is erected a new and commodious brick house, built in a most substantial manner, finished in oak, mahogany, and Georgia pine, and nearly ready for occupancy. From its peculiar construction it is admirably suited to the purposes for which it is proposed to be purchased. With the erection of store-houses, as is provided for in this bill, this bureau will have ample accommodations for all its business. The necessity for some provision by Congress for suitable, convenient, and healthful quarters for this branch of the service will be apparent from the following statement, as well as economical for the General Government.

The Signal Service is now quartered in nine separate buildings, at an expense of $7,500 annually for rental, exclusive of repairs, which probably cover $500 more. These buildings are badly ventilated, illy lighted, and wholly unsuited for the needs of the Service.

The minimum air-space allowed by competent authorities for each man is placed at 650 feet; 650 cubic feet per man means a space of only 8½ feet high, long, and wide.

No less than 102 officers and men of this Service are in quarters which range from 159 cubic feet to 640 cubic feet per man.

This simply means that office work is performed by these men at the expense not only of their physical strength, but of their vital energies. The men of this Service are perfect physically, yet in November, 1886, one hundred days' time was lost by sickness. In fourteen rooms light is so deficient that gas is necessarily used for a number of days each month.

The scattered condition of the office force not only seriously diminishes the amount of work done by the clerical force, caused by delays in waiting, but has also necessitated an increase of the messenger force to an amount not less than $3,000 per year.

To this amount should be added at least $1,000 for fuel, gas, heating-stoves, etc., caused by the occupancy of nine buildings instead of one, making in all $12,000. From this subtract the interest upon $150,000 at 3 per cent., which would be $4,500, and a saving of $7,500 annually will be made to the Government by the purchase of the Fergusson property.

Moreover, during the last year the Signal Service has been obliged to remove out of old buildings, which threatened to fall down upon the heads of the employés, into other buildings, at an expense of more than $1,000.

The Fergusson building is new, is heated by steam, has 31 rooms, many of them very large, and floor surface amounting to 12,198 square feet. It could be hardly built by the Government for $100,000, not reckoning the value of the 54,000 feet of land contained in the lot upon which it is situated.

The committee recommend that the bill pass with an amendment providing that not more than $112,000 shall be paid to Mr. Fergusson for the property herein referred to.

The following, from the Chief Signal Officer's report, with some slight amendments made by himself, is submitted for the information of the House:

"The Chief Signal Officer invites attention to the inadequate office and storage accommodations for this Service, and especially invites attention to the new structure, which has never been occupied, known as the 'Fergusson building,' located on the corner of Twenty-fourth and M streets, on square No. 25 (northeast quarter), the remainder of which is already owned by the Government. The bill for the purchase of this building was favorably reported at the last session of Congress, and it is evident that the purchase of this site, or some other one, would be a matter of economy for the Government. The 54,000 square feet of land and the new building can be purchased for the sum of $108,000, and about 4 per cent. interest for one year, of $112,000; while the necessary store-houses and other out-buildings can be constructed for the additional sum of $38,000; so that the total and final cost of sufficient accommodations for this Service would amount to about $150,000, which at 3 per cent. interest would mean an annual rental of $4,500. The present rentals amount to $7,500, and about $500 is expended annually from the contingent fund for necessary repairs to the wretched and unsuitable buildings now occupied by this bureau. To this sum of $8,000 should be added another thousand dollars for the excesses in cost of fuel, gas, heating-stoves, etc., caused by the occupancy of nine buildings instead of one; and also $3,000 for extra laborers and messengers required owing to the scattered offices of the bureau; thus aggregating $12,000 against $4,500, a net annual saving of $7,500. Enough money has been paid for repairs and extra services entailed by the present methods since the organization of the Service to have purchased and completed the necessary buildings."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state on the Union had had under consideration, under the special order, sundry bills, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that they do pass, some with and some without amendments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4271) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for prior years, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4881) making an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto."

PUBLIC BUILDING, GREENVILLE, S. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with the recommendation that it do pass.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1805) for the erection of a public building at Greenville, S. C.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ASHEVILLE, N. C.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1697) for the erection of a public building in the city of Asheville, N. C., reported with an amendment.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SPRINGFIELD, MO.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MONROE, LA.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1483) for the erection of a public building at Monroe, La.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, PORTSMOUTH, OHIO.

The next bill reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BUILDING FOR THE USE OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER OF THE ARMY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 4359) for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, and also for the erection of the necessary store-houses for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C., reported with an amendment.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now move to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also move that the motions to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOEL J. GOSS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 2056) for the relief of Joel J. Goss, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that it is not in order for the gentleman in this second hour to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the consideration of private business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is certainly not in order for the gentleman to consider private business to-day in this hour. Rule XXIV says:

5. After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day, on either the House or Union Calendar.

That does not refer to the Private Calendar, but excludes it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

Mr. DIBBLE. I raise the point that this proceeding is now by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Unanimous consent had not been given to the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The right to object was distinctly reserved.

LABOR TROUBLES, PENNSYLVANIA COAL REGION.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to present at this time a memorial signed by a committee representing 82,000 workingmen, and have it read from the Clerk's desk and printed in the RECORD, after which I hope the House will allow me a few minutes to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The memorial will be read, in the absence of objection.

The memorial was read, as follows:

To the honorable the members of the House of Representatives of the Fiftieth Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned officials, representing 82,000 workingmen, represent that—

Whereas the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company, the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, and other corporations have unlawfully conspired with individuals to raise the price of coal to an unreasonable figure, and for this purpose have, by enforcing a lock-out in the entire Lehigh and Schuylkill anthracite-coal system, prevented the mining and shipping of coal from these systems to any part of the United States:

We, the undersigned, respectfully ask Congress to appoint a special committee of the House of Representatives to investigate the cause of said lock-outs as promptly as the same can be done.

And we will ever pray, etc.

JOHN H. DAVIS,
Chairman of Joint Committee.
JOHN L. LEE,
Chairman of P. and R. R. R. Executive Board.
H. McGARVEY,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement in reference to the paper which has just been read, and which, without objection, will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DUNHAM. The understanding is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is allowed to make his remarks upon the subject, that the Committee on Commerce will call this up in the morning, and no other gentleman is to speak upon the subject at this time.

Mr. RAYNER. Who made that arrangement?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is nothing before the House at this time but a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point of order that there is nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks leave to make a statement.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

Mr. RANDALL. You had better present some proposition on which to predicate a statement.

Mr. WEAVER. He has already presented a petition, or memorial, which has been read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the gentleman state how long a time he wants. I object, unless it is known what time he will consume.

Mr. BRUMM. Not more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. This matter had better be fairly met, and I hope the consideration of the subject in the House will not be evaded by a single objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state that there are two reports from the Committee on Commerce on this subject, and it will probably come up to-morrow for consideration, when the whole matter will be discussed. The chairman of the committee is not in his seat at present, and it seems to me the matter had better go over and take that course.

Mr. RANDALL. Can the gentleman give an assurance that it will come up to-morrow?

Mr. DAVIS. That is my understanding.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that this matter be made the special order for consideration at the conclusion of the second morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not object to that.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment, until after I have made a short statement.

Mr. CLARDY. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be heard.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I make the request for unanimous consent that this matter go over until to-morrow after the morning hour. I refer to the resolution in regard to the Reading Railroad. [Cries of "That's right!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the exact order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That this subject is made the special order for consideration immediately after the second morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is there no limit as to time?

FRANCIS I. WHEELER.

Mr. SHAW. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5874) for the relief of the heirs of Francis I. Wheeler and put it upon its passage.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the bill and report will be read first.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid to the heirs of Francis I. Wheeler, late of Carroll County, Maryland, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $358, the amount advanced by him to Charles Benton and Hale Libby, late privates in the First Regiment of the Potomac Home Brigade, on their check-books, in April, 1864.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. And before the right to object is waived.

The report (by Mr. BROWER) was read, as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House Report No. 2479 of the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report herewith a bill, and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 2479, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6080) for the relief of the heirs of the late Francis I. Wheeler, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

This claim was before the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress and was investigated by the Committee on Claims. Your committee find that the facts in the case are correctly set forth in the report of that committee, regularly submitted, being House Report No. 2013, Forty-eighth Congress, first session. That report is as follows:

"Francis I. Wheeler, in 1865, was agent of Adams Express Company at Martinsburgh, W. Va. The United States at this time was accustomed to take from newly enlisted soldiers their local bounty-money and other private funds in their possession and give them instead a check-book for the amount so taken from them, promising payment by the first paymaster who should pay the regiment to which the men were assigned. A number of these check-books were in the hands of men of the Potomac Home Brigade, then at Martinsburgh, but the Government was short of funds and the paymaster did not visit the regiment. They complained that their families at home were suffering for want of the money withheld from them. At the urgent solicitation of officers of the Potomac Home Brigade, Mr. Wheeler generously advanced the money due on several of these check-books, at a discount of only 5 per cent. for delay and cost of collection.

"In 1866 he was repaid the amount he had advanced on several of the books, but payment was withheld on two of them—those in favor of Charles Benton and Hall Libby, of the First Potomac Home Brigade, amounting to $358, on the ground that Benton and Libby afterwards deserted or were absent without leave. The regiment was mustered out on the 29th of May, 1865, a few days after the alleged desertion. The money was advanced by Wheeler while the men were still with their regiment at Martinsburgh, and in the presence and at the request of their officers. The desertion took place some time after the regiment had removed from Martinsburgh. The Judge-Advocate-General has decided in several similar cases—

"'That the United States was not entitled to appropriate to its own use the amount represented by certain bounty checks, although the soldiers (to whom they were made payable and who had indorsed them) had deserted. Such checks * * * remained the property of the soldiers, and the Government was merely the bailee thereof for their benefit.' (Digest Decisions, p. 242, edition 1868.)

"This claim seems to be entirely just, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

Your committee now think this claim should be paid, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland about what amount this covers?

Mr. SHAW. About $364.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask the gentleman if this man did not go into the business of discounting soldiers' claims and get about 30 per cent. per annum for the exchange?

Mr. SHAW. No, sir.

Mr. STEELE. He got 5 per cent. commission and they were paid every two months?

Mr. SHAW. If the gentleman will permit me, I will answer by stating the facts. This man was the agent of the Adams Express Company at Martinsburgh, and it was the practice of the Government at that time, instead of paying to the soldiers the bounty due in money, to give them a check-book representing the amount due. At the solicitation of certain officers this man Wheeler advanced the money to a number of men at a discount of 5 per cent. to meet the cost of collection. All the checks that he had obtained in this manner were paid except these two.

Mr. STEELE. And these men had deserted.

Mr. SHAW. These two had deserted and the Government withheld the money. But the Judge-Advocate-General has decided—and there is a reference to his decision in the report—that the Government has no right to retain this money, because it belonged to the soldiers, and having been assigned to the soldiers previous to desertion, the Government was only the bailee.

Mr. STEELE. What is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. SHAW. To enable the claimant to obtain this money. The statute of limitations would now run against him. It is a just claim. Mr. Wheeler is now dead, and this bill is for the benefit of his heirs.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is the money now in the United States Treasury?

Mr. SHAW. The money was paid into the hands of the United States officers, and I presume it is there now.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Was it not forfeited by the desertion of the soldiers?

Mr. SHAW. It was paid before the soldiers deserted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How much money is involved in the bill?

Mr. SHAW. The amount is $364.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time,

The SPEAKER pro tempore stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. STEELE. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 106, noes 2.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHAW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF LAMBERTON.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the House Calendar for consideration at this time the bill H. R. 1640.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1640) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district.

Whereas after the constituting of the port of Lamberton, in the collection district of Burlington, in the State of New Jersey, the borough of Lamberton, where such port is situated, was incorporated into and became a part of the city of Trenton, in said State: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the port now known as the port of Lamberton, in the collection district of Burlington, in the State of New Jersey, shall hereafter be known and denominated as the port of Trenton, in said district.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to in any way affect the validity of any act heretofore done by the collector or any official of said port, nor to in any way affect the official standing of any official of said port, or the powers and duties of any such official, the sole intent and purpose of this act being to change the name of said port.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1888.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The report has not yet been printed. I can tell in a few words the reason for this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Lamberton was the original settlement on the banks of the Delaware, now included in the city of Trenton. The bill makes no appropriation. The Treasury Department say they have no objection to it, and my people want it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It simply changes the name of the port?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not change the place?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, SMITHLAND, KY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 300) for the relief of the trustees of the First Baptist Church at Smithland, Ky., and that the same be put upon its passage.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. BURROWS. I must object to the consideration of this bill.

MRS. ELIZA L. MACE.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 363) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza L. Mace.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the laws regulating pensions, the name of Mrs. Eliza L. Mace, widow of Richard E. Mace, late of Company I, Third Maine Volunteers, deceased.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 363) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza L. Mace, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That this claim was fully considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-ninth Congress and favorably reported, but was not reached for consideration. The report was as follows:

"Claimant's husband, Richard E. Mace, was a private in Company I, Third Maine Regiment, and was pensioned at $6 rate for injury of back and spine. In surgeon's certificate of disability, upon which he was discharged, his injury is described as follows:

"'Injury of the back from a log falling on him, consequent upon explosion of a shell in rifle-pit May 8, 1864, near the Wilderness. Result, partial paraplegia. Has been bedridden in the hospital since June last. Unfit for Veteran Reserve Corps. Disability total.'

"Pensioner died November 11, 1885. Dr. Linscott, his family physician, certifies that—

"'The immediate cause of his death was congestive apoplexy, but that the remote or indirect cause of death was disease of back or spine, which said Mace said was caused by injury received while in the service of the United States.'

"Dr. Francis H. Russell also certifies:

"'That he has practiced in said Mace's family; that he knew said Mace to have been in failing health for the past two years, on account of disease of spine, which said Mace said was caused by injury received while in the service of the United States; that he was not present at the death of said Mace, but that he was knowing to the fact, and that he has no doubt it was caused indirectly from disease of spine.'

Dr. Linscott, in answer to the office inquiry, says that he can not state whether the hemorrhage was in the head or cord. Widow's claim stands rejected upon opinion of medical referee that 'soldier's death from congestive apoplexy is not regarded, from a medical standpoint, as being due to the injury of (lower portion of) spine for which pensioned.'

"Both the home doctors, in supplemental affidavits filed with a request for reopening of the claim, reaffirm with emphasis their professional opinion that soldier's death resulted from his injured back. It is a case of disagreement of doctors, and we feel justified in giving this needy widow the benefit of such doubt as there may be, by accepting the opinion of the physicians who saw the soldier, who treated him, and whose opinion is based on personal knowledge and observation."

As the facts in the case seem to fully warrant a favorable report, your committee adopt the report of the committee of the Forty-ninth Congress, and recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES REPORTS.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 1860) to amend section 683 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 683 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to provide for the distribution, by the Secretary of the Interior, of one set of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, at each of the places where the circuit and district courts are holden, exclusive of such places where the judges of said courts reside, said reports to be kept by the clerks of said courts and their successors in office, for the use of said courts and the officers thereof, and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out this provision.

Mr. LANHAM. This bill has been favorably reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. CASWELL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 1860, submit the following report:

The committee think that it is quite essential that a set of the United States Reports be kept at every place where a term of court is held. From the best information we have been able to obtain, this bill will require one hundred and fourteen sets of the Reports, which cost $160 a set, or an appropriation of $18,240.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas whether the bill makes the appropriation that is recommended by the report. I thought there was a discrepancy, but did not distinctly catch the amount.

Mr. LANHAM. The bill provides for an appropriation of $20,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary. The object is simply this——

Mr. McMILLIN. The point I was inquiring about was that while the report says this will not require $20,000, the bill appropriates that amount.

Mr. LANHAM. From the best estimate the committee could make, they thought it would take eighteen thousand and some hundreds of dollars. But the bill appropriates only so much of that as may be necessary. It may be that the whole appropriation will not be required.

The object of the bill is that at each place where circuit and district courts of the United States are holden there shall be a set of decisions of the Supreme Court for the use of the members and officers of the court.

I suppose that in almost every State in the Union the supreme court reports of the State are furnished to the different counties, and this will be no more than carrying out the same idea upon the part of the United States by providing that the decisions of the Supreme Court may be found at these places for the convenience of the officers and members of the court.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the bill read again, because I think there is an omission which needs to be supplied.

The bill was again read.

Mr. OATES. I move to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "holden," the words "including the court held at Mobile, Ala." I offer that amendment for this reason: The court at Mobile was established by an act of the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and it would be covered by the language of this bill so as to be excluded from the benefits of it, although in fact the judge there would not have been supplied with any of these reports.

Mr. LANHAM. He is entitled to be supplied under a general statute.

Mr. OATES. But this bill excludes the place where the judge resides. Now, the judge there has never been supplied with these reports.

Mr. LANHAM. But he is entitled to be supplied with them.

Mr. OATES. No; because this bill would exclude him. I simply want to put the judge there upon the same footing with the other judges.

The amendment of Mr. OATES was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM. I now demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, SMITHLAND, KY.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] asked awhile ago to call up a certain bill I objected, supposing that it would open up an entirely new field. I have since examined the matter, and I now withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the circumstances the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] will be recognized.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. My request was, Mr. Speaker, that the bill (H. R. 300) for the relief of the trustees of the First Baptist Church at Smithland, Ky., should be taken up and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the trustees of the First Baptist Church at Smithland, Ky., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 for the use and occupation of their church building by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I think before the bill is put upon its passage that the report had better be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 300) for the relief of the trustees of the First Baptist Church at Smithland, Ky., report as follows:

That in the year 1861 the properly constituted military authorities of the United States took possession of the First Baptist Church at Smithland, Ky. It was used as a warehouse and hospital for the troops of the United States, to the entire exclusion of the owners, until the war closed; and besides being thus occupied by the United States troops, the property was greatly damaged.

It was not the policy or practice of the Government to pay rent for public buildings used during the war, but in meritorious cases to restore them to their former condition, ordinary wear and tear excepted.

This property was not taken or held as a belligerent act, nor was its occupation a casualty of war. War was not flagrant during its occupation in that part of the country.

The trustees of said church only ask that the sum of $500 be paid them for its use and occupancy, which the evidence shows to be a very low rent.

Your committee, therefore, report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then, Mr. Speaker, if this bill is now to be put upon its passage, I simply want to say this. I do not understand that it has been the policy of the Government to pay for the use or occupation of property during the war. Early in the history of this question we had a case before the House involving the use and occupation of the college of William and Mary, in Virginia. That case was debated at considerable length, and after a thorough discussion of the question, whether the Government should be liable for the use and occupation of educational and religious institutions by the armies during the war, this House by a large majority rejected the bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. When was that?

Mr. SPRINGER. In the Forty-fourth Congress or the Forty-fifth, I do not remember which. Since that time I have never, to my recollection, heard of a similar bill coming before the House. I believe every gentleman will bear me out in the statement that during the war wherever the armies were in the South every church and school-house, whenever needed, was used for hospital and other army purposes.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I withdrew my objection to this bill because I thought there was a distinction between the case of a State that was in rebellion and one that was not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where was this church?

Mr. WARNER. In Kentucky, a loyal State.

Mr. SPRINGER. Some parts of it.

Mr. WARNER. As a State it was loyal.

Mr. SPRINGER. The armies on both sides occupied Kentucky very extensively, and I believe it is generally understood that she furnished large quotas to both armies.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I believe the Lord is not supposed to make any distinction between His houses of worship.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I desire to say, for the information of the House, that this church is in a section of country where an armed Confederate soldier never set his foot, a section as loyal as the territory upon the other bank of the river, where the gentleman from Illinois lives. The people there furnished their quota to the Union Army, and if there were a few who fought upon the other side, that did not make the country disloyal. This church never was occupied by the armies, except as it was used for the storage of goods. It was really used as a store-house or warehouse; it was used during the entire war for that purpose, and now these people simply ask this pittance in order to enable them to get on their feet again. They feel that the Government, which had the use of their property, is perfectly able to pay, and that it is right and just that it should pay.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very glad to hear the gentleman's statement that this church was not situated in the midst of the war or in the region where the armies were fighting, because if it had been the passage of this bill would be a very bad precedent. The facts being as the gentleman states, perhaps the bill can be passed without setting a precedent for other more objectionable cases.

Mr. MCMILLIN. After the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], I wish to say it does seem to me that no distinction can be drawn, so far as church buildings are concerned, in reference to the localities which they may occupy. They are not the personal property of the elders of the church in whom often the title is formally vested; but they are dedicated to a common use—the worship of God; and I must protest against any distinction in a matter of this kind, based upon the question whether church buildings are located in one part of the country or another.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, rose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not object to the gentleman's bill at all. I simply wished to protest against the position of my friend from Illinois, who undertakes to make a distinction which I think can not properly be drawn as to the locality of church buildings which may have been used or occupied by the Army during the war.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I can not allow the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to go to the country without expressing the most emphatic dissent from the position he has assumed.

The gentleman speaks of precedents, and for that reason I am unwilling the impression should go to the country that this bill was allowed to pass this House simply and solely because this church was in a locality which had never been occupied by contending forces.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that it makes no difference where the church was situated, whether in one part of Kentucky or another, whether in one Southern State or another. In fact, I maintain that it should make no difference whether the church was located on the northern or the southern bank of the Ohio.

I contend that it is our duty, on every proper occasion, to uphold and defend that provision of the Constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation.

I heartily concur in the views of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and hope that a bill so just as this will pass without a dissenting voice.

Mr. SPRINGER. Notwithstanding the dissent of my friends, it is true that location does make all the difference in the world when war is raging. There is a very great difference between being inside the military operations of the Army of the United States and being outside.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it possible to suppose the disloyalty of a church to the Government?

Mr. JACKSON. The presumption ought to be the other way.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A political question of that kind can not arise in such a case.

Mr. SPRINGER. There may arise a presumption as to the allegiance or want of allegiance of individuals to the Government according to the section of country where they may be located.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Oh, the gentleman's point is too finely drawn.

We can not suppose the treason of a church on account of a war in the country.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES B. MITCHELL.

Mr. BOWDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 615) for the relief of James B. Mitchell be taken from the Private Calendar for present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James B. Mitchell the sum of $438, for services as surveyor of customs at the port of Yorktown, Va., from September 7, 1882, to January 31, 1883.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

The report from the Committee on Claims (by Mr. BOWDEN) was read, as follows:

By act of Congress approved June 15, 1882, the lines of the Yorktown customs district, in Virginia, were altered, and Yorktown, where the custom-house had theretofore been located, was made a port of delivery and a surveyor authorized for the port, but no provision was made for his salary, and the custom-house was removed to Newport News, which was made the sole port of entry for the district.

On the 4th day of September, 1882, James B. Mitchell, who had theretofore been the collector of customs for the district, was appointed surveyor for the port of Yorktown, and in anticipation, from the representations of the Department, that provision would be made for his salary, performed the duties of the position, which required his whole time, until the 31st day of January, 1883, on which day he resigned.

During this period he received for compensation but $59.45 in fees, and he asks that compensation at the rate of $3 per diem be allowed him.

This compensation is predicated upon the ordinary compensation of inspectors of customs, duties similar to those imposed upon that office he performed, together with the duties of surveyor, and your committee, believing the demand to be just and reasonable, recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOWDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REWARDS TO ESQUIMAUX.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1528, and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1528) to reward the Esquimaux natives of the Asiatic coast of the Arctic Ocean for acts of humanity to shipwrecked seamen.

Whereas the Esquimaux natives of the Asiatic coast of the Arctic Ocean exhibited great humanity in rescuing and extending hospitality to the crew of the wrecked whaling bark Napoleon, and especially toward its sole survivor, while themselves suffering from famine; and

Whereas it is eminently proper and expedient to recognize and reward such meritorious and humane conduct on the part of an uncivilized people: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be appropriated and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, from moneys not otherwise appropriated, a sum not exceeding $1,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the benefit of the Esquimaux natives of the Asiatic coast of the Arctic Ocean, and in recognition of their hospitality to our shipwrecked seamen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the report be read.

The report of the Committee on Commerce (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred House bill 1528, beg leave to report:

In the month of May, 1885, the whaling bark Napoleon was wrecked off the Siberian coast, near the Arctic Circle. The crew were thirty-six days reaching the land, during which time their only food was two small seals, which they were fortunate enough to catch. Before they effected a landing nine persons, one-half the number who had left the wrecked vessel, had died. Captain Healy, in his affecting narrative, states that—

"Many of those who landed were badly frozen, their feet and hands dropping off at the joints. Five died a few hours after reaching the shore. Three of the four survivors lingered in all the misery of starvation, scurvy, and frozen limbs until March, 1886, when they died within one day of each other."

J. B. Vincent, the sole survivor of the crew of eighteen, remained with the natives until July, 1887, when he was taken on board the revenue-cutter Bear. The message which led to his rescue was rudely carved upon a piece of wood and carried by one of the tribe several hundred miles and given to Captain Cogan, of the bark Hunter, and by him taken to Port Clarence, on the American coast.

Mr. Vincent remained with the natives more than two years, and was treated by them with the utmost kindness and hospitality, sharing the shelter of their rude dwellings and their scanty food, which during the winter of 1885–'87 was barely sufficient to avert starvation.

It would seem not only just but expedient to testify our sense of the generous hospitality of those poor and ignorant people, who, while suffering from want and hunger, performed such a signal act of humanity. So long as the enterprise of our people carries them into this dangerous sea such casualties will occur, and the assistance of the inhabitants of the Asiatic and American coasts will continue to be essential to the escape of our shipwrecked mariners.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, states that—

"It is highly advisable that a moderate sum be used in purchasing suitable articles, to be sent by the next revenue-cutter visiting those waters, as a reward to the natives who, in a condition very near starvation, sheltered and fed Vincent and his unfortunate companions."

The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill and preamble.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL-BANK CURRENCY.

Mr. WILKINS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order; and I do so for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the further consideration of House bill No. 1733, known as the currency bill, be postponed for two weeks.

Mr. WEAVER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, being House bill No. 1733, be postponed for two weeks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILKINS. I now withdraw the demand for the regular order.

GEORGE W. HARRISON.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4842) to remove the political disabilities of George W. Harrison, of Hoboken, N. J. The bill is now on the Private Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed from George W. Harrison, of Hoboken, N. J.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCADOO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

H. B. WILSON.

Mr. MANSUR. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of William Tinder, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury refund and pay to H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full satisfaction of the claim of the estate of the said Tinder for money paid by said estate upon a judgment of forfeiture upon a bond for the appearance of one Evans, who was charged with crime by indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and who was afterward captured by the said administrator and returned to the custody of the court, and convicted and punished for the crime with which he was charged.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. MANSUR. I have no objection to the reading of the report, but will state, before the reading is begun, that this bill has been twice passed by the Senate, and has been at this session favorably reported for the fourth time to the House.

The report of the Committee on Claims (by Mr. MANSUR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased, having considered the same, report thereon as follows:

That in the year 1876 two indictments in the circuit court for the western district of Tennessee were returned by the grand jury of said court to the said court against one R. L. D. Evans for passing counterfeit money. He was legally arrested under process issued from said court, and gave bond for his appearance to the next regular term thereafter of said court—November term, 1876. Said two causes were continued from term to term until May, 1878, when he was put to trial on one of said causes, the jury, after a two days' consideration of said cause, failing to agree. Both cases were then continued until the next term of said court, and the defendant was required to give bond in each case in the sum of $5,000, which he did, giving William Tinder and W. R. Evans as his sureties in each case, conditioned for his appearance at the next November term, 1878, of said court.

Before the beginning of said term William Tinder departed this life intestate, and of his estate H. B. Wilson was duly appointed administrator by the proper probate court of Tennessee on 4th of November, 1878.

After the death of said Tinder said two causes against said R. L. D. Evans were duly called in said United States court, but said Evans failed to appear. By regular legal proceedings, then and afterwards taken, the liability of Wilson, the administrator, to pay the penalty in said bonds, respectively, was fixed and determined by judgments legally taken in said court in favor of the United States.

Immediately thereupon said Wilson was legally notified by proper officers of the United States that the Government claimed a lien upon—and so as to have and secure priority in the distribution of—the assets of his intestate in his hands to be administered. By agreement with the proper officers of the Government, satisfaction of said two judgments was entered upon payment of all costs accrued, and the further payment of $5,000 by said administrator to the Government. All costs then and since accrued have been paid by said administrator, as has also said sum of $5,000.

And now it further appears that said administrator, aided by certain creditors of his intestate, instituted search and pursuit of said R. L. D. Evans, and that ultimately they discovered his whereabouts; had him arrested; that under said arrest he was brought to trial under said indictments at May term, 1881, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary at Albany for a period of three years and the payment of a fine of $500.

The payment of this sum of $5,000 by Administrator Wilson rendered his intestate's estate insolvent.

The administrator and creditors claim a return of said sum of $5,000 so paid. Judge Hammond, the presiding judge of said court, recommends its return. The committee believe that the money ought to be refunded. The object of the bail bond was not to make money, but to secure the appearance of Evans and his punishment if guilty. This has been accomplished by the efforts and the money of the bail, and all costs due the United States have been paid. We recommend the passage of the bill.

Your committee submit that they are supported in their conclusions in favor of this bill by favorable reports made thereon by Mr. George in the Forty-seventh Congress, first session (see report No. 867), and by Mr. Cameron in the Forty-eighth Congress, first session (see report No. 145), and the fact that the Senate in each Congress passed the bill so recommended.

And by Mr. —— —— in the Forty-ninth Congress (see report No. ——).

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANSUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL MILITARY CEMETERY, PINEVILLE, LA.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. 1481) making an appropriation for the construction of a road and approaches from Pineville, La., to the national military cemetery near that town, and that the same be taken up for present consideration.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $11,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a road and approaches from the river at Pineville, La., about 1 mile, to the national military cemetery near Pineville.

SEC. 2. That the sum of money appropriated by this act shall be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War, either by contract or otherwise, as to him may seem best: Provided, That before said sum, or any part thereof, is expended, the corporation of Pineville shall make provision, satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the keeping of said road, after construction, in repair: And provided further, That before the commencement of the construction of said road said corporation shall secure to the United States, free of cost, the right of way for said road.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at its next session his action under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "the Treasury" and insert "War;" so it will read, "shall make provision satisfactory to the Secretary of War."

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. FORD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1481) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Pineville, La., to the national cemetery near that town, have considered the same, and make the following report:

The village of Pineville is situated on Red River, in the parish of Rapides, Louisiana. Across the river and opposite is the town of Alexandria, the county seat of said parish of Rapides. During the late war the Red River Valley was the scene of extensive military operations. The forces of the United States on several occasions advanced up the valley by land and water, penetrating in 1864, under General Banks, as far as to within 45 miles of the city of Shreveport, 150 miles by land and 300 by water northwest of the town of Alexandria. A fleet of the United States, under Admiral Porter, kept pace by the river with the forces on land.

Alexandria and Pineville, and the country contiguous thereto, were for several months, first and last, occupied by the military and naval forces of the United States.

During these invasions of the Red River Valley many encounters with the Confederate forces took place, and two important battles were fought, to wit, the battle of Mansfield, or Sabine Cross Roads, and the battle of Pleasant Hill.

For the interment of the bodies of the Union soldiers who fell in these engagements in the Red River Valley and those who died in the hospitals a national cemetery was established at Pineville. This cemetery is located about 1 mile from the river on the hills which border the river for a short distance at that point. The cemetery covers 8 acres of ground, and the number of interments is 1,307. It is in charge of a superintendent, and the yearly cost of maintenance $1,250. (The cemetery is surrounded by a substantial brick wall, and the buildings for the accommodation of the superintendent and family are of brick and substantial and commodious.)

No proper means of access from the river to the cemetery is provided. From the memorial to Congress, of numerous citizens of that immediate section, calling attention to the necessity for this road, and praying an appropriation therefor, we make the following extract:

"The national cemetery, located in the suburbs of Pineville, opposite Alexandria, La., while naturally possessing many attractive features as to location and surroundings, is virtually inaccessible, the only approach being by way of a narrow and rough by way leading from the main thoroughfare. The site is about 1 mile on a straight line from Red River, and a road opened from a certain point on the river and leading directly to the front or main entrance of the cemetery would materially add to the attractiveness of the place, and contribute very greatly to the convenience and pleasure of visitors."

The memorial, from which the above is taken, is strongly indorsed by the superintendent of the cemetery.

A similar bill in the Forty-ninth Congress having been referred to the Secretary of War for report on the cemetery and its needs of approach, Mr. W. H. Owens, civil engineer, Quartermaster's Department, was ordered to inspect the cemetery and make report, a copy of which, together with a letter from the Secretary of War, is among the papers submitted to your committee. Mr. Owens's report is full, and contains a detailed estimate of the cost of the proposed road, which he fixes at $11,000.

The Quartermaster-General recommended, and the Secretary of War concurs in the same, that the right of way for the road be secured to the United States free of cost, and that provision be made in the bill for a satisfactory guaranty by the authorities of Pineville of an amount sufficient annually to keep the road in repair.

The bill herewith presented covers both these suggestions, and as showing the willingness of the town authorities to provide for the annual repair of the road, a certified copy of a formal resolution of the town council giving this assurance was submitted to the committee.

In view of the facts in the case, the committee report the bill favorably with an amendment to strike out the words "the Treasury," in the sixth line of the section, and insert the word "War," and, as thus amended, they recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 92.

Mr. MILLS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. MILLS and Mr. MORRILL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 44.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McPHERSON presented the petition of Daniel Wooden, of Washington, D. C., praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, N. J., praying for the speedy enactment of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Newark, N. J., praying that a liberal appropriation be made for the repair and enlargement of the public building at Newark; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of 168 citizens of the First, Second, Fourth, and Fifth Congressional districts of New Jersey, and a petition of 74 citizens of the Fifth Congressional district of New Jersey, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COKE. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of El Paso, Tex., engaged in commerce, which represents that the recent extension of the Free Zone by the Mexican Government along the northern frontier of Mexico opens all the Mexican towns along that border to the importation, through the United States, of all classes of merchandise from foreign countries, upon which no duty is paid either to the American or Mexican Governments; and that the act creates a rendezvous where merchants from foreign countries can land their free goods and take their time and opportunity to smuggle or sell them to those who will smuggle them into the United States.

Referring more particularly to the free port of Paso del Norte, Mexico, directly opposite El Paso, Tex., the petitioners call attention to the ample opportunity and great ease with which an extensive smuggling business can be carried on, for the reason that all classes of individuals can go there in the street cars and in other conveyances, or on foot, day or night, purchase any article of wearing apparel and wear it over to the American side. As well also can merchandise upon which the greatest duty is imposed be carried over by men, pack animals, and other conveyances at various places up and down the river. The Rio Grande River is fordable the greater part of the time, and there are also bridges and boats in ample supply when the river is not fordable.

Now that railways are operating to and from all the cities of the United States, an extensive amount of smuggling can and will be carried on, and these free goods will find their way throughout our country.

Merchants from Vera Cruz and other foreign cities are now opening large stocks of foreign merchandise in convenient places in Paso del Norte for the purpose of supplying the American trade. They are advertising their advantages in our papers and are pushing their wares into our country. This fact is fast demoralizing our trade and depreciating our property values.

All other points in Mexico along this free border, where there are railway facilities, are fast becoming harbors for smugglers, and every day's delay works a loss to the commerce of our country and revenues of the Government.

The reasons assigned for the act are admitted by the Mexican people to be that it will build up their border towns and check the growth of the American towns; that it will increase their population along the border and decrease our population, thereby strengthening their border and weakening ours.

Therefore it can not be possible for the merchants on the American side, as well as the jobbers and manufacturers in our large cities, to compete for the growing trade of Mexico as against the jobbers and manufacturers of Europe. This is a vital question to the jobbers and manufacturers of all the cities of the United States who have been selling goods to the merchants in the American towns on the border, and to the merchants and others in Mexico, because the free goods in the free towns of Mexico, created by the Free Zone act, will prove an effectual barrier between them and the trade of Mexico.

Each day this matter is assuming greater proportions, and the longer it exists the greater the difficulty in overcoming it.

Paso del Norte is made the principal point for carrying on this business, because the many railways centering at El Paso, Tex., furnish quick and ready transportation to all portions of the United States.

The petition concludes by asking that a reciprocity treaty be entered into with Mexico, in order to give this country some protection against the great amount of smuggling which necessarily occurs under the Free Zone act in the Republic of Mexico.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the petition is referred I wish to ask the Senator from Texas if the commercial convention with Mexico of January 20, 1883, does not cover what the petitioners desire to be secured to them?

Mr. COKE. I think it does not cover the point made by the petitioners. The commercial convention referred to has lapsed, has it not?

Mr. MORGAN. The commercial convention has not lapsed. It has been several times renewed and extended for the purpose of giving Congress the opportunity to pass those laws which are essential, by the terms of the convention itself, to its execution.

Mr. COKE. The Senator alludes to the treaty passed through the Senate, but which was never acted upon by the other House.

Mr. MORGAN. I allude to the treaty which has been ratified and proclaimed, and several times amended by extending it since it was made, with a view of giving Congress the opportunity to pass the laws which are provided in that treaty for its execution. My own conviction is a very firm one that if the Congress of the United States should pass the laws to execute the treaty, the purposes of these petitioners would be entirely accomplished, or, if not entirely, at least substantially accomplished.

Mr. COKE. I concur fully with the Senator from Alabama as to that. The treaty passed the Senate several years ago, but has never received action in the other House. There is nothing that can be done which would help the commerce of this country with Mexico more than the adoption and enforcement of that treaty. With it the complaints that have been presented in this petition would not exist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a petition of the Maryland State Temperance Alliance, and a petition of ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of Washington, D. C., and vicinity, praying for the passage of a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale, importation, etc., of intoxicating liquors for beverages in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 665) to establish a quarantine station at the port of San Francisco, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases. I should like to have the bill referred to that committee without any further printing, because they meet to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The change of reference will be made as requested, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 841) to facilitate the settlement and develop the resources of the Territory of Alaska, and to open an overland commercial route between the United States, Asiatic Russia, and Japan, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 147) for the relief of S. D. Barclay, G. D. Adams, and William H. Kimbrew, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 502) for the relief of Mary F. Potts, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 192) to provide that judges of the United States circuit and district courts shall reduce their instructions to juries to writing, in all States wherein by the laws thereof State judges are required so to do, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 270) to establish a United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5514) to amend section 4883 of the Revised Statutes, to report it without amendment. I send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, to accompany the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1696) for the relief of Lewis J. Cundiff, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1671) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1044) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to state and settle the account of James M. Willbur with the United States, and to pay said Willbur such sum of money as may be found due him thereon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1499) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 903) for the relief of Laban Heath & Co., of Boston, Mass., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 169) granting an increase of pension to Abby J. Slocum, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 175) granting a pension to Eleanor S. Lawson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1163) for the relief of Edward Rice, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 626) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Franklin, alias McKee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John W. Cummins, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2467) to amend chapter 191 of the private acts of the Forty-ninth Congress, passed at the second session thereof, concerning James H. Young, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 855) to amend and correct the act approved February 22, 1887, granting a pension to James H. Young, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 1370) for the relief of Assistant Engineer Howard D. Potts, United States Navy, heretofore reported by that committee.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 535) providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 379) to allow soldiers and sailors in the United States service who have lost both hands an increased pension;

A bill (S. 550) granting a pension to William C. Wait;

A bill (S. 168) granting a pension to Mary E. Crimmins, widow of Patrick Crimmins;

A bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen;

A bill (S. 1412) granting increase of pension to Mary B. Hook;

A bill (S. 167) granting a pension to Ann E. Tew;

A bill (S. 40) granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. Pierce; and

A bill (S. 171) granting a pension to Jennie H. Coghill.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 381) for the relief of Jesse H. Strickland, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1209) for the relief of Robert H. Blake, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

JACKSON, MISS., MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate direct me to report the resolution which I send to the desk. I wish to say that it is the report which was submitted yesterday, but withdrawn temporarily to incorporate some suggestions made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. EDMUNDS]. It is now submitted in a form to meet his approval. I should like to have action on the report.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary January 23, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, in making the inquiries into certain matters alleged to have occurred at Jackson, Miss., and as directed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 12th instant and of the 23d instant, be paid out of the appropriation for the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of said committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Contingent Expenses will be next read.

The Chief Clerk read the substitute proposed by the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, in making the inquiries into certain matters alleged to have occurred at Jackson, Miss., and as directed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 12th instant and of the 23d instant, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the said committee, and by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the resolution be now considered? The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

COMPILATION OF REVENUE AND APPROPRIATION ACTS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom were referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] January 9, 1888, and the resolution submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] January 19, 1888, to report a substitute. I ask for the adoption of the substitute at this time.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to compile, for the use of the Senate, from the Journals of the two Houses, the Annals of Congress, the Register of Debates in Congress, and the Congressional Globe and RECORD, a complete chronological history of revenue and general appropriation bills from the First to the Forty-ninth Congresses, inclusive, and for this purpose shall be authorized to employ an additional clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund such compensation as shall be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed, under the direction of the Committees on Finance and Appropriations of the Senate, to compile for the use of the Senate, from all available sources, a complete chronological history of revenue and general appropriation bills from the First to the Forty-ninth Congresses, inclusive; and for this purpose shall be authorized to employ an additional clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund such compensation as shall be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed as a substitute for the resolutions already read the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed, under the direction of the Committees on Finance and Appropriations, to compile for the use of the Senate, from all available sources, a complete chronological history of revenue and general appropriation bills from the First to the Forty-ninth Congresses, inclusive; and for this purpose shall be authorized to employ an additional clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund such compensation, not to exceed the rate of $2,500 per annum, as shall be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask how long it will probably take to complete this compilation.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Probably a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not, then, be better to amend and say "to the Fiftieth Congresses, inclusive," so as to include all the bills of the present Congress?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. There is no objection to that amendment, I think.

Mr. FRYE. Let it include the acts of the first session of the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be two volumes, I imagine, and the first volume can be printed, and the last one compiled can include all the acts of this Congress and be a complete compilation for the first fifty Congresses.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I think it would be an advantage to include the acts of the present Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to strike out "Forty-ninth" and insert "Fiftieth."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri proposes an amendment to the substitute reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out "Forty-ninth" and insert "Fiftieth," and after the word "Congresses" to insert the word "inclusive;" so as to read:

From the First to the Fiftieth Congresses, inclusive.

Mr. BECK. The Fiftieth Congress will not expire until the 4th of March, 1889. Will that not delay the publication very much? Say "to the first session of the Fiftieth Congress."

Mr. COCKRELL. It will be impossible, unless you employ an immense force, to go over and prepare all the acts by the 4th of March, 1889. Let us have it completed for this Congress.

Mr. BECK. All right; I do not want to delay the passage of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. As soon as one volume is ready it can be printed. There will be two volumes of the publication, necessarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the substitute reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution reported by the committee as amended was agreed to; and the original resolutions postponed indefinitely.

REPORT OF DISTRICT HEALTH OFFICER.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably the House concurrent resolution providing for printing the report of the District health officer, and I ask for its present adoption.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed by the Public Printer 2,500 copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; 100 for the use of the Senate, 350 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,050 copies for the use of the said health officer.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 36) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, to report it adversely and ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

REPORT UPON WOOL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 9) to authorize the printing of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool, to report adversely as to the joint resolution, and recommend that its form be changed to that of a concurrent resolution, that being the requirement of the law where no appropriation is involved in the bill. So I shall follow adverse action and the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution by the introduction of a concurrent resolution, and ask for its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it will be postponed indefinitely, if no objection be interposed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a concurrent resolution to authorize the printing of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 17,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool, as follows: Ten thousand copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, 5,000 for the use of the members of the Senate, and 2,000 for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ACTION OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution relative to the action of the Navy Department in regard to the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin, to report it with an amendment; and I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of the changes made from the original plans of the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin in addition to those specified in a communication from the Navy Department to the House of Representatives of February 11, 1885 (constituting House Executive Document No. 229, Forty-eighth Congress, second session), and in a communication from said Department to the Senate of May 24, 1888 (constituting Senate Executive Document No. 153, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), together with the cost of such additional changes in each case; and that the Secretary be directed also to furnish the Senate with copies of all documents and correspondence on file in said Department written since March 5, 1885, in any way concerning the aforesaid vessels, which are not contained in the annual reports of said Department, including all reports of boards and of commanding officers and engineer officers, and all log-books kept while the vessels have been in motion since said date, and all the evidences of settlements and payments made since said date by the United States, and of any unsettled claims on account of said vessels; and that the Secretary be directed further to state the present condition of the Atlanta, Boston, and Chicago, and the reasons for the delay in their completion and reception into active service.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

Together with the reasons for the action of the Department in each case reported under this resolution and those passed by the Senate on the 25th of January last, and also to state the present condition of the monitor Miantonomoh and her armament.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1811) to authorize the sale to the Schuylkill River East Side Railroad Company of a lot of ground belonging to the United States Naval Asylum in the city of Philadelphia, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HEARST introduced a bill (S. 1832) to incorporate the People's Electrical and Cable Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1833) granting a pension to Eveline M. Alexander, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Andrew J. Alexander; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CRIME IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 1213) to punish robbery, burglary, and larceny in the Indian Territory was passed, with a view to make a formal amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed may be reconsidered for the purpose of making a formal amendment. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 6, before the word "mule," insert the word "or;" so as to read:

That any person hereafter convicted in the United States courts having jurisdiction over the Indian Territory, or parts thereof, of stealing any horse, mare, gelding, filly, foal, ass, or mule, when said theft is committed in the Indian Territory, shall be punished, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution I offered yesterday morning.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to give a notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive further morning business.

Mr. DOLPH. I give notice that on Friday next, after the close of the morning business, I shall ask leave to call up the bill (S. 63) for payment of balance unpaid on Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war claims for suppression of Indian hostilities in 1855 and 1856, as found due by commission appointed by Secretary of War, consisting of General Rufus Ingalls, Capt. A. J. Smith, and Hon. L. F. Grover, pursuant to act of Congress, and disallowed by Third Auditor of the Treasury, as per his report of February 7, 1860, and I shall crave the indulgence of the Senate for a short time to make some remarks upon the bill.

INTERNATIONAL COINAGE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the morning business, I shall call up the joint resolution (S. R. 30) relating to international coinage, for the purpose of making a few remarks upon it.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, empowering Congress to legislate upon the subjects of marriage and divorce, and prohibiting bigamy and polygamy, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1481) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Pineville, La., to the national military cemetery near that town;

A bill (H. R. 1483) for the erection of a public building at Monroe, La.;

A bill (H. R. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 1640) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district;

A bill (H. R. 1697) for the erection of a public building in the city of Asheville, N. C.;

A bill (H. R. 1860) to amend section 683 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. 4359) for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, also for the erection of the necessary store-houses for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I call up the resolution introduced by me a day or two since on the subject of the postal service.

Mr. CALL. I have made a motion first to call up another resolution, I suggest to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I can not hear a word the Senator from Florida says. I should be glad to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has endeavored many times ineffectually to enforce order. Complaint is made that the proceedings can not be heard on account of the confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. CALL. I suggested to the Senator from Kansas that before he made a motion to take up the resolution to which he referred, I had asked the Senate to take up the resolution I presented yesterday morning with a view of allowing me to make some remarks upon it.

Mr. PLUMB. Will those remarks continue beyond the morning hour?

Mr. CALL. I do not know that they will; I can not say.

Mr. PLUMB. My only purpose is to get along with the business. If it will suit the Senator as well, there is an order of business here which does not seem so urgently pressing, in charge of a very amiable friend of mine, which is a convenient shield behind which we usually get for the purpose of transacting public business, etc., and who always yields to a speech. I suggest whether he would not as well ask the Senator from New Hampshire that which he is always fond to grant, to allow him to take the time set aside for the consideration of the educational bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the order of resolutions is passed, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order will be the laying before the Senate of the resolutions coming over from a former day. The Senator from Virginia objects to the request made by the Senator from Florida to proceed out of order.

Mr. CULLOM. If I may be allowed to say a word, I will state that the Senator from Florida has been seeking the floor for the purpose of addressing the Senate now for several days, but has yielded very graciously.

Mr. PLUMB. He only introduced the resolution yesterday.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that the Senate will allow him to proceed with his remarks this morning, as he said yesterday morning he desired to do so, and gave way yesterday for the accommodation of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Florida is on the Calendar of resolutions, and will be reached in order.

Mr. CALL. I desire to correct the Chair. I introduced the resolution yesterday, and I understood that it would come up to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the Calendar of resolutions, which will be reported in their order. There were some resolutions placed upon the Calendar prior to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not my purpose to object at all. I only wanted to see if we could not have some accommodation of the matter in such a way that the resolution I have in charge might go through and the Senator from Florida might also speak to-day. Of course, if his remarks are continued beyond the morning hour my resolution must go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that for the last week I have been giving this notice. I have some papers here which I desire to put in the RECORD, but I shall not ask to delay the Senate by reading them. The resolution which the Senator from Kansas has before the Senate will elicit a good deal of discussion, as it has already done, and that would consume the whole of the time this morning, and perhaps more.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not interpose any objection to the Senator's desire in this matter.

Mr. FRYE. I have a resolution on the Calendar prior to the resolution of the Senator from Florida, which will provoke no discussion whatever, and I am very anxious to get it through, so that the information which it calls for may be gathered. I ask the Senator from Florida to yield that that resolution may be taken up. The resolution is already on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That there may be no misunderstanding on this subject, the Chair will ask the Chief Clerk to state the resolutions which are ready to be acted upon in their order, coming over from a former day.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolution by Mr. PLUMB, directing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make thorough inquiry into the cause of inefficient mail service.

Resolution by Mr. FRYE, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to prepare a statement showing the political organization of the Dominion of Canada.

Resolution by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, to consider in open session the treaty now pending between this Government and that of Great Britain.

Resolution by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, to amend Senate Rule XXXVII.

Resolution by Mr. CALL, relative to the management of railroads by receivers appointed by United States courts.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to the resolution which I have in charge being laid aside, if it does not lose its place, in order that the Senator from Florida may speak to his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of resolutions will remain unchanged. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] asks unanimous consent that the order of resolutions may be changed, and that the Senator from Florida will yield to enable him to call up the resolution offered by him.

Mr. FRYE. There will be no debate on it. If there is, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Let us hear the title of the resolution. I object until I can hear the title of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the resolution will be stated.

Mr. FRYE. It is the resolution calling for information relative to Canada.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Canada! I object, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia objects. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon; I do not understand what the request of the Senator from Florida is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the resolution offered by him on a former day may be taken up to enable him to submit some remarks upon the same to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. What resolution is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution by Mr. CALL, relative to the management of railroads by receivers appointed by United States courts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Chair whether a resolution to change a rule of the Senate which shall regulate its proceedings for to-day does not have preference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a resolution has no priority.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And it can have no right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has no right of precedence.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Whether presented by a member of the Committee on Rules or not, it has no preference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has no precedence; it takes its place upon the order of resolutions. Does the Senator from Virginia object to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir.

RAILROAD RECEIVERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Florida will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report, by bill or otherwise, such legislation as may be necessary to prevent the courts of the United States, in managing railroads through receivers, from depriving creditors of their liens on said railroads and corporate properties by the sale of the properties under receiver's certificates, issued under the order of said courts, whereby the title to great railroad properties and vast bodies of the public land of the people of the United States, carrying with them a power of taxation over the people, is vested in favorites and combinations of persons selected and approved by the receiver and his confederates.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the subject of this resolution has attracted a great deal of attention from the people of the United States for the last ten years. It has recently received some consideration in an article published in the Popular Science Monthly, by H. W. Bartol, which speaks as follows:

Perhaps no question of the day is exercising a more important influence on the investments of the country than this question of receiverships, and certainly none is of more importance to the investor in corporation securities, whether it be in their stocks or bonds; for, with the present readiness of our courts to appoint receivers on the slightest excuse, and to hold the properties indefinitely, no one can tell when his property may be taken out of his hands, nor, when so taken, how it will be administered. In fact, this readiness of the courts to appoint receivers is taken advantage of to wreck corporations in the interest of one class of creditors to the injury of all others, and under it unscrupulous speculators have and are to-day using the mantle of justice to accomplish their ends.

Years before, a distinguished lawyer of the State of Mississippi called attention to the invasion of the spirit and purpose of the constitutional provision, that no State could impair the obligation of contracts, by the practice of the courts in appointing receivers and divesting one class of contracts of their obligation and their lien. Judge Alexander F. Clayton, a man widely known throughout this country as a lawyer of eminent ability, in an article published in the American Law Review, at Boston, which has received notice in the works of a commentator (Jones on the Law of Corporate Mortgages), speaks as follows:

This essay will have fulfilled its object if it should tend to call courts back to the original principle that a lien can not be displaced without the consent, express or implied, of its owner, except in cases of extreme necessity, where the failure to preserve the property would be an act of such gross negligence on the part of the person intrusted with its custody as to render him liable for the injury.—American Law Review, Volume XIII, page 44, 1878-'79.

To the same effect Mr. Associate Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Barton vs. Barbour, spoke in rendering a dissenting opinion; and I will here undertake to say that not the least amongst the services which that distinguished judge in the latter years of his judicial life has rendered to this country will be his late interpretations of constitutional law, which will be transmitted to the future as an honorable tribute to the wisdom and the learning of this century. Mr. Justice Miller, dissenting in that opinion, speaks as follows on the subject of this resolution:

The rapid absorption of the business of the country of every character by corporations, while productive of much good to the public, is beginning also to develop many evils, not the least of which arises from their failure to pay debts and perform the duties which by the terms of their organization they assumed.

* * * * * * *

I call the attention of those of the Senators who care to perform their duties to the States and to the people to this statement of an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to the condition of the law, and to the fact that it is due entirely to the manner in which Senators perform the duties which are intrusted to them that of the thousands of miles of railway controlled by corporations in the circuit of this distinguished justice hardly half a dozen have escaped the hands of improper and unscrupulous judicial action, for the judge says:

In regard, however, to a certain class of corporations, a class whose operations are as important to the interests of the community and as intimately connected with its business and social habits as any other, the appointment of receivers, as well as the power conferred on them, and the duration of their office, has made a progress which, since it is wholly the work of courts of chancery and not of legislatures, may well suggest a pause for consideration. It will not be necessary to any observing mind to say that I allude to railroad corporations. Of the fifty or more who own or have owned the many thousand miles of railway in my judicial circuit, I think I speak within limits in saying that hardly half a dozen have escaped the hands of the receiver. If these receivers had been appointed to sell the roads, collect the means of the companies, and pay their debts, it might have been well enough.

But this was hardly ever done. It is never done now. It is not the purpose for which a receiver is appointed. He generally takes the property out of the hands of its owner, operates the road in his own way, with an occasional suggestion from the court, which he recognizes as a sort of partner in the business; sometimes, though very rarely, pays some money on the debts of the corporation, but quite as often adds to them, and injures prior creditors by creating a new and superior lien on the property pledged to them.

During all this time he is in the use of the road and rolling-stock, and performing the functions of a common carrier of goods and passengers. He makes contracts and incurs obligations, many of which he fails to perform. (Barton vs. Barbour, United States Reports, S. C., Otto, XIV, pages 137 and 138.)

Thus speaks this distinguished justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, giving the country and Congress warning of the necessity of legislation. Yet that committee of the Senate which is charged with protecting the people against such wrongs has not only not acted in the premises, but is profoundly indifferent to the statement. These words from a witness so eminent and well informed, speaking judicially, present a fearful picture of fraud, venality, and corruption. Why not use the right words in the right place? Justice Miller's statement can not be true without the existence of these vices in their most flagrant form; yet they have not made even a ripple on the smooth surface of the contentment of the Committee on the Judiciary and of the Senate with this condition of affairs.

Justice Miller says:

It is not the purpose for which a receiver is appointed. He takes the property out of the hands of its owner, operates the road in his own way with an occasional suggestion from the court, which he recognizes as a sort of partner in the business; sometimes, though very rarely, pays some money on the debts of the corporation, but quite as often adds to them and injures prior creditors by creating a new and superior lien on the property pledged to them.

This is the judicial discretion which the Senator from Vermont and the Committee on the Judiciary respect so highly, and are so unwilling to take away from the judge, or even to limit.

If Justice Miller's statement be true, and I have no doubt that it is, it means that the great railroad properties are the prey and support of great speculators preying on the honest stockholders, and on the people at large, through the use and instrumentality of the judges of the courts of the United States; but even this statement from this high authority seems to excite neither interest nor attention in this body. Why is it?

It can not be because the witness is not eminent in character, ability, and official position.

It can not be because the evil is not one of the greatest possible magnitude.

It can not be because the welfare of all the people, both of the present and the future, does not demand its immediate investigation and correction.

Mr. President, it is somewhat strange that with this comment and this testimony from the highest judicial tribunal in the country, and from a man who has no superior amongst them in many respects, there should have been for years no attempt on the part of those who are specially charged with the duty to reform this abuse of the courts—a judge undertaking to do that which the Constitution forbids a State to do and which it was created to prevent, namely, impairing the obligations of contracts and operating thousands of miles of railway and controlling and disposing of hundreds of millions of dollars of property and the thousands of men employed on them, in the interest of fraud, and using the property committed to them for fraudulent purposes.

I should not have been moved to introduce this resolution did I not desire that if here in the Senate a dull ear should be turned to complaints of wrong, however flagrant and however well founded, beyond the walls of this Chamber a sound public opinion might at least be turned towards this great public evil.

I am not ignorant of the fact that the attractions of the lunch-table are greater to many Senators at this hour than the demands of public duty. Neither am I insensible to the fact, which nine years of service in the Senate has taught me, that any effort to create remedies for wrongs committed by the courts in the interest of corporations, against the people and against public right, will empty these benches, but measures looking to their protection will fill these empty seats with eager and interested disputants.

I wish to call the attention of Congress and the country to a case coming within the class of those which the distinguished judge of the Supreme Court of the United States has alluded to as of frequent occurrence, but surpassing all others in its peculiar and flagrant wrongfulness. I have before me, for the purpose of illustrating the necessity of this resolution and of some action on the part of the Judiciary Committee of this body and of the Senate, the record of a suit in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida. I desire to make some brief references to that record.

The bill was filed on the 25th of October, 1885, bearing the indorsement of a clerk of that court. This bill alleges that the complainant holds a note for $100,000 against the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, a company which has consolidated some five or six hundred miles of railway in the State of Florida, the original cost of which was not less than three or four million dollars, which has been in various litigations for the last twenty years, and portions of which for a considerable part of that time have been in the hands of a receiver and operated entirely by him under order of the judges. This bill alleges that this complainant holds a note for $100,000 against this vast amount of railroad property, that he has brought suit to recover judgment, issued execution, and been unable to collect the money. It prays then for the appointment of a receiver, and upon this judgment, rendered by consent, and these proceedings without inquiry and judicial hearing of all the parties interested, a receiver was appointed; and this great amount of corporate property devoted to public uses is taken into the possession of a receiver appointed from another and a distant part of the country by a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States sitting in his capacity as a circuit judge here in the city of Washington.

Then comes in Louis F. Meyer, the trustee, under a mortgage to secure certain bonds, who alleged that he represented a large amount of bonds issued for what purpose is not stated, with what good faith, the necessity therefor unknown and uninquired into, who approved the appointment of this receiver and prayed for other relief. Certain litigation was had in which certain second-mortgage bondholders come forward and allege their standing in that court by independent suit for years, asserting liens upon that property, asserting that a large part of this property was originally sold without judicial sanction because of the default of the holder and the default of the contractors of the corporation upon the property of which these creditors held a valid deed of mortgage.

This record further showed to this court that this defaulting holder of the unpaid stock of this corporation, namely, the Florida Railroad Company, and this defaulting contractor, was the purchaser without judicial sale, as against the paid-up stockholders and the second-mortgage creditors, from the ex officio trustees, for an insignificant consideration, of the corporate property which had been conveyed by a valid deed of mortgage for the security and payment of the second-mortgage bondholders who were then before that court asserting their rights.

This record further showed to this court that more than a million of dollars of money, the proceeds of sale of land which was subject by law to be appropriated to the education of the children of the State had been paid on the debts and obligations of this holder of the unpaid stock and this defaulting contractor for the construction of the railroad.

This record further showed that the defaulting stockholder and this defaulting contractor was the grantor in the deed of trust to Louis F. Meyer to secure the payment of certain first-mortgage bonds executed on this corporate property. To the end that this may appear without doubt to those who either here or elsewhere may be interested in the purity of the administration of justice, the protection of the rights of property, and the safety of life, of personal rights and reputation, I here print from the record as follows:

Section 27 of the act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida, approved July 6, 1855, provides—

That after the railroad companies * * * shall for five consecutive years pay 6 per cent. on capital stock paid in and bonded debt, and apply the sum of 1 per cent. yearly to a sinking fund on said debt, then the trustees of the internal-improvement fund may apply, under the direction of the Legislature, the annual income arising from said fund * * * to the support of schools. * * *

The first section of an act to amend "An act incorporating the Florida Railroad Company" provides—

That the act incorporating the Florida Railroad Company, approved the 8th day of January, A. D. 1853, is hereby amended so that the said company shall have power to construct the railroad from Amelia Island, on the Atlantic, to the waters of Tampa Bay, in South Florida, with an extension to Cedar Key, in East Florida, under the provisions of an act to provide for and encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in this State, approved the 6th day of January, A. D. 1856.

There had been a previous charter granted by the State to construct the road to the Gulf of Mexico, with the following provisions:

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said railroad shall commence in East Florida, upon some tributary of the Atlantic Ocean, within the limits of the State of Florida, having a sufficient outlet to the ocean to admit of the passage of sea steamers, and shall run through the eastern and southern part of the State, in the most eligible direction, to some point, bay, arm, or tributary of the Gulf of Mexico, in South Florida, south of the Suwanee River, having a sufficient outlet for sea steamers, to be determined by a competent engineer, with the approval of a majority of the directors of said company.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be $1,000,000, divided into shares of $100 each * * * Each subscriber shall, at the time of his subscription, pay to said commissioners $1 on each share subscribed for, and the books of subscription at each of the above-mentioned places shall be kept open for the space of sixty days, at the expiration of which time they shall be closed.

The act provided that upon the subscription of 1 per cent. of the total amount of $1,000,000 of capital stock the railroad company should become a corporation and authorized to construct the road. The $1,000,000 was subscribed, the 1 per cent. nominally paid, immediately returned to the stockholders, and from that time to this it remains unpaid. The stock subscription has never been paid; but the State of Florida under the provisions of that act, through the internal-improvement fund, paid out of the proceeds of these sales of the public lands granted by the United States to the State under the swamp and overflowed land grant and the internal-improvement land grant $90,000, being the only paid-up stockholder that existed in the road from the beginning to the end.

Under that condition of things, which is verified by the answers that I read from the testimony taken in a cause pending in the circuit court of the United States at Jacksonville, it is abundantly proved that here was a railroad corporation with its stock subscribed for and never paid, held chiefly by two individuals, and from that day to this remaining unpaid. I read from the testimony of Joseph Finegan, a witness in that case, on the one hundred and thirty-first page of the record of the circuit court of the United States, in the case of Robert H. Johnson against the Florida Railroad Company:

I was the receiver or person to whom the money was to be paid, and there was no money paid on this subscription. There was no payment ever made in money on the capital stock subscribed for as above stated by the association, but at a meeting of the above stockholders, held immediately after the books were closed at the Buffington House, the following board of directors were elected: D. L. Yulee, George W. Call, J. H. Bronson, Philip Dell, George R. Fairbanks, A. H. Cole, Thomas O. Holmes, and John Parsons, and myself, the board of directors electing D. L. Yulee as president, and George W. Call as secretary and treasurer.

At a meeting of the directors $2,000 salary was allowed the president and $1,500 to me as treasurer, $1,500 to George W. Call as secretary; this amount was credited as a payment on our stock.

There was no other payment on the subscriptions for stock made as above stated, except $20,000, which was the estimated value of the land purchased from George Law and referred to in the preceding testimony, until it was tranferred to the Florida Railroad Company.

The proceeds of that sale were credited on the stock of the associates.

No other payment was ever made in money on the stock subscribed for by the associates, as I have before stated, during my connection with the Florida Railroad Company.

There was no money paid or actually to be paid on the contract; they have no cash subscriptions, no available means. Their only means consisted of the bonds under the internal-improvement act and the lands donated under the act, and the two town sites, which were in a wild condition and without population.

* * * * * * *

Upon this assurance and guaranty of Mr. Yulee that Moses Taylor and Marshall O. Roberts, of New York, were the real parties with whom I was dealing, and that they were responsible for and would make good the engagements of Mr. Dickerson in the contract, and would pay all the debts of Finegan & Co., and would return our notes, and the additional assurance that they would put large capital into the enterprise and put a line of steamers at both ends of the road immediately on completion, the contract was executed with Mr. Dickerson. In pursuance of the obligations of that contract Finegan & Co. transferred to David L. Yulee all their bonds and stock, to be held by him in trust to secure the performance of the contract by said Edward N. Dickerson, and a written agreement to that effect was signed by the said Dickerson, Finegan, and Cole, and witnessed by said Yulee, and the said trust accepted by the said D. L. Yulee.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Dickerson never did carry out the contract or agreement with Finegan & Co. He failed to take up some of the notes of Finegan & Co., and I had to pay them myself. In fact, all the engagements of Finegan & Co. which were performed after that date and all the outstanding debts were taken up by the Florida Railroad Company in its corporate capacity. [NOTE.—Complainant's counsel here offers in evidence memorandum of agreement marked Exhibit C in the bill of Yulee vs. Vose, and is hereto attached as Exhibit B, by consent of defendant's counsel, in lieu of the original on file in this court.] In reality, after I gave up the contract the Florida Railroad Company finished the road to Cedar Key.

* * * * * * *

If the powers contained in the two trust deeds creating the trust and the provisions contained in the second deed of trust for the protection of the free-land bonds, requiring an assessment of the stock one-half per cent. semi-annually, had been faithfully carried into effect the trustees would then have had ample means to have paid the interest and expenses and protected the trust.

This provision for a sinking fund by assessment of the stock was never carried into effect by the trustees. It required the trustees to take possession of the road and its franchises upon the failure of the company to pay the 1 per cent. annually assessed to the stock of the trustees.

* * * * * * *

The internal-improvement fund owned more than $90,000 in paid-up stock in the Florida Railroad Company.

Mr. Dickinson and Mr. Yulee held a large majority of the unpaid stock.

The 32,000 bonds alluded to by me in the preceding as paid in Ed. M. Dickerson for purchase-money are numbered as follows: 1042, 1045, 1044, 1037, 1038, 1039, 1032, 1034, 724, 723, 1048, 1035, 1033, 1046, 725, 1036, 1047, 891, and 890, 1233, 1246, 1247, 1248, 1249, 1251, 1255, 1257, 1258, 1261, 1263, 1267, 1253.

On the 14th November '59, I sent to New York a check on Riggs & Co., New York, $1,135, to take up the notes of Finegan & Co. Afterward Mr. Yulee gave me three internal-improvement bonds as security for this amount.

JOSEPH FINEGAN.

It is agreed between Joseph Finegan & Co. and Edwin N. Dickerson that the various bonds and certificates of stock conveyed by Joseph Finegan & Co. to Edwin N. Dickerson, under an agreement dated May 24, 1858, shall be held by David L. Yulee to secure the performance of the said contract by said Edwin N. Dickerson, and that the said Yulee shall release and deliver to said Dickerson the said bonds and stock as he satisfies the debts contracted to be paid by him for said Finegan & Co., and in proportion to the amounts discharged and paid.

Dated May 29, 1859.

EDW'D N. DICKERSON.
JOSEPH FINEGAN.
A. H. COLE.

I know that $32,000 of the bonds paid in by Edward N. Dickerson as the purchase-money for the town sites of Fernandina and Cedar Key to John McRae, trustee, were the same bonds which I had paid in for lots bought from trustees, and which were required to be canceled under the trust deed.

I have compared the numbers of these bonds with the numbers which John McRae received for the town sites, and I know that they are the same. Mr. Yulee was not a man of large property, and what he possessed was, I think, encumbered by mortgages.

Further on Mr. Yulee testifies that this money was a loan; and I read from his testimony:

But I will now say, further, that it was not expected that the gentlemen composing what was called "the Association" could furnish the means to build the road. It was known they could not.

I procured also the passage of the "internal-improvement act" by the State, whereby a good bonded security for $10,000 per mile, to iron and equip the road, and a grant of alternate sections of State lands were obtained. I also procured a grant of alternate sections of public lands from the United States. These assets seemed sufficient for the construction of the road. They were all put into the treasury of the corporation and devoted to the uses of the enterprise. They were all by mortgages made, primarily, appropriate to construction. The means for construction were obtained upon the credit of this property and of the road to be constructed, and not upon the credit of the stock. The only benefit the stockholders could derive would be in dividends of earnings after the construction and maintenance of the road was fully paid.

D. L. Yulee to George W. Call:

"But how stands the matter? We call for the restoration of the first 1 per cent., which was loaned to the subscribers till called for (I have faithfully regarded this as a loan, and have held myself in law and honor bound for the whole sum to the company, being myself responsible for it), and we also call for something further."

I do not know if the bonds specified by witness were paid in by Mr. Dickerson to the trustees. It is quite possible they were. The bonds he enumerates were in the hands of Mr. Soutter, one of the trustees.

* * * * * * *

In pursuance of a resolution of the board of directors a stock dividend is declared of $1.59 per share out of proceeds of land sales, there being 10,220 shares, which is $16,249.80, and the balance carried to reserve-fund account, $73.45.

* * * * * * *

I find that he credits cash and charges himself with $245,526.98, derived mostly from four installments of 1 per cent. each, and two installments of 10 per cent. each, and further credits stock on account of land and interest dividends with $119,395.81, making altogether, up to September, 1859, at which date the entries in this book cease, a credit on stock of $364,922.79.

Mr. Yulee testifies further:

The contractors furnished the collaterals, paid for fastenings, duties, expenses of transportation, expense of laying, etc., themselves. The company did nothing but give their notes for the material secured by the bonds and subject to the risk of the inadequacy of the bonds to cover the debt. The bonds placed as collateral were always sufficient to cover the debt at a valuation of 80 per cent.

The fact then appears abundantly established in this record and consented to by all parties that here was a railroad company, with the great majority of its stock unpaid, on which no considerable amount was ever paid, and held by parties who paid little or nothing for it, while the State through the internal-improvement fund had become a cash stockholder to the extent of $90,000. Under an alleged authority contained in the internal-improvement act of 1866 this road was sold by the provisional trustees of the State of Florida, the officers of the provisional government, the governor, comptroller, the attorney-general, and treasurer of the State being ex officio under the law trustees for the sale of this property. The act provided that the road should not be sold until after completion for any default in the payment of the interest or principal upon the bonds that had been issued; but without reference to that, without any judicial proceedings, this property was sold, and it was bought by a person who was the debtor of the company and of the paid-up stockholders for the unpaid subscriptions for stock of the railroad company, and who was obligated to pay them. It was bought with the statutory bonds of the road, which had twenty years to run, at an estimated value of 20 cents on the dollar—a very extraordinary proceeding, to pay for a property with its unmatured obligations having twenty years to run. The parties purchasing this road had become connected with its unpaid stock by assuming to pay the debts of the contractors who had built the road, as appears in this testimony. Mr. Yulee further testifies as follows:

I said I thought it advisable to specify the debts owing by this company to parties residing in the United States (now at war with this Government), which were contracted on account and in behalf of the contractors, Edward N. Dickerson & Co. The obligations of this company (Florida Railroad) were given, but the collateral security, in every case large, was furnished to the company by the contractors, to be placed with the notes as security to the company, as well as the creditors.

The convenience of the company name in these cases was afforded to the contractors for reasons useful to the object of the company, but without any agreed pecuniary considerations.

The notes given by the company in the place of the contractors under this arrangement were as follows:

Table showing the amount and kind of collaterals.

D. L. YULEE.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, at Fernandina, this 16th day of February, A. D. 1880.

[SEAL.] CHARLES W. LEWIS,
United States Commissioner for the Northern District of Florida.

It is that with which we have principally to deal now. This obligation of Vose, Livingston & Co. was that of Mr. Dickerson, who became the contractor and the assignee of the preceding contractors and obligated himself to pay this note. It was not paid. It ran up into the large sum of $1,000,000, including costs and expenses. For that obligation the State paid 4,000,000 acres of the public land, netting the amount of $1,000,000.

Thus it was that a million dollars of proceeds of the sales of the public lands subject to be applied to school purposes were sold to make good the default of this purchaser of the railroad, who then and now retains that property, or did until a short period ago.

We have then a railroad the entire cash stock of which is paid for by the State and the unpaid stock subscribed for and never paid, being an obligation resting upon the subscribers and those who assumed the obligation in place of them. We have a sale of the road and a purchase of it by its non-paying stockholder and its non-paying contractor. We have a million dollars of the public money of the State, the result of the proceeds of the sales of public lands, sold to pay this debt.

Whatever denials are made in general terms, whatever elaborate and ingenious explanations and statements are made in the record which contains these statements, it remains true that the 1 per cent. required to be paid on the organization of the company was only nominally paid and then returned to the subscribing stockholders, and never thereafter paid; and that the majority of its stock was never paid. That they had acquired the stock by an obligation to pay the debts of Finegan & Company, which obligation they had never performed; but the debts had been paid by substituting the notes of the railroad company, in which the State was the only cash stockholder, through its internal-improvement fund, for the obligations of the contractors. The spectacle was thus presented of a road built out of the lands donated by the United States to the State of Florida, without any payment upon its stock subscription, and by the substitution of the notes of the railroad company for the notes of its contractors which had been obligated to be paid by the persons who made the purchase, and a purchase of the property by the non-paying contractors and payment for it with the obligations which they were themselves bound to pay.

Had their default in payment not been made the debts of the road would have been paid entirely by the persons who held its unpaid stock. Among the obligations thus assumed was an obligation of Vose, Livingston & Co., of which Mr. Yulee testifies as follows:

I had added to the obligations of the company my own individual indorsements in the case of Vose, Livingston & Co., and in several other instances where it was required to satisfy creditors. The bonds of the company had become much depreciated in the market from various causes, but I knew the internal-improvement bonds to be intrinsically worth par and that their face value was certainly realizable at some time from the internal-improvement fund and the road, and relied upon them for my security.

Thus it appears that the internal-improvement fund was a paid-up stockholder to the amount of $90,000; that the subsequent purchaser of the road and its franchise at the alleged trustees' sale (Mr. E. N. Dickerson) was the owner and holder of this unpaid stock and subject to all the obligations of its original subscribers under a contract with Finegan & Co. to assume and pay their debts and obligations as contractors; that among these debts was that of Vose, Livingston & Co.; that the note of the Florida Railroad Company was given for this debt; that Mr. Dickerson and his associates did not pay this debt, but the people of Florida through the internal-improvement fund did pay it by the sale of 4,000,000 acres of the swamp and overflowed and the internal-improvement land grant for $1,000,000 in 1881; that these facts are proved by the testimony of all the witnesses in the record who testify on the subject. The result of this state of facts was that the railroad and its franchise and whatever rights, if any, existed to the land grant of 1856 from Waldo to Tampa were claimed to be the property of Mr. E. N. Dickerson and associates, the purchaser at the alleged trustees' sale in 1866, the non-paying stockholder, the assignee of the contract of Finegan & Co., whose contract was performed by the railroad company and whose obligations the people of the State paid, while the internal-improvement fund of the State, the only paid-up stockholder, had nothing but the right of losing the State's money and her school fund and paying the debts of the railroad company and the non-paying stockholder and contractor, who thus became the corporation.

In that condition of things an application was made to the court that receivers' certificates for the repair of that system of roads should be issued. The order was given and $1,500,000, as will appear from this record, in the shape of receivers' certificates were issued; and now within a year's time, or two years' time, of these occurrences, this great property is exposed for sale and about to be sold under the decree and order of the court.

Here, then, the actors before the court are the holder of the unpaid stock of the original Florida Railroad Company, who was also the contractor, whose contract was performed by giving the obligations of the company in which the State was the cash stockholder, who was also the purchaser at a non-judicial sale of the cash stockholder's property, who was also the debtor of the State, the cash stockholder, for over one million of dollars paid by the State from a fund subject to be applied to public education, who was also the grantor in the deed of trust, to Louis F. Meyer, to secure bonds, a large part of which must have been his own property, and Louis F. Meyer, his trustee, and the second-mortgage bondholders with the deed of the original corporation to this trustee, and the judgment plaintiff in a judgment rendered by consent against the corporation created by this holder of the original unpaid stock who was this debtor in the original contract of construction, and the debtor to the children of the State—these three actors—all in the interest of the original debtor and the second-mortgage bondholder asserting prior legal title and prior and superior equity against their original debtor and mortgagor.

It will be readily seen how easy it is to make the courts of the United States the instrument of fraud of the plainest and most vicious character in the present state of legislation on the subject if such a case as this is possible; and how simple the process is when, instead of the marshal of the court, some confidential person is appointed receiver and another confidential friend made the master and commissioner to sell the property. I invite attention to this record and to these facts in my place as a Senator here, in order that the courts of the United States may be purged of whatever is wrong in them, and that such limitations may be imposed upon the exercise of their judicial power as the interests of the people and common honesty and justice require.

If the severer powers of this body shall be called in question by these facts, it will have to be done by another tribunal, who are the immediate representatives of the people, and it is not for me to speak now as to what their action should be.

But that is not all of this most extraordinary proceeding in which, with proofs standing upon the record showing that the parties moving these proceedings were the purchasers as against their own mortgagees of a property for the construction of which they were the contractors, and the defaulting contractors, and the stockholders who held the stock, which was unpaid, as against the cash stockholders. With these allegations and this proof this record shows the court to have decided that these bondholders, with their second-mortgage bonds from their own defaulting contractor, a majority stockholder of the unpaid stock who had become the purchaser of that great system, had a stale claim as against their own debtor and grantor, because the suit had not been brought before the mortgage bonds were due, although their suit had been filed immediately after the maturity of their bonds.

But let us pass on. A court of the United States has appointed a receiver and has also appointed a commissioner, not the marshal appointed by law, and is now selling a vast amount of corporate property, in the face of the fact shown by the record that the appointment is moved by the subsequent creditor of a contractor who is the debtor of the corporation upon the property of which the bondholder held his mortgage in a sum more than enough to have discharged the whole debt, and who was the holder of the unpaid stock which, if it had been paid, would have made the property solvent. I will pass on, having shown that there have been found judges of the courts of the United States whose alleged opinion of the law enabled them to arrive at such a conclusion, only remarking that this is the judicial discretion which the Senator from Vermont and the Committee on the Judiciary are unwilling to interfere with.

This record also contains a bill from S. I. Wailes, filed in the circuit court in which this proceeding is pending, which I hold in my hand with these papers, in which he alleges that he has made a contract with this company whose property is in the hands of a receiver, this Florida Railway and Navigation Company, for the payment to him of 10 per cent. of the land grant of the 17th of May, 1856, between Tampa and Waldo, to aid the State of Florida in the construction of certain lines of railway, and of 25 per cent. upon the indemnity lands which should be obtained; that he has rendered great services to them in obtaining from the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Schurz, a reservation under this land grant of May 17, 1856, after Mr. Secretary Chandler had decided that the grant had expired, and had restored the land to the public domain, and had opened it to actual settlement and cultivation by settlers under the land laws of the United States.

He claims that this company is entitled to this land grant under the provisions of a certain act of the Legislature of the State of Florida, known as the internal-improvement law, approved January 5, 1855; that they have sold for the payment of the tax upon the constructed portion of the road large bodies of this land to the amount of $140,000; that this sale is in disparagement of his rights and his interests, and he asks the court to appoint a receiver and to hold this public land subject to his agreement with this railroad company. The judge, with complaisance, grants him a decree for a large portion of the public domain, thus undertaking, as in the decree for a receiver before mentioned, not only to deprive creditors of their lawful rights, not only to impair the obligation of their contract, but also to take away from the settlers on the public domain of the United States their homes, and to take from the custody of the Interior Department the lands belonging to the United States, in reference to which Mr. Secretary Teller addressed this letter to the settlers upon it:

EXTRACT FROM THE LETTER OF MR. TELLER, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

In the matter of the sale of lands by the company known as the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, your attention is invited to the following extract from the letter of Hon. H. M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, dated June 9, 1884:

* * * * * * * *

All persons purchasing from the railroad company are chargeable with notice of the conditions upon which the title of the State under the grant, and of the title of the company under the laws of the State, is liable to be defeated, and in event of the failure of the railroad title, through an enforcement of the forfeiture of the grant, or from other sufficient cause, they can not be regarded as innocent purchasers.

The whole matter of the recognition, confirmation, or forfeiture of this grant is now before Congress, and the claims of the company and of settlers upon the land are subject to the action of that body.

It was an assertion on the part of the United States of their power over this domain, and the absence of any legal right in any person, whatever.

The Commisioner of Public Lands, Mr. Sparks, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, writes as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 7, 1887.

SIR: I am in receipt * * * of a letter from the Solicitor-General and acting Attorney-General and of a letter * * * The points indicated are as follows: Is there any portion of the land referred to in the accompanying bill that has not been certified to the State of Florida? * * * In reply to the first inquiry, I have the honor to state that no portion of the lands referred to in the accompanying bill (S. I. Wailes's bill) have been certified to the State for the benefit of the grant claimed by the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, between Waldo and Tampa. * * *

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

This is the response of the Interior Department to the application of these settlers for protection. In the face of that reply from the Interior Department here stands a decree, appointing a receiver of the court to take possession of the public domain of the United States, out of the custody of the United States, and dispose of it, without hearing, without opportunity for the United States to come in and assert the rights of this Government and the people, and without inquiry into the rights of the settlers and in open defiance and contempt of Congress, which had then in one branch recommended through its committee an absolute forfeiture of the alleged grant, and the other had passed a bill requiring a suit to be brought for its forfeiture.

I appealed to the President of the United States to protect the people in their homes and their rights. He referred the question to the Attorney-General. I assert that there is not and there never was one word or letter in any statute of the State of Florida that ever conveyed or purported to give or intended to give an interest in this land to this company or its predecessors or any persons whatever. I asserted then, and assert now, that this is a fraud without one single plausible ground to stand upon in all the laws of Florida. Here they are before me. I have asked the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, the law clerk, the Secretary of the Interior, to point out the law which, by the remotest expression, implication, or construction of any kind whatever, gives this company or its predecessor or any other railroad company any interest in the grant made to the State May 17, 1856. The record in this case exhibited that fact clearly and beyond all doubt and denial. The court had judicial notice of the fact that there was not a law nor a word nor a reference susceptible of any construction whatever that conveyed the least right or interest in this great land grant, said to be, by the sworn evidence of the receiver and witnesses in this case, worth $3 an acre. There never has been the slightest interest in it or allusion to it given or made in any statute of the State of Florida or of the United States, to this company or any of its predecessors.

But that was not the least of this extraordinary proceeding. I read from the record of the suit. In the sworn answer of Mr. Edwin N. Dickerson to this bill of complaint of Mr. Wailes occurs the following statement. I presume it will not interest the Senators who are absent from their seats. They seem to be indifferent and insensible to such charges, but I think the country will take some notice of it:

I declined to consent to that appointment (Mr. S. I. Wailes) for reasons which at that time seemed to me to be conclusive. One of these reasons was that I was informed by Mr. Williams, a gentleman of the highest character in Florida, who had been employed as an agent in the sale of these lands and who was in the land office with which Wailes was in connection, that Wailes had got possession of about $6,000 that had been paid by purchasers and had refused to turn it over; and had said to Mr. Williams that he had used it to bribe four United States Senators at $1,500 apiece on the Land Committee of the Senate to prevent the passage of any bill affecting the land grants. * * *

Now, Mr. President, here is a record for a receiver; here is the principal owner, as he swears in this statement, of the stock of this road who had previously made a sale of it, but retaining doubtless a considerable part of the bonds for payment, and therefore still the owner, making oath that a reputable witness who was employed in the same office with Mr. Wailes had been informed by him that the proceeds of the sale of these lands had been used to bribe United States Senators, and a judge of the United States court making a decree confirming the title thus alleged to have been obtained, without even an inquiry into the facts. Here is the original purchaser, the old stockholder of the unpaid stock of the old corporation, the old contractor, with his unfulfilled contract and his debt to the cash stockholders for the performance of the contract, still the owner of the new corporation, under the consolidated organization claiming this land grant of 1856, of which the statutes of the State of Florida had made no disposal, and which the State had not claimed.

This was a question easily answered, as to which there can be no pretense to excuse ignorance. The law clerk in the Attorney-General's Department, Mr. Maury, to whom the Solicitor-General referred the matter, said he would take time to consider it, and the parties would be heard in argument—after eight years of previous argument on the question whether the statutes of Florida contained such a statute. When I asked that he look through the statutes and see if there was any law of the State of Florida which mentions or refers in any way whatever to this company or any predecessor of it or any other company, further and indefinite time was wanted to ascertain this fact. That was a question easily answered, and an answer was demanded by hundreds of people whose homes and rights were involved in it; but it could not be had.

I asked of the Secretary of the Interior the same question, and insisted that they should tell me how, if the State had received the grant and had never given it to any one, or even claimed it for themselves, how Mr. Schurz and the judge in Florida could take it away from the people and give it to Mr. Wailes; but no answer could be obtained.

I asked that the Government of the United States should intervene and assert that no judge of the United States court could appoint a receiver of the Capitol, of the White House, or of any public property or public land because some party in a suit came before him and said, "I have a right to a lien on that and a title to the Capitol or the Treasury Department building by virtue of some precedent transaction with some third person—they had a right to it," notwithstanding the laws of the United States are notice to all the people of the United States and are supposed to be known to the judges of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, that is a plain proposition; everybody knows it. The courts knew it; it is incapable of answer; there can be no answer. I asked of the Solicitor-General, Mr. Jenks, and although he went with me through the statutes of Florida and agreed that there was no law to be found giving this corporation any right to this land, he said he could find no law which authorized the Government of the United States to protect the people of the United States in the courts of the United States against this corporation, in respect to this decree giving the homes of the settlers to Mr. Wailes.

Then comes, in this record, the sworn statement of the principal litigant in this transaction, that this agent has stated that the proceeds of the sales of this public land have been used in the Senate of the United States to defeat the people from obtaining the restoration to the public domain of the property which Mr. Chandler had decided there was not a vestige of ground or reason for withholding from them.

Mr. President, I want some legislation that will require the judge of a court to have some proof before him before he renders decrees of this character. I want some legislation which will forbid him from appointing a receiver of public property of the United States, taken by arbitrary order without a hearing of the people of the United States by some representative. I want some penal legislation which will compel the executive officers of this country to protect the people in their rights, although they may be assailed by corporations or by individuals, and at least demand that there shall be a judicial hearing under proper forms of proceeding before the executive department either surrenders or is deprived of its power in and its control of the people's property.

I have stated here in my place as a Senator of the United States, and I shall prove it by this record, that here is a case in which, in 1856, the United States gave to the State of Florida the alternate sections of land along certain lines of road to be indicated by the State, with a provision that these lands should be disposed of by the Legislature of the State, and by the Legislature only, and that the Legislature should not dispose of them, except as the road was actually built, and that if not built within ten years the grant should cease and the property revert to the people of the United States. I shall show that there was no disposal by the Legislature of Florida, nor any indication of a line of road; that this company and its predecessors never had by any kind of allusion, word, or reference any interest given to it by the Legislature of that State under this grant. I shall show that for twenty years this condition of things was acquiesced in. I shall show by the printed portions of this record that although Mr. Schurz made a reservation of this land, he did it in absolute ignorance of the facts of the case and without an inquiry into them.

Why, Mr. President, this void reservation, after Mr. Chandler's refusal to recognize the grant, after exhausting the power of the executive department on the subject, fourteen years after the grant had expired, was made upon the pretense that the internal-improvement act of Florida of 1856, in its twenty-third section, had promised that if the United States should give to the State of Florida any lands thereafter to aid in the construction of any lines of railway, the companies designated under that act who should build the road should have the benefit of it. The public records of Florida show that neither this company nor its alleged predecessor was the company that was authorized to build a railroad to Tampa under that act. They show that the State had refused to give to their predecessors any interest in this grant and had given it to another company; but above and beyond that, the record of this case in the United States court shows and the judge had judicial notice that by the laws of the State of Florida that act had been repealed by many different acts for twenty years; that the very act on which this reservation was claimed had been repealed and repealed and repealed, time and time again, in the history of that State. What a wonderful proceeding was that decree in such a case!

Why, Mr. President, as I said, I shall not detain the Senate with reading over these documents; but I have a short collation here of the laws of the State of Florida which are inconsistent with, repugnant to, and in repeal of this act under which this reservation was said to be made, and of this land which this court has decreed—this public land of the United States—to be given to this complainant, Mr. Wailes, who is testified here by the principal owner of this property to have been using these proceeds to bribe United States Senators upon the Committee on Public Lands of this body, giving to him as a fee 10 or 25 per cent. of a million acres of public land of the United States, of the people of the United States, containing the homes of the people, for obtaining a reservation under a repealed act of the State of Florida. I do not believe that this money was so used, or that Senators can be bribed; but the record so states, and the judge was put on inquiry.

Mr. President, I want to make this point plain, for I wish it to go to the country. The judge of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, by a decree which I hold in my hand and which I will print, has decreed to a complainant before that court 10 to 25 per cent. on an estimated grant of upwards of a million acres of land as a fee for obtaining a reservation of land under a law of the State of Florida which never had any possible reference to that corporation, and which if it had, had been repealed by many different enactments of that State for the period of twenty years. The complainant to whom was decreed this vast body of public lands in the State of Florida belonging to the settlers, and with their homes thereon, is charged by the principal party in interest in that litigation with using the proceeds of the sales of that grant to bribe Senators of the United States.

The judges of that court were put upon their caution to have required an investigation and strict proof of this claim. The judges of the United States have no right in law to make such a decree, and I want some legislation which will prevent them from rendering such a decree and selling property, as to which the judge has notice by the laws and the record that there was no right except the sovereign right of the people of the United States and the settlers on the public domain under the laws of the United States. I want a law that will make void the decree of a judge who will attempt to sell the public lands of the people of the United States in the interest of parties who are charged upon sworn statements with bribing Senators to enable them to obtain the people's homes; a law which will require a judge to hear testimony before he renders a decree in such a case; a law which will bring to some kind of responsibility before some one with a writ of prohibition the judge who takes jurisdiction over the public domain and gives it away to individuals, as in this case.

Now, here is a case about which there can be no sort of doubt. The Supreme Court of the United States had given notice to that court in the case of Farnsworth et al. vs. Minnesota and Pacific Railroad Company, 92 U. S. Reports, in the following terms:

Where land and franchises are thus held, any public assertion by legislative act of the ownership of the State after default of the grantee—such as an act resuming control of them and appropriating them to particular uses or granting them to others to carry out the original object—will be equally effectual and operative with judicial proceedings spoken of earlier in the decision.

In Farnsworth et al. vs. Minnesota and Pacific Railroad Company (2 Otto, S. C. Reports) the court says:

The forfeiture is maintainable on strictly equitable grounds. It was the express contract of the parties based upon a good, valuable, and adequate consideration. Respecting the State, the company was a mere donee. It received a most liberal grant of franchises and lands and a loan of the credit of the State upon the sole condition that it should proceed with the construction and completion of the road with the dispatch agreed by the Territorial and State governments. This it undertook to do. Such completion within the time prescribed was not a collateral or incidental, but the exclusive, purpose of the amendment. Any default in this respect admitted neither compensation nor restoration of the status in quo.

Here was a case in which in the first place the State had never from the inception of the grant to this day made any legislative disposition of it, a case in which the internal-improvement act of the State of Florida, which was an act conveying the great body of swamp and overflowed lands in that State, amounting to 20,000,000 acres, had been repealed by the disposal of every acre of the trust fund under which this reservation is claimed to have been made by twenty different acts to other and different purposes. Let us see what they were. The act of January, 1855, of Florida, under which this railroad corporation claimed this reservation, and under which Mr. Schurz acted fifteen years after the act of 1856 of the United States had expired, provided:

SEC. 21. Be it further enacted, That should the Government of the United States grant land to the State of Florida for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the lines of railroad indicated, and their extensions, by general or special act, said line of railway shall be entitled to all the benefits and advantages arising from said grant that the State of Florida would be entitled to by the construction of said lines of railway and their extensions; and the governor of the State is hereby authorized and required, should such an act be passed by the Government of the United States, to direct said railroad companies to select said land, and, after such selection, to give the Secretary of the Interior notice of such selection, and furnish him with a list of lands so selected, the number of each section, fractional section, or subdivision, and take such other action as may be necessary to fully secure the grant of land to said railroad companies, subject to all the conditions and restrictions of the act of Congress making such grant.

It is shown that before any compliance with the terms of this act by any railroad company as to the line from Waldo to Tampa, the Legislature conveyed all the land described in this act to other railroad companies, divested of all the conditions of this trust, and for twenty years this legislation has been in force and acquiesced in. I refer to an act of the Legislature, approved June 24, 1869, entitled "An act to perfect the public works of this State." The Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad Company was authorized by this act to build a railroad from Jacksonville to Pensacola.

Section 4 of this act gives this new railroad company the exclusive right to build the road to Pensacola and consolidates with it the lines authorized by and built under the internal-improvement act. It gives them State bonds instead of land, to the amount of $14,000 a mile, and requires the whole road to be completed in three years from that time, and repeals all acts inconsistent with it. This was the act of the Legislature of Florida passed for the construction of this same line of railroad, approved June 24, 1869, while the act under which this reservation was pretended to have been made was passed January 5, 1856; but in 1869 the Legislature of Florida chartered this new company for the construction of the same lines of railroad, took away the lands, and gave money and bonds and limited them to three years.

Section 25 provides that any company which may acquire the right to build a railroad from Waldo to Tampa, shall have the right to build such line. The act of 1856 provides that one company, namely, the Florida Peninsula Railroad Company, shall have the right under that act, while the act of 1869 gives it to anybody that will build the road, but gives no lands; and the twenty-first section of this act provides for giving them bonds, and authorizes the issue of bonds indorsed by the State, instead of land, to construct the road, and this corporation died with the war, never having built the road or any part of it.

Section 4 gives them the exclusive right for twenty years, and consolidates the lines authorized and built under the internal-improvement act with them, and gives them State bonds, instead of lands, to the amount of $14,000 to the mile, and requires the whole road to be completed in three years from that time. Section 25 provides that any company which may acquire the right may build the road from Amelia Island to Tampa or Waldo to Tampa and receive bonds, guarantied by the State of Florida, for $14,000 per mile. The thirty-first section of the act provides for railroads from Tampa Bay and Charlotte Harbor, on the Gulf, by Ocala to Gainesville, and from Marianna to St. Andrew's Bay and Apalachicola Bay and Choctawhatchee Bay, and from Palatka and Mellonville to the nearest railroad to Gainesville, and gives all the rights and franchises of the act to each and all of these railroads, namely, State bonds for $14,000 per mile.

It will be seen that this act and the amended act of 1870, instead of lands and guarantied interest bonds, gave these roads $16,000 per mile of State bonds in solido, not internal-improvement interest guarantied bonds, and gives to other and new companies not authorized or built under the internal-improvement act the exclusive right to build these lines of road. This act provides that the whole line within this State shall be completed within five years from the passage of this act; "otherwise all chartered rights created in this act shall be forfeited to the State." The line was not completed in five years and never was completed. By the act of the Legislature approved July 18, 1870, entitled "An act to incorporate the Jacksonville and St. Augustine Railroad Company" and to perfect one of the public roads of the State—in section 10 of the act, there is hereby granted to said railroad company all the lands belonging to the State of Florida known as the swamp and overflowed lands within 6 miles on each side to be selected by said company, and 100,000 acres in addition. Deeds to be made for any 5 miles of completed road; also $500,000 of bonds by the State.

By section 12 of the act approved February 19, 1870, entitled "An act to incorporate the Great Southern Railway Company, to build road from King's Ferry to Jacksonville," via Palatka to the most southern available harbor on the coast or keys of Florida, with branch roads to the remote parts of this State, it was granted as many acres of the swamp and overflowed lands granted by the act of 1850 as the United States should thereafter grant to the said railroad company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Florida be allowed to conclude his remarks on the pending resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Florida be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BLAIR. How long?

Mr. CALL. Not very long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be informally laid aside, unless objection be made.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to inquire how far this agreement extends.

Mr. CALL. Only a few minutes.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But all the time this keeps out that which somebody does not agree to. I am entirely willing that the Senator from Florida shall continue, but I am no party to any agreement between the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New Hampshire, to whom I am ready to say that if he will let his bill pass it will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor, the unfinished business being informally laid aside to enable him to proceed with his remarks on the resolution presented by him.

Mr. CALL. By act of February 12, 1870, entitled "An act to incorporate the Suwanee and Inland Railroad Company," 6 miles on both sides of the road of the State lands under the act of 1850 were granted. Section 1 of act of Legislature approved July 7, 1870, entitled "An act setting forth certain restrictions on the Florida Railroad Company," provides "that the Florida Railroad Company is required to commence operations on the construction of the road running south and to the Gulf within twelve months next succeeding, and build to Ocala in two years, and that in case of failure all exclusive right of way shall cease."

The line was not completed nor was any part of it completed in five years.

By act approved February 19, 1874, entitled "An act to provide a general law for the incorporation of railroads and canals," any persons not less than three are authorized to build a railroad anywhere in the State, and to take 200 feet wide over all State or swamp and overflowed lands. (See section 24.) By section 26 the trustees are authorized to grant to any railroad or canal any lands belonging to the State. I believe the Florida Navigation and Railway Company exists as a chartered road only under this act, which repeals the internal-improvement act and its twenty-first section, under which they claim the grant of May 17, 1856.

By act approved February 19, 1874, entitled "An act to incorporate a company to construct a railroad from Gainesville to some point on the waters of the Gulf of Mexico, or some navigable tributary thereof, with power to construct a railroad to Key West," power was given to build a railroad from Gainesville to the Gulf and to Key West. (See section 2.) Section 2 gives half of all land reclaimed through which the road passes.

Act approved March 12, 1879, entitled "An act to amend section 26 of an act to provide a general law for the incorporation of railroads and canals, approved February 19, 1874, and to grant aid to railroads and canals," approved February 19, 1874. Upon completion of each section of 6 miles, it shall be the duty of the board of trustees to convey the alternate sections of the swamp and overflowed lands for 6 miles on either side of the road. Act approved March 1, 1879, entitled "An act to grant certain lands to the Gainesville, Ocala and Charlotte Harbor Railroad Company, section 1, grants the alternate sections granted under act of Congress of 1850 on each side and in 6 miles of a line of railroad from Lake City, Gainesville, Ocala, Leesburgh, Brooksville to Tampa Bay, with branch to Bartow and Charlotte Harbor, and to Palatka in Putnam County.

Act approved March 4, 1879, entitled "An act to grant certain lands to the Tampa, Peace Creek and St. John's River Railroad Company," grants the alternate sections of swamp and overflowed land for 6 miles on either side, and authorizes road through Marion and Putnam Counties.

Act approved February 20, 1879, entitled "An act to incorporate St. John's and Lake Eustis Railroad Company," grants by the second section, alternate sections of swamp and overflowed land from St. John's River to Lake Eustis. Act approved March 12, 1879, entitled "An act to grant certain lands to the Silver Spring, Ocala and Gulf Railroad Company," grants alternate sections of swamp and overflowed land on either side, and in 6 miles of the road from Silver Springs through Marion, Hernando, and Levy Counties to the Gulf. Act approved March 4, 1879, entitled "An act to incorporate Jacksonville, St. Augustine and Indian River Railroad Company," grants alternate sections from Jacksonville to Indian River.

Act approved March 4, 1879, grants Chattahoochee and Pensacola Railroad Company alternate sections from Chattahoochee to Pensacola. Act approved March 4, 1881, grants alternate sections to East Florida Railroad from Jacksonville to Calico Hill, Duval and Clay Counties. Act approved February 2, 1881, grants alternate sections to railroads from Lake Eustis to Leesburgh, Sumter County, Panasoffkee, Fort Dade, Hernando County, to Tampa Bay, with branch road to Fort Mason and Apopka to Orlando, Orange County. Act approved July 28, 1881, grants alternate sections from Green Cove Springs to Melrose for railroad.

Act approved March 4, 1881, grants alternate sections to Palatka and Indian River Railroad.

Act of 1881 grants alternate sections to the Orange Ridge, De Land and Atlantic Railroad Company. Act approved July 25, 1881, grants same to St. John's River Railroad Company from Jacksonville to Tampa, Peace Creek, through Marion, Sumter, Hernando and Putnam, Clay, Duval, and Marion Counties.

Act approved July 20, 1881, grants alternate sections to Live Oak and Rowland Bluff Railroad Company. Act approved March 4, 1881, grants to Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad Company alternate sections for 20 miles on either side of road. Section 17 grants 20,000 acres to the mile from Chattahoochee to Pensacola. Act approved March 8, 1884, grants to Tropical Peninsular Railroad Company, not the Florida Railroad Company, alternate sections from Ocala to Tampa and Orlando, and 10,000 acres to the mile.

It is under this act, not the Florida Railroad Company's charter, that the governor certifies the road to Tampa claimed by the Florida Navigation and Railway Company, who claim the grant, is now being built. This grant is limited to seven years from its passage. Act of 1881 grants to Florida Midland and Georgia Railroad Company, from Deadman's Bay to Valdosta, Ga., all the alternate sections. Act of February 17, 1881, grants alternate sections to Carrabelle and Thomasville Railroad Company.

Act to incorporate Blue Springs, Orange City and Atlantic Railroad Company. Act approved March 6, 1883, requires Tropical Railroad to be completed in four years from March, 1881. Act of March, 1883, grants South Florida Railroad Company alternate sections from Sanford to Tampa via Bartow.

Act of July 27, 1883, grants to the International Railroad Company 15,000 acres to the mile; authorizes railroads from Georgia line all through South Florida.

These acts passed since the sale of all the roads by the trustees in 1866 and 1869 as completed roads, and since the passage of the act of 1869 granting the State's bonds to new railroad companies for the same lines, and repealing all acts repugnant to and inconsistent with them, by a continuous course of legislation have disposed of all of the lands conveyed in trust by the internal-improvement act of 1855 to the railroad companies for the construction of other lines of road all over the State and in every direction.

It goes on through the State with a new and different system altogether, and it gives to the roads, under the act of 1869–'71, mentioned in it, $16,000 per mile of State bonds in solido, while the act of 1855 gave the two lines from Jacksonville to Pensacola and Jacksonville to Tampa internal-improvement interest-guarantied bonds to the extent of $10,000 per mile. It also gives to other new companies not authorized to build under the internal-improvement act, the exclusive right to build this line of road, and provides that the whole line in this State shall be completed within five years from the passage of the act of 1869, and yet to-day there is no road to Tampa.

I have all these laws here. There are perhaps twenty acts of the State of Florida repealing the act of 1855—the record is full of them—disposing of all the lands which by that act were gathered into a single trust for the benefit of particular designated lines of road. And yet, Mr. President, with this condition of the law of the State of Florida, the poor people of the State are turned out of their homes and their land given away by such devices as I have described, and for nine years I have been appealing to the Senate of the United States and to the Presidents and the Secretaries with the assertion that it is but the work of an hour to look through these statutes and find the law, if there is such a law, that by any reference or allusion gives to this company or their predecessors, or any other railroad company, any right, title, or interest in the lands of the grant of May 17, 1856, and if it can not be found to say so, and set aside this unlawful reservation.

Outside of this resolution it is perhaps proper to mention another act of the State as to a part of this alleged line of roads claiming under the grant of May 17, 1856. I want my colleague to read a telegram which he has, because I think he ought to do so as an act of courtesy to the person sending it. There is a road called the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad, chartered in 1881. This grant expired in 1866, under the act of Congress of May 17, 1856. A reservation was made by the Interior Department in 1856, without any designation of line or beneficiary by the State, without any legislative action, in 1856, on the personal request of Senator Yulee. Here is the message of the governor; here is the vote of the Legislature declaring in 1858 that no company had been designated, and no legislative disposition made, and no certificate issued by the Interior Department under the law. The governor of the State denied that there had ever been any legislative disposal of the grant, or that any railroad company was entitled by virtue of a legislative disposal of that grant to any interest in it; but there was a company projected, and it was assumed at the Interior Department here that this company would by subsequent legislation acquire a right to this grant.

That subsequent legislative action, however, has never been had to this day; but under that assumption, as the Interior Department itself declared, not positively, not conclusively, but upon that assumption that there would be a legislative disposition, a reservation was made in West Florida in 1856 of the alternate sections on either side of the line which it was supposed would be authorized and would be built; a reservation of 6 miles on either side of that proposed road, which was never authorized, never built; and the company which was projected to build it became defunct and disappeared without the construction of any road. And yet that reservation remains of those 6 miles, of those particular sections upon that unbuilt line of road, while a newly-chartered company, organized in 1881, upon a different line, stands here claiming the sections upon the old unbuilt, unauthorized line of road.

The State of Florida in chartering this new company, which has built a very good road, said that whatever rights they had in this grant made by Congress in 1856, should go to this new company in West Florida; that this new railroad company should have whatever rights, if any, they had remaining in the State. A school-boy ten years old could tell if there were any rights. If the right of the State had ever attached to any land and it remained unforfeited and was in full force and effect, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of Congress of 1855, then it was 6 miles that could then be selected and then reserved along the line of the road which should be actually built.

But instead of doing that they have taken the old reservation upon the old defunct corporation's line, and have been turning out these poor people from their homes there, and for years I have been exposing this iniquity on this floor; but I have been doing it to deaf ears and unwilling minds, and now we have a bill turning us over to the tender mercies of judges who have defied Congress for the purpose of giving the homes of these people, without even the pretense of right, evidence, or law, to the corporations which lay false claim to them, and to their agent as a fee for obtaining a fraudulent reservation.

My colleague has a telegram which I want him to read, in which it is said that this corporation claims only the lands which have been certified. There never was an acre certified; the records show it. If such a certificate was made it would have been a fraud on the Department; but it has not been made. There was no reservation made under the authority of the State; the governor so declares and so notifies the Interior Department in 1858. This telegram states, and I want it read, that they have discovered, now since this agitation has been made, since this decree has been rendered to sell out these people notwithstanding this record, that there are 300,000 acres that do belong to the people, and they say they do not claim that.

I want these facts to be shown. These facts show a disgraceful state of affairs, and it is a disgraceful administration of that department which permits, without fair and honest intervention by the Government of the United States, people to be deprived of their homes under false and pretended legislation, which allows this large part of the public domain to be the creature of fraud, and of such stupid fraud as is to be found in this case; and it behooves the Committee on the Judiciary here to see that a condition of law shall not continue which will permit such decrees to be made as I have here described.

The duty of Congress on this subject is plain and can not be avoided with any regard for honor and duty. The record and the facts speak for themselves. The interests of the people and of corporations unite in demanding that the administration of the law shall be pure and right, and justice done to all persons, without sale or denial.

Mr. PASCO. As my colleague has stated, I have received a telegram from Colonel Chipley, of Pensacola, which I will send to the desk to be read, so that it may go into the RECORD in connection with my colleague's remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida desires a telegram to be read. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PENSACOLA, FLA., January 29, 1888.

Hon. S. PASCO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I learn our land grant will be debated Monday. Let me urge upon you that the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad claim no lands except those embraced within lists certified to and approved to State of Florida and granted by State of Florida to the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad Company and approved by State to company upon its road now completed and in use, the land being coterminous with completed road; and there are nearly 300,000 acres coterminous with the Pensacola and Atlantic road, in excess of the selections made by the road, and this excess should be restored to the public domain, as the company only claims the selections approved to it by the State of Florida upon its completed line.

W. D. CHIPLEY,
Vice-President Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

A bill (H. R. 1483) for the erection of a public building at Monroe, La.;

A bill (H. R. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 1697) for the erection of a public building in the city of Asheville, N. C.; and

A bill (H. R. 4359) for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, also for the erection of the necessary store-houses, for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C.

The bill (H. R. 1640) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 1481) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Pineville, La., to the national military cemetery near that town, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 1528) to reward the Esquimaux natives of the Asiatic coast of the Arctic Ocean for acts of humanity to shipwrecked seamen was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 1860) to amend section 683 of the Revised Statutes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 31st ultimo approved and signed the act (S. 290) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Burlington, Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask now that the Senate take up for consideration, the morning hour having expired, the resolution which I offered yesterday to change Rule XXXVII. It may interfere in some measure with the educational bill, but if that educational bill were allowed to pass and we could get away from that barricade which is on the desk of the Senator having it in charge, it seems to me there would be time to consider some matters of treaty between this country and Great Britain.

I now ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not allow a friend of the bill to call up this resolution for consideration in open session, for that is what it amounts to—to change Rule XXXVII and let the Senate pass upon it, for we shall hear nothing more, if we take up the educational bill, than that which shall come from the school-masters. I am as much opposed to letting the school-masters of the country govern as I am to letting British commissioners instruct us about treaties.

I ask the Senate, now that I have deferred to other Senators, that we shall take up the resolution to change Rule XXXVII, for, Mr. President, that is a matter which is pressing upon us. Every one in the Senate knows that when the hour of 5 shall strike some Senator will say "I move to go into executive session," and that itself resolves all that I have in my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; I do not. I think it is within the rule that I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain the motion at this stage of business.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. With all due respect to you, Mr. President, I do so. I think my motion is in order. I appeal from the decision of the Chair with all due respect that any Senator can show to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business being before the Senate, the Senator from Virginia having moved to proceed to the consideration of a resolution previously offered by him, the Chair calls upon the Secretary to read the twenty-second rule of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether I understood that the educational bill was up and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] was entitled to the floor, that then the Senator from Virginia was recognized to make a request of the Senator in charge of the bill. I do not understand that he could make any motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate at 2 o'clock, under the rules, resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, upon which the pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. The Chair had not recognized the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] as entitled to the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Alabama was recognized last evening, and took the floor prior to the adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not advised of that, having been absent at the time of the adjournment of the Senate yesterday. The Senator from Virginia arose and made the motion, as the Chair understands, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of a resolution offered by him on a former day. The Chair holds that the unfinished business being before the Senate, and the Senator from Alabama being entitled to the floor, the motion of the Senator from Virginia can not be entertained by the Chair, and is not in order. From that decision of the Chair the Senator from Virginia appeals to the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be decided without debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Allow me to state, sir——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Allow me to put myself right on the facts. There was no purpose on my part to prevent the Senator from Alabama from speaking to-day. That was not my appeal. I put one proposition and the Chair puts another. I have appealed from the decision of the Chair on a ruling that it made before it mentioned the name of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A misunderstanding of the Chair would not affect the parliamentary right of the Senator from Alabama. He was recognized and took the floor at the adjournment last evening, and he was entitled to the floor when the consideration of the bill was resumed this morning, and he is now entitled to proceed upon the pending bill. The Senator from Virginia appeals, so the Chair understands, from his decision.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; and it is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair as to whether it is debatable, and ask the Chair to furnish me a rule prohibiting debate when I have got a proposition pending here that interests the people of the United States more than that which we have heard debated for four or five years. Give me the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That it is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not debatable. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it. The decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the Senate, and the Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor on the pending bill.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have listened patiently in the Senate and read in the RECORD the elaborate and able speeches of the Senators who oppose the bill reported by the committee of which I am a member "to aid in the support of common schools." With some difference in the language used and the rhetoric employed by the different Senators, the several speeches made against the bill in the present debate, and in the exhaustive debates on the bill when it passed the Senate by a vote of 36 in the affirmative and 11 in the negative, are the same in substance. In fact and in effect it amounts to a periodical reproduction and reprint of the same speeches on the same bill supported by the same authorities.

And I find on examination that in the protracted debate in the House in February, 1817, on the bill to aid in works of "internal improvement" in the States, and also the equally exhaustive debate in both Houses of Congress in May, 1854, on the "bill making a grant of land to the several States of the Union for the benefit of the indigent insane persons," and also the celebrated discussion in the Senate and House in February, 1859, of the bill to aid the States in the establishment and endowment of agricultural and mechanical colleges, the same arguments, presented in the most irresistible logic and rhetoric, agitated the public mind and engaged public opinion for months and years that we now hear in the apostolic utterances and prophetic warnings of the enemies of the "Blair bill" against its constitutionality and the dire consequences of its becoming a law of the land. Mr. President, the first speech I made in this Senate after taking my seat over seven years since, was in support of a bill to aid the States in securing the benefits of a common-school education to the children, white or black, in their population. What did that bill propose should be done by this Federal Government? It ought to make the enemies of the "Blair bill" shudder when they hear that in December, 1880, on the motion of an able Democratic Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Bailey, the Senate agreed, without counting negative votes—

> That the net proceeds of the sales of public lands and the receipts from patents shall be set apart as an educational fund, and entered upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the fund, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, the interest on such educational fund only to be paid to the States as herein provided.

What else appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was done by the Senate in December, 1880? The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] proposed to amend the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Bailey, by providing that the entire proceeds of the sale of the public lands and the receipts from patents should be paid to the States to support their common schools, which would have been largely more than this Blair bill appropriates. This amendment passed in Committee of the Whole Senate by the following affirmative vote:

|---|---|---|---|
| Beck, | Farley, | Kirkwood, | Slater, |
| Booth, | Groome, | McDonald, | Teller, |
| Brown, | Hereford, | Morgan, | Vance, |
| Call, | Ingalls, | Plumb, | Vest, |
| Cockrell, | Johnston, | Pugh, | Voorhees, |
| Coke, | Jonas, | Ransom, | Williams, |
| Davis of West Va., | Jones of Florida, | Saulsbury, | Withers. |
| Eaton, | Kernan, | Saunders, | |

I ask the Senate what was the object to which this appropriation of all the money arising from the sale of the public lands and all the money received into the Treasury from patents was attempted to be made by those Senators who voted for the Teller amendment? Unquestionably the public object to be promoted, aided by the appropriation, was common-school education. How, then, can it be claimed that common-school education is totally excluded by the Constitution from Congressional consideration as an object of Federal concern? It will not do to seek an escape from an answer to this question by telling what was then sought to be thus appropriated. It makes no difference what was the subject-matter to be appropriated.

The question is, what public object then attracted the attention of Congress? What was the appropriation expressly made to aid, encourage, and promote? Certainly it was common-school education. The object of that appropriation of money in the Treasury, collected from the sale of public lands and the receipts from patents, and in the custody of Treasury officials as public revenue, as much as the money collected from tariff duties on imports, being common-school education, tell me in what particular the object of that appropriation differs from the object of the appropriation in the bill before the Senate? Manifestly, common-school education is a public object to which the power of Congress to make appropriations of the public money or property arising from public-land sales and patent fees may be constitutionally directed.

The Teller amendment was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, and there failed on a tie vote. So that the bill made the appropriation as provided in the Bailey or committee amendment. On the object of the appropriation, namely, the support of common-school education in the States, what was then said by Senators?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I desire to submit a very few remarks upon the bill, and not in any spirit of hostile criticism, because with the general intent and spirit of the bill I am fully in accord. There are certain features of the bill, however, to which I can not give my consent. For the general principle of free education I have always contended. In a public address to the people of my State, before my election to the Senate, I did in the most emphatic and in the broadest terms declare that universal suffrage must be supplemented by universal education. I believe to-day that universal education is the only instrumentality that can exorcise the evils that attend upon free suffrage.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor I concurred with the committee in reporting this bill. * * * * Whether we will or not, the colored people are to-day citizens. If it be true, and it is true, that the perpetuity of free government depends upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, then common sense will tell any man that the more enlightened, the more virtuous you make those who enter into the body-politic the more certain you are of the perpetuity of free institutions. These colored people have become, by the Constitution and laws of our country, a part and parcel of the body-politic. They are mainly in the portion of the country where I live. It is the interest of the Southern people that this colored population should be educated. They are among us; they are entitled to vote; they are entitled to hold office; they are entitled to sit upon juries; they are entitled to be appointed executors, administrators, trustees, and guardians, and hence it is of the utmost importance that these people should become educated. In the State in which I live and in all the Southern States by the terms of the State constitutions they are entitled to the same common-school education that the white child is entitled to. The burden of educating those children falls upon the whites. We were impoverished by the war, and the little property left was owned by the white people, who had their own children to educate.

The colored people were made citizens by the act of this Federal Government, and it is a matter of common justice; it is a matter of common honesty and fair dealing, in my judgment, for the Federal Government to aid in their education, to aid the States which are now educating them.

So far as the question of constitutionality is concerned, I had not supposed, at this late day, that that question could be raised. The statutes of our country bristle all over with legislative precedents, running even back into the last century, running back to the annexation of Louisiana. The power of Congress is firmly established by precedents not to be now questioned. If it be true that out of the common treasure the vacant public domain belonging to the United States could be given to a particular State or Territory because it happened to lie within their limits, I ask if that principle does not authorize Congress to take the proceeds of this vacant public land and distribute them among all the States of the Union for which we are the trustees. Sir, the constitutional argument falls—falls upon principle as well as upon precedent.

I have read the entire debate upon what is known as the Morrill bill, and there is not a single word in it of condemnation of the appropriation or the object to which it was required to be applied. Not a word was said about the Southern States being independent of Federal aid or not needing or not desiring Federal aid to their common schools. Nothing was heard about the ruinous effects of such aid in destroying the self-reliance of the people in procuring the means of educating their children without help from the Federal Government. There were no rawheads and bloody-bones scattered along the track of the enduring Federal aid established by that bill as a perpetual system of encouragement and support to common schools in the States.

The horse harnessed in the Morrill bill was gentle, true, harmless, and faithful; but when the same horse is harnessed to pull through the Blair bill he instantly becomes a most dangerous animal with the most vicious qualities, really a Trojan horse filled with arms and devils and Yankee "school-marms" to be turned loose to destroy the Southern States.

While there was no opposition to the fund appropriated as a permanent fund, or to its being applied to common-school education in the States, there were some objections urged by Senators to the machinery of the Morrill bill—that is the sections relating to the terms and conditions of the appropriation and the manner of its application and expenditure by the States, and the reports required to be made to the Federal Government by the States.

My friend, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], a typical strict constructionist, who is never troubled with any doubts about the accuracy of his opinions and conclusions, was the first to assail the terms and conditions of the appropriation to be accepted and performed by the States:

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, there is one feature of the bill to which I object. I do not believe that the education of the people should be taken away from the States. I do not believe under the Constitution that the General Government should directly or indirectly take charge of the system of educating the people. I am no hypocritical stickler for State rights; on the other hand, I believe that there has been too much fine-spun hair-splitting theory in that regard; but there is a line of demarkation between the powers of the National Government and of the State governments. I do not charge that the framers of this bill intended to put this system of education under the control of the National Government, yet there are features of the bill that look in that direction and which I can not support. I call the attention of the Senate to the sixth section of the bill:

"On or before the 1st day of September, in each year, the Commissioner of Education, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, as to each State, Territory, and District, whether it is entitled to receive its share of the apportionment under this act, and the amount of such share, which shall thereupon be entitled to receive the same. If the Commissioner shall withhold a certificate from either, its share of such apportionment shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the close of the next session of Congress, in order that it may, if it see fit, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Commissioner. If Congress shall not, at its next session, direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund."

In section 7 provision is made that whenever a State or Territory—

"Shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the law of such State or Territory accepting the provisions of this act, and undertaking that the funds provided by the same, whenever paid over to it as above provided, shall be faithfully applied to the free education of all its children between the ages of six and sixteen years, and to the endowment and support of such colleges as have been, or may be hereafter, established in accordance with the aforesaid act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and as provided for in this act. The distributive share of the District of Columbia shall, from time to time, be paid over to the commission of said District created by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled," etc.

The different States are required, in the first place, by an act of their Legislatures, to declare that they accept the provisions of this act, and that they will faithfully apply the proceeds of the sales of these lands to public education. But that is not enough for the gentleman who framed this bill. The Commissioner of Education may, if he sees proper, withhold from any State its distributive share of this fund. I am opposed to giving any such power to a subordinate officer of this Government.

Mr. MORRILL. Suppose the State were to misapply the fund?

Mr. VEST. Under my idea of the theory of this Government, the Congress of the United States would be the proper tribunal to interfere with a sovereign State in any such contingency.

Mr. BAILEY. Allow me to call attention to the fact that the State is allowed an appeal to Congress from the decision of the Commissioner.

Mr. VEST. To say that a State is not to be trusted with its own children, and that a subordinate officer of the United States shall have the right, if he sees proper, to withhold for a day or for an hour the distributive share of that State to a great bounty, is a proposition to which I shall never accede. But that is not all of it, sir; the most objectionable feature of this bill is section 9, which provides—

"That to entitle any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to the benefits of this act, it shall maintain for at least three months in each year until January 1, 1885, and thereafter four months in each year, a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of six and sixteen, and shall, through the proper officer thereof, for the year ending the 30th day of June last preceding such apportionment, make full report to the Commissioner of Education of the number of public free schools, the number of teachers employed, the number of school-houses owned and the number of school-houses hired, the total number of children taught during the year, the actual daily attendance, and the actual number of months of the year schools have been maintained in each of the several school districts or divisions of said State, Territory, or District, and the amounts appropriated by the Legislature, or otherwise received for the purpose of maintaining a system of free public schools. And if any State or Territory shall misapply, or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report, as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof, until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory, and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made."

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the friends of this bill why it is that the National Government, through its Commissioner of Education, is to inquire into the appropriations made by a sovereign State. What has the General Government to do with the acts of the Legislatures of the respective States in regard to appropriations for a system of education? * * * Suppose the Commissioner should take it into his judgment that a State had violated this act by having separate schools for the two races in this country. Suppose that, as in my State separate schools are established for the white and the black races. The Commissioner finds that that method of separate schools has been adopted by a State and says to that State, "In my judgment you are not applying this fund according to the spirit and intent of the act of Congress, and I shall therefore not pay you your distributive share." Where is the limit to his discretion? Let Congress exercise the power of taking away this bounty if it sees proper to do so, but not a subordinate officer.

How were the objections of the Senator from Missouri to the machinery, the terms, and conditions of the Morrill bill answered, and by what Senators?

Senator Hill, of Georgia, answered the Senator from Missouri as follows:

In relation to the point made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] I differ in toto exlo from that honorable Senator on all the points he has raised. It seems to me that so far from this bill being subject to the criticism which he has visited upon it, exactly the contrary is true. The General Government does not interfere in the slightest degree with the right of the States to control education in their respective limits. It not only does not interfere with that right of the State, but it does seem to me it recognizes that right and appropriates this general fund simply as an aid to the States in this work which is to be carried on by the States. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with the regulations that shall be established by the States upon this subject.

But upon the point of which he speaks, that the Government reserves the right to inquire whether this fund has or has not been misapplied, I ask is not that a right that belongs to all donors, all persons who create a trust fund for any purpose? The General Government owns this money—the proceeds of the public lands and the fees of the Patent Office. It belongs to the General Government. The General Government proposes to distribute this money to the States. Has not the Government that distributes the money a right to say on what terms it will distribute it? Was it ever heard of that the Government which has the right to give the fund has no right to say on what terms it will do so?

It is not only the right of the General Government, but it is under obligation to see to it that the fund is not misapplied. Do you call that interfering with the rights of the States? Sir, if the General Government were not to see to it that the fund was applied in the manner prescribed, and to accomplish the purposes intended, in my judgment, the Government would be derelict. Why prescribe terms at all if the Government is to stand idly by and see those terms disregarded by the States? The object of making the inquiry of the States what appropriations have been made by their Legislatures for the support of common schools is not to authorize the General Government to interfere with the State in the management of its own school fund or in the management of its own schools. The General Government does not get this information for the purpose of changing a system adopted in the States, but to enable it to determine whether the respective States are complying with the terms of the gift. No State, I insist, ought to desire to receive this fund except on the terms prescribed, and no State having received this fund on the terms prescribed ought to be presumed willing under any circumstances to misapply it; but should a State willingly misapply the fund, certainly the State ought not to complain if the General Government inquires into the fact. It does not interfere with its sovereignty in the slightest degree.

Who is the next Senator that answered the objections of the Senator from Missouri? The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] spoke as follows:

I shall vote for the bill cheerfully. A States-rights man to the very core, I shall vote for it, because there is not in the bill anywhere a violation of any State right. It was guarded by gentlemen who are as strongly in favor of the reserved rights of the States as the Senator from Missouri or anybody else. I shall vote for it because it does not conflict with but does aid the States in doing a just and a wise thing. I would go back even further; I would go back to the very convention that framed the Constitution and you will find that under the clause giving exclusive legislation to Congress over the District it was contended that Congress had power to establish a university at the sert of government.

* * * * * * *

I heartily agree with what was so well said by the Senator from Georgia, Mr. Hill.

There can be no denial that the Morrill bill in all its parts and provisions was critically considered and fully understood by Senators.

Now, sir, who were the Senators who favored the passage of the Morrill bill? Here is the formidable list:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Allison, | Cameron of Pa., | Hill of Colorado, | Morgan, |
| Anthony, | Cameron of Wis., | Hill of Georgia, | Morrill, |
| Bailey, | Coke, | Hoar, | Platt, |
| Baldwin, | Davis of Illinois, | Johnston, | Pugh, |
| Beck, | Davis of West Va., | Jones of Florida, | Ransom, |
| Blaine, | Dawes, | Kellogg, | Rollins, |
| Blair, | Edmunds, | Lamar, | Teller, |
| Brown, | Ferry, | Logan, | Vance, |
| Bruce, | Garland, | McMillan, | Walker, |
| Burnside, | Hampton, | McPherson, | Windom. |
| Call, | Hereford, | Maxey, | |

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator read the names of those who voted against that bill?

Mr. PUGH. I have them not here, but I remember very well that you were one of them.

Mr. VEST. I voted against it.

Mr. PUGH. I am aware of it.

Mr. VEST. I am told that whilst I was out of the Senate Chamber the Senator has been assailing my record. I have not looked at that record. It is sufficient for me to attend to my duties here without going back to old records; but I never saw the time in this Chamber that I have not opposed this sort of legislation. I opposed the Morrill bill. When I voted for the Teller amendment, if my name is so recorded, I voted for it to defeat the bill, as a parliamentary measure. I have never seen the time when any such measure came here that I did not speak against it publicly and privately, and I was one, I think, of six who voted against that Morrill bill, one of eleven who voted against the Blair bill, and, if I live, will be one of the opposition to it when the vote is taken on the pending bill.

Mr. PUGH. I have not assailed the record of the Senator. I only brought to the attention of the Senate what he had stated so clearly and forcibly as his objection to the Morrill bill, so as to show, as I will do hereafter, that gentlemen who are now assailing the Blair bill fully understood all the grounds upon which they are now assailing it when their attention was called to these identical provisions in the Morrill bill; and after a full understanding of each one of these provisions debated, discussed, emphasized, and repeatedly emphasized by the Senator from Missouri, the names I have read here were recorded in favor of that bill with all its provisions.

Mr. President, I will now introduce the Blair bill. That monster—that huge anaconda in whose deadly coil every bone in the body-politic is to be crushed. That wicked conception originated with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] and was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, of which he was and is chairman, and I was then, and am now, a member. The committee referred the bill to Senator BLAIR and myself as a subcommittee. The great desire and earnest effort of the subcommittee were to frame a bill as free as possible from objections, and especially to so arrange the terms and conditions of the bill that made up its machinery as that they would be acceptable and satisfactory to the Senate.

How was this purpose to be accomplished? The subcommittee took the terms and conditions, the machinery of the Morrill bill, that had been lately fully discussed and sanctioned by over forty-three Senators as a model for the appropriation in the Blair bill. The subcommittee framed the bill and reported it to the full committee, who adopted it unanimously. The bill was reported to the Senate by the chairman [Mr. BLAIR], and I undertake to say that in every particular in which the bill thus reported differs from the Morrill bill it is an improvement upon the Morrill bill. I have set forth the provisions of the Morrill bill, and I now offer the Blair bill as it came from the committee:

That for ten years after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

SEC. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not read and write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; and until otherwise provided such computation shall be made according to the official returns of the census of 1880.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior, at the close of each fiscal year, shall ascertain the total amount of the school fund to which the States and Territories and the District of Columbia are entitled under the provisions of this act, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion the said total sum so certified among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population and illiteracy specified in the second section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory and to the District of Columbia shall be paid, upon the warrant of the Commissioner of Education, countersigned by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the treasurer of the State, Territory, or District, or to such officer as shall be designated by the laws of such State, Territory, or District to receive, account for, and pay over the same to the several school districts entitled thereto under said apportionment. The term "school district" as used in this section shall include cities, towns, parishes, or such other corporations as by law are clothed with the power of maintaining common schools: Provided, That such distribution or payment, after the receipt of said fund by the State, Territory, or District, may be made to any officer designated by the laws of the State, Territory, or District for the disbursement of the school funds to the teachers employed in such schools.

SEC. 5. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws, and shall include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry, and the instruction of females in such branches of technical or industrial education as are suited to their sex, which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, color, nativity, or condition in life: Provided, That nothing herein shall deprive children of different races, living in the same community but attending separate schools, from receiving the benefits of this act the same as though the attendance therein were without distinction of race.

SEC. 6. The money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 7. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but its existing laws and school authorities shall not be affected by the operation of this act. The Commissioner of Education shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report of his doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

SEC. 9. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools, or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools, for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

SEC. 10. That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school-buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

SEC. 11. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education; and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best, in the several localities.

SEC. 12. That any State in which the number of persons 10 years of age and upward who can not read and write is not over 5 per cent. of the whole population thereof shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common-school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor on or before the 30th day of June of each year, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under section 4 of this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 8 of this act, and also of the number of public, common, and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year, and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district, and such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common-school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

SEC. 14. That on or before the 1st day of September of each year the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the President of the United States whether any State or Territory or the District of Columbia has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment under this act, and how forfeited, and whether he has withheld such allotment on account of such forfeiture; and each State and Territory and the District of Columbia from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress; and if the next Congress shall not direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund for distribution among the other States and the Territories and District of Columbia which shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories and the District of Columbia, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department.

Mr. President, after the most careful examination I have been able to make of the difference between the Morrill bill and the Blair bill now before the Senate, my judgment is that in principle, in policy, in method, and in practice they are substantially one and the same. I have no doubt Congress has as much power under the Constitution to appropriate revenue collected by taxation as Congress has to appropriate revenue collected from the sales of public lands and receipts from patents to the support of common schools in the several States, as I will show hereafter by undoubted authority.

In the Morrill bill all the proceeds from the sales of all public lands paid into the Treasury and all the receipts from patents paid into the Treasury are set apart as a permanent educational fund; in other words, dedicated by Congress to the support of common-school education in the States, and the fund arising from the entire proceeds of all the lands and all the receipts from patents are separated from where they were as part of the public revenue, as much as money collected from taxation, and devoted by Congress to the support of common schools in the States.

In the Blair bill now pending $79,000,000 are appropriated to be paid out of the Treasury out of any money unappropriated, whether in there from the sales of public lands, or as receipts from patents, or as interest paid on bonded loans to Pacific railroads, or as fines and forfeitures, or from taxes on tobacco and whisky, or duties on imports; it makes no difference from what sources the revenue is derived. The Blair bill covers all the sources of the appropriation in the Morrill bill and adds all other sources of revenue.

Now, as I understand those Senators who voted for the Morrill bill, but refuse to support the Blair bill, they would admit the constitutionality of the appropriation in the Blair bill if the bill provided that the sum appropriated was payable only from the proceeds of the public lands and the receipts from patents, as provided in the Morrill bill. Then the question is presented squarely, has Congress the same power to dispose of money in the Treasury paid in there from the whisky and tobacco tax, or from duties on importations, as Congress has to dispose of public lands or the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the support of common schools in the States? This presents the gravamen of the difference between the friends and enemies of the Blair bill. I believe that Congress has as much power to make the appropriation in the one case as in the other. Those who differ with me claim that the power of Congress to appropriate public lands or their proceeds is derived from two sources: first, the deeds of cession by the States making the grants to the United States in trust with the power of disposition for "the general welfare;" and, second, the grant of power in the Constitution that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of," etc., "the territory or other property belonging to the United States," etc.

It must be admitted that the object and purpose of Virginia, New York, and Georgia in making the deeds of cession with the power therein to the States, as beneficiaries of the trust to dispose of the lands conveyed, are the same that induced the same States to grant to Congress the power of disposition specified in the Constitution. That being true, it follows that the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands or their proceeds is absolute and exclusive in both cases, whether the power of disposition is derived from the deeds of cession or from the Constitution. The power of Congress in the same grant "to make all rules and regulations necessary for the government of the Territories" is equally absolute and exclusive as the power of disposition of the public domain.

But it must be remembered that the power of Congress to govern the Territories and dispose of the public domain, although absolute and exclusive, is nevertheless restrained and limited in its exercise by the character and genius of our political organism, and by the responsibility of the representatives of the States and the people in Congress to their constituents. The truth of this proposition is conceded in all the debates upon the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands and govern the Territories.

The next inquiry is, what difference is there, and, if any, what reason is there for any difference between the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands bought with revenue raised by taxation and the power of Congress to dispose of or appropriate revenue collected into the Treasury from taxation?

This question has arisen and been fully and ably discussed on several occasions in the history of Congressional legislation, sometimes when Congress was asked to exercise the power of disposing of the public lands or their proceeds for the endowment and support of asylums, or for the support of common schools, or to build railroads, or cut canals, and sometimes when Congress was asked to appropriate money out of the Treasury collected from taxation and other sources for these and other purposes, like works of internal improvement. The occasion upon which the character and extent and limitations upon the power of Congress to make appropriations of the public revenue was presented most conspicuously was in the House of Representatives in February, 1817, on a bill introduced by John C. Calhoun making appropriations for works of internal improvement.

This debate took place during the closing days of the last administration of President Madison. The speech of Mr. Calhoun will be found in the Annals of the Fourteenth Congress, second session, 1816-'17, page 851, and fully answers the arguments against the Blair bill:

MR. CALHOUN. The power of Congress is objected to—first, that they have none to cut a road or canal through a State without its consent; and next, that the public moneys can only be appropriated to effect the particular powers enumerated in the Constitution. It is mainly urged that Congress can only apply the public moneys in execution of the enumerated powers. He was no advocate for refined arguments on the Constitution. The instrument was not intended as a thesis for the logician to exercise his ingenuity on. It ought to be construed with plain, good sense; and what can be more express than the Constitution on this very point?

The first power delegated to Congress is comprised in the words, "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." First, the power is given to lay taxes; next, the objects are enumerated to which the money accruing from the exercise of this power may be applied—to pay the debts, provide for the common defense and general welfare; and last, the rule for laying the taxes is prescribed. If the framers had intended to limit the use of the money to the powers afterwards enumerated and defined, nothing could be more easy than to have expressed it plainly. He knew it was the opinion of some that the words, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were not intended to be referred to the power of laying taxes contained in the first part of the section, but that they are to be understood as distinct and independent powers granted in general terms.

If such were in fact the meaning, surely nothing can be conceived more bungling and awkward than the manner in which the framers have communicated their intention. If it were their intention to make a summary of the powers of Congress in general terms, which were afterwards to be particularly defined and enumerated, they should have told us so plainly and distinctly; and if the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," were intended for this summary, they should have headed the list of our powers, and it should have been stated, that to effect these general objects the following specific powers were granted. He asked the members to read the section with attention, and it would, he conceived, plainly appear that such could not be the intention.

The whole section seemed to him to be about taxes. It plainly commenced and ended with it, and nothing could be more strained than to suppose the intermediate words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were to be taken as independent and distinct powers. But suppose the Constitution to be silent, why should we be confined in the application of money to the enumerated powers? There is nothing in the reason of the thing that he could perceive why it should be so restricted; and the habitual and uniform practice of the Government coincided with his opinion. Our laws are full of instances of money appropriated without any reference to the enumerated powers. Let it not be urged that the construction for which he contended gave a dangerous extent to the powers of Congress.

In this point of view, he conceived it to be more safe than the opposite. By giving a reasonable extent to the money power it exempted us from the necessity of giving a strained and forced construction to the other enumerated power. For instance, if the public money could be applied to the purchase of Louisiana, as he contended, then there was no constitutional difficulty in that purchase, but if it could not, then we were compelled either to deny that we had the power to purchase, or to strain some of the enumerated powers to prove our right.

The next authority in support of the constitutional power of Congress to make the appropriation in the Blair bill, still more potential, if any can be, than the unanswerable argument of Mr. Calhoun, is the carefully considered and exhaustive message of James Monroe communicated to Congress on the 4th of May, 1822, and found in the Annals of the Seventeenth Congress, first session, page 1810.

After quoting the power of Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," the message proceeds:

That the second part of this grant gives a right to appropriate the public money, and nothing more, is evident from the following considerations:

1. If the right of appropriation is not given by this clause it is not given at all, there being no other grant in the Constitution which gives it directly, or which has any bearing on the subject, even by implication, except the two following: First, the prohibition which is contained in the eleventh of the enumerated powers not to appropriate money for the support of armies for a longer term than two years; and, second, the declaration of the sixth member or clause of the ninth section of the first article, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

2. This part of the grant has none of the characteristics of a distinct and original power. It is manifestly incidental to the great objects of the first part of the grant, which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—a power of vast extent, not granted by the Confederation—the grant of which formed one of the principal inducements to the adoption of this Constitution. If both parts of the grant are taken together (as they must be, for the one follows immediately after the other in the same sentence), it seems to be impossible to give to the latter any other construction than that contended for. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. For what purpose? To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—an arrangement and phraseology which clearly show that the latter part of the clause was intended to enumerate the purposes to which the money thus raised might be appropriated.

3. If this is not the real object and fair construction of the second part of this grant, it follows either that it has no import or operation whatever on one of much greater extent than the first part. This presumption is evidently groundless in both instances—in the first, because no part of the Constitution can be considered useless, no sentence or clause in it without a meaning. In the second, because such a construction as made the second part of the clause an original grant, embracing the same object with the first, but with much greater power than it, would be in the highest degree absurd. The order generally observed in grants—an order founded in common sense, since it promotes a clear understanding of their import—is to grant the power intended to be conveyed in the most full and explicit manner, and then to explain or qualify it, if explanation or qualification should be necessary. This order has, it is believed, been invariably observed in all the grants contained in the Constitution. In the second, because, if the clause in question is not construed merely as an authority to appropriate the public money, it must be obvious that it conveys a power of indefinite and unlimited extent; that there would have been no use for the special powers to raise and support armies and a navy, to regulate commerce, to call forth the militia, or even to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. An unqualified power to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, as the second part of this clause would be, if considered as a distinct and separate grant, would extend to every object in which the public could be interested. A power to provide for the common defense would give to Congress the command of the whole force and of all the resources of the Union. But a right to provide for the general welfare would go much further. It would, in effect, break down all the barriers between the States and the General Government and consolidate the whole under the latter.

The powers specifically granted to Congress are what are called the enumerated powers, and are numbered in the order in which they stand, among which that contained in the first clause holds the first place in point of importance. If the power created by the latter part of the clause is considered an original grant, unconnected with and independent of the first, as in that case it must be, then the first part is entirely done away, as are all the other grants in the Constitution, being completely absorbed in the transcendent power granted in the latter part. But if the clause be construed in the sense contended for, then every part has an important meaning and effect; not a line, a word, in it is superfluous. A power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises subjects to the call of Congress every branch of the public revenue, internal and external; and the addition to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare gives the right of applying the money raised—that is, of appropriating it to the purposes specified—according to a proper construction of the terms. Hence, it follows that it is the first part of the clause only which gives a power which affects in any manner the power remaining to the States; as the power to raise money from the people, whether it be by taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, though concurrent in the States as to taxes and excises, must necessarily do.

But the use or application of the money, after it is raised, is a power altogether of a different character. It imposes no burden on the people, nor can it act on them in a sense to take power from the States, or in any sense in which power can be controverted or become a question between the two governments. The application of money raised under a lawful power is a right or grant which may be abused. It may be applied partially among the States, or to improper purposes in our foreign and domestic concerns; but still it is a power not felt in the sense of other power, since the only complaint which any State can make of such partiality and abuse is that some other State or States have obtained greater benefit from the application than by a just rule of apportionment they were entitled to. The right of appropriation is, therefore, from its nature, secondary and incidental to the right of raising money, and it was proper to place it in the same grant and same clause with that right. By finding them, then, in that order, we see a new proof of the sense in which the grant was made, corresponding with the view herein taken of it.

The last part of this grant, which provides that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, furnishes another strong proof that it was not intended that the second part should constitute a distinct grant, in the sense above stated, or convey any other right than that of appropriation. This provision operates exclusively on the power granted in the first part of the clause. It recites three branches of that power—duties, imposts, and excises—those only on which it could operate; the rule by which the fourth, that is, taxes, should be laid, being already provided for in another part of the Constitution. The object of this provision is to secure a just equality among the States in the exercise of that power by Congress. By placing it after both the grants, that is, after that to raise and that to appropriate the public money, and making it apply to the first only, it shows that it was not intended that the power granted in the second should be paramount to and destroy that granted in the first. It shows also that no such formidable power as that suggested had been granted in the second, or any power against the abuse of which it was thought necessary specially to provide. Surely, if it was deemed proper to guard a specific power of limited extent and well-known import against injustice and abuse, it would have been much more so to have guarded against the abuse of a power of such vast extent and so indefinite as would have been granted by the second part of the clause, if considered as a distinct and original grant.

With this construction all the other enumerated grants, and indeed all the grants of power contained in the Constitution, have their full operation and effect. They all stand well together, fulfilling the great purposes intended by them. Under it we behold a great scheme, consistent in all its parts, a Government instituted for national purposes, vested with adequate powers for those purposes, commencing with the most important of all, that of the revenue, and proceeding in regular order to the others with which it was deemed proper to endow it, all, too, drawn with the utmost circumspection and care. How much more consistent is this construction with the great objects of the institution and with the high character of the enlightened and patriotic citizens who framed it, as well as of those who ratified it, than one which subverts every sound principle and rule of construction and throws everything into confusion.

I have dwelt thus long on this part of the subject from an earnest desire to fix in a clear and satisfactory manner the import of the second part of this grant, well knowing, from the generality of the terms used, their tendency to lead into error. I indulge a strong hope that the view herein presented will not be without effect, but will tend to satisfy the unprejudiced and impartial that nothing more was granted by that part than a power to appropriate the public money raised under the other part. To what extent that power may be carried will be the next object of inquiry.

It is contended, on the one side, that, as the National Government is a Government of limited powers, it has no right to expend money, except in the performance of acts authorized by other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers; that this grant in neither of its branches gives to Congress discretionary power of any kind, but is a mere instrument in its hands to carry into effect the powers contained in the other grants. To this construction I was inclined in the more early stage of our Government; but on further reflection and observation my mind has undergone a change, for reasons which I will frankly unfold.

The grant consists, as heretofore observed, of a twofold power; the first to raise, the second to appropriate the public money, and the terms used in both instances are general and unqualified. Each branch was obviously drawn with a view to the other, and the import of each tends to illustrate that of the other. The grant to raise money gives a power over every subject from which revenue may be drawn, and is made in the same manner with the grants to declare war, to raise and support armies and a navy, to regulate commerce, to establish post-offices and post-roads, and with all the other specific grants to the General Government. In the discharge of the powers contained in any of these grants there is no other check than that which is to be found in the great principles of our system, the responsibility of the representative to his constituents. If the war, for example, is necessary and Congress declare it for good cause, their constituents will support them in it. A like support will be given them for the faithful discharge of their duties under any and every other power vested in the United States. It affords to the friends of our free governments the most heartfelt consolation to know, and from the best evidence, our own experience, that in great emergencies the boldest measures, such as form the strongest appeals to the virtue and patriotism of the people, are sure to obtain the most decided approbation.

But should the representative act corruptly and betray his trust, or otherwise prove that he was unworthy of the confidence of his constituents, he would be equally sure to lose it and to be removed and otherwise censured, according to his deserts. The power to raise money by taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is alike unqualified, nor do I see any check on the exercise of it other than that which applies to the other powers above recited, the responsibility of the representative to his constituents. Congress knows the extent of the public engagements and the sums necessary to meet them; they know how much may be derived from each branch of revenue without pressing it too far; and paying due regard to the interests of the people, they likewise know which branch ought to be resorted to in the first instance. From the commencement of the Government two branches of this power, duties and imposts, have been in constant operation, the revenue from which has supported the Government in its various branches and met its other ordinary engagements. In great emergencies the other two, taxes and excises, have likewise been resorted to, and neither was the right or the policy ever called in question.

If we look to the second branch of this power, that which authorizes the appropriation of the money thus raised, we find that it is not less general and unqualified than the power to raise it. More comprehensive terms than to "pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" could not have been used. So intimately connected with and dependent on each other are these two branches of power that had either been limited the limitation would have had the like effect on the other. Had the power to raise money been conditional or restricted to special purposes, the appropriation must have corresponded with it, for none but the money raised could be appropriated, nor could it be appropriated to other purposes than those which were permitted.

On the other hand, if the right of appropriation had been restricted to certain purposes it would be useless and improper to raise more than would be adequate to those purposes. It may fairly be inferred these restraints or checks have been carefully and intentionally avoided. The power in each branch is alike broad and unqualified, and each is drawn with peculiar fitness to the other, the latter requiring terms of great extent and force to accommodate the former, which have been adopted, and both placed in the same clause and sentence. Can it be presumed that all these circumstances were so nicely adjusted by mere accident? Is it not more just to conclude that they were the result of due deliberation and design? Had it been intended that Congress should be restricted in the appropriation of the public money to such expenditures as were authorized by a rigid construction of the other specific grants, how easy would it have been to have provided for it by a declaration to that effect. The omission of such declaration is, therefore, an additional proof that it was not intended that the grant should be so construed.

It was evidently impossible to have subjected this grant in either branch to such restriction without exposing the Government to very serious embarrassment. How carry it into effect? If the grant had been made in any degree dependent upon the States, the Government would have experienced the fate of the Confederation. Like it, it would have withered and soon perished. Had the Supreme Court been authorized, or should any other tribunal distinct from the Government be authorized to impose its veto, and to say that more money had been raised under either branch of this power, that is, by taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, than was necessary; that such a tax or duty was useless; that the appropriation to this or that purpose was unconstitutional, the movement might have been suspended and the whole system disorganized. It was impossible to have created a power within the Government, or any other power distinct from Congress and the Executive, which should control the movement of the Government in this respect and not destroy it. Had it been declared by a clause in the Constitution that the expenditures under this grant should be restricted to the construction which might be given of the other grants, such restraint, though the most innocent, could not have failed to have had an injurious effect on the vital principles of the Government and often on its most important measures.

Those who might wish to defeat a measure proposed might construe the power relied on in support of it in a narrow and contracted manner, and in that way fix a precedent inconsistent with the true import of the grant. At other times those who favored a measure might give to the power relied on a forced or strained construction, and, succeeding in the object, fix a precedent in the opposite extreme. Thus it is manifest that if the right of appropriation be confined to that limit measures may oftentimes be carried or defeated by considerations and motives altogether independent of and unconnected with their merits, and the several powers of Congress receive constructions equally inconsistent with their true import. No such declaration, however, has been made, and from the fair import of the grant, and, indeed, its positive terms, the inference that such was intended seems to be precluded.

Many considerations of great weight operate in favor of this construction, while I do not perceive any serious objections to it. If it be established it follows that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" have a definite, safe, and useful meaning. The idea of their forming an original grant with unlimited power superseding every other grant is abandoned. They will be considered simply as conveying a right of appropriation, a right indispensable to that of raising a revenue, and necessary to expenditures under every grant. By it, as already observed, no new power will be taken from the States, the money to be appropriated being raised under a power already granted to Congress. By it, too, the motive for giving a forced or strained construction to any of the other specific grants will in most instances be diminished, and in many utterly destroyed. The importance of this consideration can not be too highly estimated, since, in addition to the examples already given, it ought particularly to be recollected that, to whatever extent any specified power may be carried, the right of jurisdiction goes with it, pursuing it through all its incidents.

The very important agency which this grant has in carrying into effect every other grant is a wrong argument in favor of the construction contended for. All the other grants are limited by the nature of the offices which they have severally to perform, each conveying a power to do a certain thing, and that only, whereas this is coextensive with the great scheme of the Government itself. It is the lever which raises and puts the whole machinery in motion and continues the movement. Should either of the other grants fail in consequence of any condition or limitation attached to it or misconstruction of its powers, much injury might follow, but still it would be the failure of one branch of power, of one item in the system only. All the others might move on. But should the right to raise and appropriate the public money be improperly restricted the whole system might be sensibly affected, if not disorganized. Each of the other grants is limited by the nature of the grant itself. This by the nature of the Government only. Hence it became necessary that, like the power to declare war, this power should be commensurate with the great scheme of the Government and with all its purposes.

If then the right to raise and appropriate the public money is not restricted to the expenditures under the other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers, respectively, is there no limitation to it? Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the money to any and to every purpose, according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited Government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. Other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them. Each Government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted, and confine itself to those purposes. A State government will rarely, if ever, apply money to national purposes without making it a charge to the nation. The people of the State would not permit it.

Nor will Congress be apt to apply money in aid of the State administrations for purposes strictly local, in which the nation at large has no interest, although the State should desire it. The people of the other States would condemn it. They would declare that Congress had no right to tax them for such a purpose, and dismiss at the next election such of their representatives as had voted for the measure, especially if it should be severely felt. I do not think that in offices of this kind there is much danger of the two Governments mistaking their interests or their duties. I rather expect that they would soon have a clear and distinct understanding of them, and move on in great harmony.

* * * * * * *

It is proper to observe that the money which was employed in the construction of all the other roads was taken directly from the Treasury. This fact affords an additional proof that, in the contemplation of Congress, no difference existed in the application of money to those roads between that which was raised by the sale of lands and that which was derived from taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

* * * * * * *

Wherein consists the danger of giving a liberal construction to the right of Congress to raise and appropiate the public money? It has been shown that its obvious effect is to secure the rights of the States from encroachment and greater harmony in the political movement between the two governments, while it enlarges to a certain extent, in the most harmless way, the useful agency of the General Government for all the purposes of its institution. Is not the responsibility of the representative to his constituent, in every branch of the General Government, equally strong and as sensibly felt as in the State governments, and is not the security against abuse as effectual in the one as in the other government? The history of the General Government, in all its measures, fully demonstrates that Congress will never venture to impose unnecessary burdens on the people, or any that can be avoided.

The substance of what has been urged on this subject may be expressed in a few words. My idea is that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that, in its appropriation, they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense, and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit.

The message continuing, furnishes several instances and illustrations of the power of Congress to appropriate the Federal revenue to be expended in the States under State jurisdiction and applied to objects general and not local in their nature, in which the Federal Government had an interest and from which it derived a general benefit, a benefit that promoted the "general welfare" without the Federal Government having or exercising jurisdiction over such objects—the objects to which the appropriations were made being under the exclusive jurisdiction of the States.

I will here venture the statement that the power of Congress to appropriate public money has been less abused than any other general power, and is more under the restraint of the responsibility of the representative to his constituent. The power of appropriation has not been abused half as much as the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands.

The able Senators who are committed to the power of Congress to make appropriations of the public revenue arising from the sales of the public lands to the support of common schools in the States are forced to admit that no harm has resulted from the exercise of such power by Congress; no destruction of State rights; no centralization of all power in the General Government; no impairment of parental obligation to provide for the education of their children; no partisan or sectional text-books and histories; no mixed schools; no Federal usurpation of the jurisdiction of the States over their common schools. On the contrary, the most valuable and lasting benefits have accrued from such Federal aid to education. But when the same Federal Government offers aid to the same common schools from public revenue derived from taxation it is urged that there is a total transformation.

The Federal Government at once becomes an object of suspicion and distrust as having an organized purpose to destroy the States and take control of their common schools under the guise of friendly aid, which is in fact charged as being nothing but bribery and ruinous usurpation. In the case of the aid from land-money for the same purpose and on the same terms and conditions all is lovely and serene, and over a half century of such aid works out the most gratifying results, but when the aid is offered from tax-money by the same Government to the same States on the same terms and conditions and for the same purpose the cry of "Fire" is heard, the fire-bells are rung; the incendiary is abroad; the call is, "Wake up, my dear constituents; the enemy of your rights and liberties is at your door; he comes as a friend with valuable gifts to your State for the education of your children, but he is a briber, a usurper. I implore you as your faithful and watchful representative to spurn his offer and drive him from your door as a public criminal."

Well, the plain, common-sense people will inquire how it is that their land-money has done good and caused no harm in half a century, and their tax-money is to produce such widespread ruin and destruction. The only answer they get from their faithful sentinels on the watch-tower is that it is constitutional to appropriate your land-money to support your common schools, but it is unconstitutional to appropriate your tax-money to the same uses and purposes. The deadly virus in the Blair bill, they say, is its unconstitutionality, growing solely out of the source from which the public revenue comes that is appropriated. Then the single question is, what is the difference between the power of Congress to appropriate land-money and the power of Congress to appropriate tax-money to support common schools?

In 1822 President Monroe, in the message from which I have read, used the following language on this question:

I presume that no distinction can be taken between the appropriation of money raised by the sale of public lands and of that which arises from taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

In 1854, President Pierce, in his veto message on the "bill donating public lands to the several States for the benefit of insane persons," used the following language:

I have been unable to discover any distinction, on constitutional grounds or grounds of expediency, between an appropriation of $10,000,000 directly from the money in the Treasury for the object contemplated, and the appropriation of lands presented for my sanction. * * * I respectfully submit that in a constitutional point of view it is wholly immaterial whether the appropriation be in money or in land. * * * The public domain is the common property of the Union, just as much as the surplus proceeds of that, and of duties on imports remaining unexpended in the Treasury.

In the debate on the message of President Pierce the then Senator from Georgia used the following language:

Mr. TOOMBS. This is a very important document and should be generally diffused among the people. There seem to be two leading ideas in the message. The first is, that the public lands and their proceeds are subject to the same constitutional restraints in their appropriation by Congress as is any other fund or money in the Treasury of the United States. That I believe to be a sound principle.

How did President Pierce characterize the appropriation of the public lands to the benefit of insane persons in the several States? Listen, and hear how well it agrees with the speeches against the appropriation of money in the Blair bill:

The framers of the Constitution, in refusing to confer on the Federal Government any jurisdiction over these purely local objects, in my judgment, manifested a wise forecast and broad comprehension of the true interests of these objects themselves. It is clear that public charities within the States can be efficiently administered only by their authority. The bill before me concedes this, for it does not commit the funds it provides to the administration of any other authority. * * *

I can not but repeat what I have before expressed, that if the several States, many of which have already laid the foundation of munificent establishments of local beneficence, and nearly all of which are proceeding to establish them, shall be led to suppose, as they will be, should this bill become a law, that Congress is to make provision for such objects, the fountains of charity will be dried up at home, and the several States, instead of bestowing their own means on the social wants of their own people, may themselves, through the strong temptation, which appeals to States as to individuals, become humble suppliants for the bounty of the Federal Government, reversing their true relation to this Union.

In 1859 the bill appropriating public lands to the endowment and establishment of agricultural and mechanical colleges in the several States passed both Houses of Congress, and I believe was vetoed by President Buchanan. In the debate on that bill the then Senator from Ohio, George E. Pugh, used the following language:

Does it follow because agriculture is laudable that therefore the power to regulate or advance its interests is vested in us? Why, sir, the people of the United States have wisely reserved to their State governments this with many other of their most important interests, and it is just as much a violation of our duty to invade the province of the State governments under the head of donations as it would be to invade it by force and violence. If you proceed to a detailed examination of this bill, you will see that its object is entirely to displace the control of the State governments over the most important of all the pursuits of our citizens; for in making this princely grant to the States it is to be made upon condition that the Legislatures of the States will agree to such and such stipulations in the nature of a treaty between them and the Federal Government as forever to supersede them and install us. I say, whether such an invasion of the rights of the States be made under a pretense of granting public land or of granting money, it is just as atrocious a violation of the organic law as if it were the act of an armed usurper.

The then Senator from Virginia (Mr. Mason) used the following language in the same debate to establish agricultural and mechanical colleges in the several States:

Mr. MASON. Sir, to my conception it is one of the most extraordinary engines of mischief, under the guise of gratuities and donations, that I could conceive would originate in the Senate. It is using the public lands as a means of controlling the policy of the State Legislatures. It is misusing the property of the country in such mode as to bring the appropriate functions of the State entirely, within the scope of the bill, under the discretion of Congress by a controlling power; and it is doing it in the worst and most insidious form—by bribery, direct bribery, and bribery of the worst kind; for it is an unconstitutional robbing of the Treasury for the purpose of bribing the States. That is exactly what is to be found in the substance of this bill, as I look upon the Constitution. I am not going to argue here—it has been my unhappy province more than once to object to appropriations of the public lands as unconstitutional, not with any hope that any effort of mine could influence the judgment of the Senate, but to enlighten that honored constituency whose property is thus depredated upon.

Why, sir, what distinction can honorable Senators make between the public lands, the common property of the country, and the public money, the common property of the country, in the Treasury of the United States? What earthly difference? The one is property, and the other is the representative of property; and the property itself is acquired by the use of the public money.

I have had occasion to say here, and up to this time to act upon it, and so far as I can yet foresee events, am prepared to continue to act upon it, that I will agree to the purchase of no more land; amongst other reasons, because of the corrupting uses to which it is put by the Federal legislation. Suppose this bill was to appropriate eight or ten million dollars from the Treasury, for the purpose of building up agricultural colleges in the States, would honorable Senators who patronize this bill vote for the direct appropriation, and if they would not, why not? If they have the power to do it, and they believe it is expedient to do it, why would they not just as well take the money from the Treasury to build up agricultural colleges as take the public lands? If it be constitutional to do it, there is not only the right, but the duty to do it, as much by the money of the country as by the lands of the country.

In the same debate the then Senator from Alabama (Mr. Clay) spoke as follows:

This is a magnificent bribe tendered to Alabama for the surrender to Federal power of her original and reserved right to manage her own internal and domestic affairs in her own way. Its acceptance is encouraged not only by the hope of great gain, but by the fear of a greater loss, for if this bill become a law and she refuse the donation and other States accept it she must endure a double loss in the land she did not take and in taxation to pay for the land others do take. I hope Alabama will refuse to debase herself at the footstool of Federal power and spurn the bribe if tendered.

But we are told that this bill can only be carried into effect by the consent of the States. It does not mitigate the inequity of this bill in the slightest degree that it is to be done by the complicity of the State governments. You tempt them to their own self-abasement and self-destruction. You tender your patronage if they will become your clients. You promise your guardianship if they will become your wards. You offer them great estates if they will become your tenants at will. You promise them rich doweries in exchange for their liberties. If State pride, independence, and sovereignty do not revolt at this proposition, State honor should.

But this bill treats the States as agents instead of principals, as the creatures instead of the creators of the Federal Government; proposes to give them their own property and to direct them how to use it, and menaces them with its forfeiture and the reclamation of it by us if they do not faithfully comply with our instructions and obey our orders. It thus transposes the relations of the State and Federal Government.

The framers of the Constitution were not guilty of the folly or the baseness of enabling Congress to appropriate the public lands any more than the public money at discretion and at the same time of defining its powers and duties. They did not empower it to apply the public lands or money to any other than the great objects for which the Government was formed. Congress has no greater power over the public lands than over other property of the United States. If Congress can give land it may give money or any property of the United States. And why not give money as well as land? The land was bought with money and will sell for money. If we give either we impair the revenue of the Government and increase its demands upon the people in the way of taxation. There is no difference in principle or effect between giving money and giving land.

All the speeches from which I have quoted, made by able Democratic Senators against the bill for the establishment and endowment of agricultural and mechanical colleges in the several States, by appropriating the public lands, read very much like the speeches we have heard against the Blair bill. The agricultural and mechanical college bill became a law twenty-five years since. The aid was accepted by the States upon the terms and conditions prescribed in the law; and in each State agricultural and mechanical colleges have been established, and the splendid results of that wise legislation are a matter of public history and public pride. In my own State the Agricultural and Mechanical College is under able and wise and efficient government, and there is no apprehension and never was of Federal usurpation as the outgrowth of that munificent benefaction of the General Government. On the contrary, that college is firmly rooted in the affection and confidence and pride of Alabama, as an institution whose worth and usefulness can not be overestimated.

But the enemies of the Blair bill hope to avoid the fate of those who made such signal mistakes as to the operation and consequences of the agricultural and mechanical appropriation by being classed as false prophets by clinging to the last hope they have that Congress has no such power to appropriate money to be raised by taxation, as has been admitted it possesses to appropriate the public lands and their proceeds. They claim that the controversy as to the power of Congress to make such disposition of the public lands and their proceeds has been ended by long acquiescence and judicial determination. Grant it; but it must not be forgotten that the Senators who supported the agricultural and mechanical college bill were just as confident then that Congress had such power as the enemies of the Blair bill are now, after it has been settled.

The friends of the agricultural and mechanical college bill were arraigned on the charge of being latitudinarian constructionists of the Constitution, and as favoring a scheme to usurp the rights of the States and centralize all power in a National Government under the guise of a bribe to the States to accept Federal control in the place of State control of common schools and the education of the people. But time and trial and experience have wiped out all the alarming prophecies of those Senators who claimed to be the only accredited apostles of Jeffersonian Democracy, and the agricultural and mechanical colleges stand to-day as indestructible monuments to the wisdom of Federal aid to education. In my judgment, the power of Congress is just as well founded in the Constitution to make the appropriation as provided in the Blair bill as the point is now well settled that Congress had the power to make the disposition of the public lands and their proceeds as provided in the bill to establish agricultural and mechanical colleges. In the case of the agricultural and mechanical college bill the power of Congress to pass it rested on the authority of Congress to "dispose" of the lands.

In the case of the Blair bill the authority of Congress to pass it rests on the power of Congress to "appropriate" money in the Treasury raised from any sources. The enemies of the Blair bill deny that the power of Congress to appropriate money collected from taxation extends beyond the subjects and the objects defined and embraced in the express and implied grants of power to Congress. In other words, they insist that the power to tax and the power to appropriate coexist and are coextensive, and both are confined and restrained to the single purpose of enabling Congress to exercise and execute the powers contained in the express and implied grants in the Constitution; and this being true, they say it follows, necessarily, that Congress has no power to appropriate the money in the Treasury from taxation to any subject or any object over which Congress has no jurisdiction or any power to legislate. I do not apprehend that the enemies of the Blair bill can complain that I do not understand their position or that I have stated it unfairly. If they are right in their construction of the power of "appropriation" I would join them in opposition to the Blair bill.

But I differ with them, and agree with Mr. Calhoun and President Monroe that the power of "appropriation" for good reasons and wise considerations of public interest is not confined and limited to the execution of the afterwards-enumerated powers of Congress; but has a wider range in the "discretion" of Congress. It must not be understood, however, that this discretionary power of Congress to appropriate public money is itself absolute or unlimited, but, on the contrary, such power can only be exercised for purposes and objects that come honestly and fairly within the meaning of the descriptive words in the Constitution—

To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

I agree with Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Calhoun, Story, and Kent, that these descriptive words in the Constitution delegate no distinct, substantive power to Congress, but merely define, and were used only to define, the "objects" to which the money raised by taxation may be appropriated. The power of selecting these objects must necessarily reside somewhere, and can be trusted nowhere with any more safety than to the discretion of Congress. The "discretion" of Congress is trusted by the framers of the Constitution in many of its provisions. It is trusted with the power to declare war, to levy taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to coin money and regulate its value, to exercise exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia and the Territories, and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

The sole question, then, to answer is, whether the common-school education under the exclusive and absolute jurisdiction, control, and regulation of the State governments, as expressly conceded in the Blair bill, is a public object possessing, in its aggregated and associated effects and influences throughout the United States, such national importance as to bring these common schools fairly within the meaning of the descriptive words of the Constitution, as objects deserving Federal aid "in order" "to promote the general welfare." These common schools have been public objects of national importance and national solicitude from the foundation of the Government. Several hundred millions in money and public property have been contributed to their existence and support by the Federal Government under State management. This national aid has been so continuing and so common that it has become an established practice of the General Government to treat common schools as objects of so much national importance that the States ought not to be allowed to carry the burden of supporting them alone by taxation of their own citizens.

No man living can deny that common schools under the exclusive jurisdiction of the States have been and are recognized as public objects deserving national aid and support. But it is urged by the self-constituted apostles of Jeffersonian Democracy that this general-welfare source of power leaves Congress, without any bridle or harness, to run rough-shod all over the face of the earth with the money of the people. Who is to carry on all this work of destruction under the general-welfare clause? The Congress of the United States, a House of Representatives elected every two years from three hundred and twenty-five districts, and seventy-six Senators elected every six years by the several State Legislatures. This Federal Government, made by the States, and its Congress, made by the States, and the people are to conspire against their own constituents in open day under the eye of the people and under the supervision of the newspaper press to usurp the power of the States, centralize the Government, and destroy the liberties of their own people!

All this is to be done in one term of the representative, as the people and the State Legislatures will certainly be incapable of self-government if they re-elect such a Congress to consummate such dire calamities.

Mr. President, I do not believe it. The people can not be made to give serious consideration to such wild speculations.

A few words in conclusion in answer to some objections that have been urged to the machinery of the Blair bill.

The Morrill bill, it will be remembered, expressly required that its terms and conditions should be accepted by an act of the Legislature of each State before receiving its share, and the bill also expressly provided that no State should be paid any part of the appropriation until it raised enough from its own revenue to keep open the common schools at least four months in each year; which would then have compelled Alabama to about double its school-tax before a dollar would have been paid to her under the provisions of the Morrill bill; and with the Teller amendment all the proceeds of the public lands, which have since amounted to over ten millions per annum, would have been subjected to many of the same conditions contained in the Blair bill, now pronounced by the supporters of the Morrill bill and the Teller amendment to be too humiliating and degrading and dangerous to the States.

Under the Blair bill Alabama would receive over a half million dollars each of the eight years without increasing its school-tax one cent, and if she wishes more of the Federal aid all she has to do is to add to her own school fund whatever she pleases and receive an additional amount from the appropriation in the Blair bill. Every State in the Union is put on precisely the same footing, and each receives, on the basis of its illiteracy, an amount equal to its own school fund.

I make the following quotation from the speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]:

I now come to the principal feature of this bill. In the first place, the bill adheres to the proposition that we are not to undertake the regulation of the instruction of the schools and their management inside the States. We are offering an endowment in aid of the resources and of the activities and of the desires of the different States. We are not undertaking to coerce in the least degree the acceptance or permission on the part of the States to meet and accept this proposition or to reject it. Then we are careful, after this endowment is pressed upon them and is accepted by them, to effect no other coercion, or persuasion, which is a better phrase for it, to use and employ these agencies and these resources which shall in the least enervate their domestic interests or break down the zeal and the virtue of their own endowments in the same direction.

Beyond that, although they protect their funds, their principal being supplemented or reduced by our added aggregate wealth, we also do not compel in the least that taxation for a dollar shall be pressed there beyond their present purposes and their present laws. We hold before them no compulsion that they shall raise from their own resources, by taxation or otherwise, an equal amount to that which we offer them.

We guard, then, on the one side and on the other against any encroachment upon the freedom and the ease of the States in meeting this endowment, first, by saving them from any fear that our endowment may check, or nip, or divert the growing zeal, and growing duty, and growing performance of duty among their own people by their own taxation. We say to them, "You are to receive from us under this distribution no more than you raise yourselves."

On the other hand, as I say, neither by undue excitement nor by any menace of withdrawing aid do we urge the taxation beyond the easy and proper assessments that may be laid. We say to the States, "Whatever you raise, and only that amount, you shall receive; and if you raise up to the amount that we offer, then you have a doubled fortune." So, if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will allow me, all this apprehension of the pressure on the people of Alabama, whom he so ably represents and defends in their institutions, in their policy, in their customs, in their tendencies, it seems to me, swings entirely free of the measure of this bill.

It is urged that, in the words in the Blair bill, "the instruction shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws" fatal concessions are made.

During the debate on the Blair bill my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] asked the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Harrison, this question:

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana to define for us what a common school is? The schools in Alabama are called public schools, and they are graded; graded in four degrees. The higher schools in Alabama of the public system teach a very extensive academic course. I do not know whether they are public schools or whether they are academies.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator that this term is one of universal use, at least so far as my observation goes, and applies to such schools of the lower grade, not including universities and colleges, as are maintained by the State out of its revenues for the free use of its children—a common-school system.

Mr. LAMAR. The specification of the studies, the mere prescription that geography, reading, writing and arithmetic shall be taught in those schools, I do not think can be called a condition or dictation; they are words of description. It is simply saying that common-school education shall be taught, and it is another mode of expressing the very object of the bill as it has been reported. If, instead of the words "reading," "writing," "arithmetic," "geography," the words, "the usual common-school education" had been substituted, it seems to me the same object would have been accomplished.

It thus appears that the words which have been the subject of so much criticism were innocently inserted to define the character of a common school, which would have been left in some uncertainty but for the descriptive words which embrace subjects taught in every common school in the United States. No power is conferred on the Secretary of the Intetior to direct what books shall be used in the common schools.

In the next objection we find some of the spirit that characterizes the war on the Blair bill. The proviso denying to the Secretary of the Interior the power of withholding the share of any State because it has separate schools for white and black children is seized upon as an invitation and encouragement to have mixed schools, when the truth is that the proviso was inserted to meet the objection of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that if the authority was not denied the Secretary of the Interior might refuse to pay over the share of any State that had separate schools.

But the provision in the bill that has aroused its enemies to the point of despair should it become a law is that which confers authority upon the Secretary of the Interior "to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the result thereof." Did it never occur to Senators that if no such provision were in the bill the Secretary would have the same power derived from other parts of the bill to hear such complaints and report them to Congress? In the power conferred to withhold the share of any State (which is always given disbursing officers in all appropriation bills) that misappropriated or misapplied or was guilty of unjust discrimination in the use of the fund the Secretary would have authority to hear complaints and to report them to Congress. If there is no ground for such complaints they will never be made, and if there is ground they will be made, and ought to be made and heard. I have no idea any ground will ever exist for such complaints or that the provision will ever give rise to any trouble.

Mr. President, some Senators who oppose this bill thank God that they are unlike those weaker brothers who are not strong enough to resist the temptation of an "appropriation" to their States. I must confess that my human nature is not of that kind that is so ethereal as to be always out of the reach of temptation and above suspicion. My imperfections are so great that I find myself compelled to yield to the temptation of voting appropriations, when I believe I have the power, in which my State and people are to have some share and be benefited thereby. The Senators from Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, and Texas who oppose the Blair bill represent States rich in school funds and school facilities and are independent of Federal aid. The Blair bill has no temptations for them from which they ask to be delivered.

To show its necessity in my State I offer the following report of the superintendent of education just published, which I ask leave to incorporate in my remarks, and I will trouble the Senate no longer.

The report referred to is as follows:

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT PALMER TO THE GOVERNOR.

The following is taken from State Superintendent of Education Palmer's annual report to the governor:

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
Montgomery, Ala., December 15, 1887.

SIR: In compliance with law, I have the honor of submitting the thirty-third annual report of this department, containing a full account of the condition of the public schools of the State for the year ending September 30, 1887, and such other information as the law makes it my duty to report to the governor. By an examination of the tables and the reports herein contained, you will see that our public schools are as prosperous as the meager school fund of the State would lead you to expect. The pressing want of our school system is more money, that the public schools may continue a longer period each year, and that our teachers may be paid better salaries. Notwithstanding the fact that the system is sorely crippled in its operations for the want of adequate funds to meet the constantly growing demands upon it, there is no doubt of its increasing popularity and usefulness. The advantages to be derived from a good school system are more keenly felt by the great body of the people of the State to-day than ever before in its history.

Fund for 1886-'87 was as follows:

|---|---|
| Unapportioned balance from 1885-'86 | $3,421.28 |
| Interest on sixteenth section fund 1886-'87, 6 per cent | 109,241.19 |
| Interest on valueless sixteenth section fund 1886-'87, 6 per cent | 5,825.47 |
| Interest on United States surplus revenue, 4 per cent | 26,765.47 |
| Annual appropriation for 1886-'87 | 230,000.00 |
| Amount from Baldwin County, act February 17, 1885 | 245.00 |
| Unexpended contingent fund, 1885-'86 | .55 |
| Total fund certified by auditor, October 1, 1886 | 375,496.96 |

Apportioned as follows:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| To counties and cities | $336,867.32 | |
| To Florence Normal School | 7,500.00 | |
| To Jacksonville Normal School | 2,500.00 | |
| To Livingston Normal School | 2,500.00 | |
| To Marion Normal School | 6,000.00 | |
| To Huntsville Normal School | 4,000.00 | |
| To Tuskegee Normal School | 3,000.00 | |
| To educational contingent fund | 1,000.00 | |
| To special appropriation, Winston County | 800.00 | |
| | | 374,167.32 |
| Unapportioned balance | | 1,329.64 |
| Amount credited to Baldwin County | 245.00 | |
| Amount expended for institutes | 500.00 | |
| | | 745.00 |
| Balance | | 584.64 |

In addition to the above school fund, which was by law certified by the State auditor to this department, on the 1st day of October, 1886, and apportioned as shown above, there was collected and retained in the counties where collected:

|---|---|
| Poll-tax to the amount of | $136,895.75 |
| Rents from unsold school lands | 3,597.25 |
| Total fund not certified by auditor | 140,492.99 |
| Total fund certified by auditor as shown above | 375,496.96 |
| Total State fund for year | 515,989.95 |

By reference to the special reports from the cities and separate school districts herein contained, it will be seen there was raised in them by local taxation or otherwise, enough to swell this amount to the sum of $800,000.

The State fund was disbursed as follows:

|---|---|
| For pay of teachers of white schools | $291,884.40 |
| For pay of teachers of colored schools | 194,389.92 |
| For pay of salaries of county superintendents | 13,903.21 |
| For normal schools for white teachers | 12,500.00 |
| For normal schools for colored teachers | 13,000.00 |
| For special appropriation to Winston County | 800.00 |
| For educational contingent fund | 851.05 |
| Total State fund disbursed in counties | 527,319.88 |

In former reports the amount of State funds disbursed in cities and separate school districts was included in this last total, but in this it is not, because included in their special reports elsewhere.

To his Excellency THOMAS SEAY,
Governor of Alabama.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 191) to make additional appropriation for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the late John A. Logan.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1338) to extend the leave of absence of employés in the Government Printing Office to thirty days per annum;

A bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 23) authorizing the printing of 14,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following concurrent resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the addresses delivered in the House of Representatives on January 19, 1888, upon the presentation of the portraits of Speakers Sedgwick, Varnum, and Banks, for the use of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House letters from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of findings of fact by said court in the following cases against the United States, namely: C. C. Poindexter, C. W. Hunt, administrator, Mary E. Wells, H. H. Dunnavant, and William K. Booe; which were severally referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PENSIONS IN LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to ask unanimous consent to lay before the House, and have printed in the RECORD, a memorial from Mrs. Morrison R. Waite, president of the Woman's National Relief Association, and other officers of the various branches of said association in the United States, and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce; also eight other memorials signed by Roswell P. Flower and other citizens of the United States, praying that those engaged in the Life-Saving Service may receive a pension in the event of being disabled in or through the exposure of the service, and their families in case of their death, the same at least as for military service.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, members of the "Woman's National Relief Association for the Relief of the Shipwrecked," and others who sympathize with the brave and suffering, respectfully represent:

1. That the Life-Saving Service, from a small beginning, has grown into magnificent proportions; that its stations are destined to occupy every prominent point of danger on our vast lines of lake and ocean front;

2. That the extension of the service will increase the number of men exposed to the unusual hazards of this work;

3. That already many of them have fallen before the fury of the elements, and found watery graves; that others have been disabled, and that wives and children have been left to the tender mercies of friends, common charity, and the poor-house;

4. That it is a public injustice that men engaged in a work fraught with so much danger, and of so much value to its beneficiaries in life and property, should receive compensation so disproportionate to the value of the service rendered, barely sufficient to meet their most common daily necessities, leaving nothing in reserve for the contingencies of fatality and disability;

5. That thousands of lives and millions of property are annually saved and will continue to be saved by this service, which has more danger than any military or naval service; that ultimately nearly every man in it will lose his life or be disabled from exposure; that it has no emolument or stimulant save a meager wage and the consciousness of heroic deeds;

6. That all travelers upon the waters and all shippers feel safer from the knowledge that there are heroic men always at the point of danger, guarding it with sleepless vigilance, always on the lookout for the victims of the angry elements, and always ready to jeopardize life to save life;

7. That this is not merely a work for the safety of our own people; it knows no nationality, extends a helping hand alike to all;

8. That its service and success are matters of national pride; that the nation's honor, and the honor of every citizen loyal to the interests of humanity and the cry of distress, is compromised by the failure to provide ample compensation for the risks and work done and to be done, and to secure to the wives, children, and dependents of the victims of this grand benevolence adequate support;

9. That these men would meet the dangers always before them and perform their work with braver hearts and stronger arms, having the assurance that death in the discharge of duty would not leave those dependent upon them paupers, no one will deny;

10. Less than this is not merely injustice, it is crime.

11. With due appreciation of the two years' pension already granted to the families in case of death, we pray that these men may receive a pension in the event of being disabled in or through the exposure of the service, and their families in case of their death, the same at least as for military service.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. OSBORNE to withdraw papers relating to the claim of A. G. Hoyte, for reference to the Committee on Claims, to be used in the consideration of House bill 4021, Fiftieth Congress; and to Mr. HUNTER, to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the discharge paper in the case of Noah Palmer, filed in the Forty-ninth Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BOWDEN, for three days from February 1, on account of important business.

To Mr. TOWNSHEND, for one week, on account of important business.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6437) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the Departments for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. WEAVER reserved points of order on said bill.

Mr. BURNES. I ask leave to file the accompanying report to-morrow, to be printed with the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to Thomas A. Osborn, late United States marshal for the district of Kansas, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,701.96, on account of the loss of that amount of public funds by the failure of the banking-house of E. H. Gruber & Co., on the 6th day of October, 1886, the loss being without neglect or fault on the part of said Thomas A. Osborn.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is this reported unanimously from the committee?

Mr. MORRILL. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn, adopt the annexed report of the Committee on Claims made in the Forty-ninth Congress, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

Add to the bill the following words: "Provided, It shall be proven to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that said money was lost without fault or negligence upon the part of said Osborn."

"[House Report No. 3104, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9008) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn, having carefully considered the same, reports:

"That the claimant, Thomas A. Osborn, was United States marshal for the district of Kansas in October, 1866, and for over two years prior thereto; that as such marshal certain money of the United States came into his hands to defray United States court expenses for his district; that his office as marshal was in the city of Leavenworth, Kans., in a room immediately over the banking house of E. H. Gruber & Co.; that the Government furnished no safe or other depository in which the claimant could deposit the public money in his hands.

"It had been, and was on the said 6th day of October, 1866, the custom of the claimant, on receiving advances from the Government for the court expenses, to deposit the same with the said banking firm of E. H. Gruber & Co.; that the said firm was regarded by the business community of said city as being perfectly safe; the leading and best citizens made their deposits with said bank; that on October 1, 1866, the claimant had a balance in said bank, of funds belonging to the United States, of $2,966.59; that on said 1st day of October he received from the Treasury of the United States the further sum of $6,596 for the purpose of paying the expenses of the October term of the United States district court, which sum he also deposited in said bank on said 1st day of October, 1866; that on the 6th day of October, 1866, the said banking house of E. H. Gruber & Co. failed, having at the time of failure the sum of $9,562.59 of the moneys of the United States to the credit of the claimant as United States marshal; that the claimant at once made good said amount to the United States.

"The committee is of the opinion that the claimant used due care in handling the said money of the United States, and that the loss was in no way the result of any negligence on his part.

"In February, 1867, the late Hon. Mark W. Delahay, then United States district judge for Kansas, made the following statement:

"'I have been perfectly conversant with Marshal Osborn's manner of doing business since his appointment. I know that he has been doing his banking business through the house of E. H. Gruber & Co. This house I considered one of the safest in the locality until it failed, on the 6th of October, 1866.

"'I believe that Marshal Osborn has guarded with unusual diligence the interest of the Government, and that he is in no way to blame for the loss which occurred with E. H. Gruber & Co. Many of the best business men in Leavenworth were doing business with said firm at the time of its failure. I had been doing my banking business with said firm for years.

"'MARK W. DELAHAY,

"'United States District Judge for Kansas.'

"The committee concurs in the opinion expressed in the statement just cited. It is shown to the committee by competent evidence that the claimant received from the assignee of said firm of E. H. Gruber & Co. 9 per cent. of said sum of $9,562.59 and no more. The committee is of the opinion from all the facts and circumstances attending the loss that the sum of $8,701.96 should be paid the claimant.

"The committee returns bill H. R. 9008 with the recommendation that the same do pass."

In further support of the bill we incorporate, as a part of the report, the following affidavits:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, District of Columbia:

"Thomas A. Osborn, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that in October, 1866, and for two years prior thereto, he was marshal of the United States for the district of Kansas; that as such marshal money was advanced to him by the United States Government to pay the expenses of the United States courts in said district; that his office as marshal was in the city of Leavenworth, Kans., in a room immediately over the banking house of E. H. Gruber & Co., with which firm he did his banking business, and that he had no interest whatever in the profits of said firm.

"Deponent further says that the Government declined to furnish him a safe in which to place his funds advanced for disbursements, and that no depository had been designated for such purpose. It was the custom of the deponent at the time referred to, and had been from the time of his appointment in 1864, on receiving advances from the Government for the court expenses, to deposit the same with the said banking (house) firm of E. H. Gruber & Co., and check the same out as it might be required.

"Said banking firm was regarded by the business community of said city as perfectly safe, and its depositors included many of the most conservative and most successful business men of the neighborhood. No thought of their being embarrassed occurred to the deponent until he was informed, on the 6th of October, 1866, that they had failed, and he knows that the announcement of that event was a great surprise to the entire community. On October 1, 1866, deponent had a balance in said bank, of funds belonging to the United States, advanced to him for disbursements as aforesaid, of $2,966.59, and on said 1st day of October he received from the Treasury of the United States the further sum of $6,596 for the purpose of paying the expenses of the October term of the United States district court, which sum he also deposited in said bank on said 1st day of October.

"On the 6th day of October, 1866, the said banking house of E. H. Gruber & Co. failed, having at the time of failure the sum of $9,562.59 of the money of the United States deposited, as hereinbefore specified.

"Deponent afterwards settled his accounts with the United States Government and made good to the Treasury the amount of said loss. The loss was afterwards reduced by the payment to the deponent by the assignee of said bank of 9 per cent. of said claim, amounting to $860.63, so that the actual loss to the deponent was $8,701.96.

"Deponent says further that as to the manner of doing business in connection with the payment of court expenses he endeavored to follow, and, as he is informed, did follow, the usages of his predecessors in office, and that he used his best judgment in guarding the interests of the Government.

"In doing as he did he had the advice and approval of the judge of the United States district court.

"THOMAS A. OSBORN.

"Sworn and subscribed before me this 9th day of January, 1888.

"Notary Public."

STATE OF KANSAS,
County of Douglas, ss:

James S. Emery, being first duly sworn, says: I was United States district attorney for Kansas in the years 1864, 1865, 1866, and a portion of 1867; that I am familiar with the facts attending the loss of ex-Governor T. A. Osborn while he was United States marshal in those years, caused by the failure of Gruber's bank, in Leavenworth; that this bank, at the time the marshal made his deposits in it, was regarded as the best and safest bank in that city. It did a large business, and was patronized by the leading business men in Leavenworth, as well as of the surrounding country. Its failure was a great surprise to our whole State, so far as it was extending its business; and Leavenworth, at that time, did a large wholesale business in most of the towns of the State; and this (Gruber's) was deemed the leading bank of the city. I have always deemed the governor's claim against the United States Government for his loss of Government funds through the failure of that bank just, and one that should be paid. And further this deponent saith not.

JAS. S. EMERY.

Subscribed and sworn to this 16th day of January, 1888, before me, a notary public in and for said county.

[SEAL.] PETER BELL,
Notary Public.

My commission expires September 3, 1889.

There being no objection to the consideration of the bill, the amendment recommended by the committee was considered and adopted, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Regular order!

Mr. LAWLER. I rise to ask the privilege of making an explanation in reference to a resolution introduced by myself on Monday last.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAWLER. On Monday I introduced a resolution, which will be found on page 802 of the RECORD, and in the eighth line I omitted to insert the words "not necessary" after the words "deriving revenue" where they should properly be inserted. I would like to have that correction made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

INSPECTIVE FORCE, POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6438) to provide for the appointment, organization, and compensation of the inspective force of the Post-Office Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ASSIGNMENT OF ROOMS, CAPITOL BUILDING.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 16, 1888.

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be, and is hereby, instructed to ascertain and report whether there are sufficient unoccupied rooms in the Capitol for the accommodation of the committees of the House, and if not, where and upon what terms the necessary rooms can be procured.

The report of the Committee on Accounts was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution of Mr. WHITTHORNE, introduced in the House on January 16, respectfully report that upon inquiry and examination they find there are no unoccupied rooms in the Capitol that can be used for the accommodation of those committees of the House not already provided with rooms.

They report further that there are a number of rooms in the Butler building that are unoccupied, and can be had for the use of such committees of the House as desire them, at a rental that may be fixed by the Supervising Architect of the Capitol, or by any three members of the Committee on Accounts, as proposed by Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, the owner thereof. These rooms are unfurnished.

And further, your committee report that they find that there are two suitable rooms for committee use in the Congressional Hotel, across from the Butler building, one of which was occupied during the last Congress by the special committee of which the Hon. A. G. Curtin was chairman. The proprietor offers to rent the two rooms for $50 per month, including tables, chairs, heat, and light.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask that the Committee on Accounts be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to submit a resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In view of the report just submitted, I ask the action of the House on the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman who has charge of this matter. I wish to know how long it will probably take. There is an order to-day for the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce, and I wish to know how long this will occupy.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. But a minute.

The Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. WHITTHORNE, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, directed to rent during the present and next session of this, the Fiftieth Congress, the furnished rooms located in the Congressional Hotel, mentioned in the report of the Committee on Accounts this day submitted, to be occupied by, and for the use of, the following committees of this House, namely, the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims and the Committee on the Eleventh Census; the rent of which shall not exceed $50 per month, and which rent shall be paid monthly out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending proposition is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] that the Committee on Accounts be discharged from the further consideration of this subject. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS REFERRED TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That J. B. Holloway is hereby appointed to prepare and continue a digest of all claims referred to the Court of Claims under the so-called "Bowman act," and the act approved March 3, 1887, "to provide for bringing suits against the United States;" to keep a record of the findings of the court in each case reported to Congress, and such other necessary duties as the position may require; and that he shall be paid the same compensation as is now paid the clerk of the Committee on War Claims, out of the contingent fund of the House; and that the Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby is, instructed to provide for the annual salary of said clerk for the next fiscal year in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

PRESENTATION OF EX-SPEAKERS' PORTRAITS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The resolution referred to the committee was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the addresses delivered in the House of Representatives on January 19, 1888, upon the presentation of the portraits of Speakers Sedgwick, Varnum, and Banks, for the use of the House.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the concurrent resolution of the House providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of the addresses delivered in the House of Representatives January 19, 1888, upon the presentation of the portraits of Speakers Sedgwick, Varnum, and Banks, for the use of the House, and direct me to report same with recommendation that it do pass.

The estimated cost of printing and binding same in cloth is $2,823.50. The approximate cost of amount of printing previously estimated upon for Congress within present fiscal year is $631,930.50.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Printing. I am directed to report back with a favorable recommendation a Senate bill which will not take a moment. It is the bill (S. 191) to make additional appropriations for the printing——

Mr. BRUMM. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the title of the bill be read. When that is done I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not object.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that there is a special order for to-day which we desire to reach.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. We have done nothing since Congress began but ask unanimous consent. I think we should adhere to the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope there will be no objection to having this read.

Mr. BRUMM. I withdraw my objection.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 191) to make additional appropriations for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the late John A. Logan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANTS TO UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

Mr. RYAN. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations, and ask its immediate consideration.

The resolution referred to the committee was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate to the House of Representatives the names of all assistants to United States district attorneys who have been or are being paid out of the appropriation of $100,000 made by the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1887, "for payment of assistants to United States district attorneys;" also the places of employment and the present rate of compensation to each of said assistants, and how much greater or less is the rate of compensation of each of such assistants for the fiscal year 1888 than for the fiscal year 1887, and the reason for any such increase or reduction, and such other information in relation thereto as in his judgment may contribute to just and intelligent legislation upon the subject.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, calling upon the Attorney-General for information with reference to assistants to United States district attorneys, report the same back and recommend that it be adopted.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] demands the regular order. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 1844) to promote agriculture, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JESSE G. HAWKINS.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 437) for the relief of Jesse G. Hawkins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

R. H. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. FORD also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4246) for the relief of Robert H. Montgomery; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SECTION 2133, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DARLINGTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1417) to amend section 2133 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to submit the views of the minority; and the bill, with the report, was referred to the House Calendar.

PETER MARCH AND OTHERS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3957) for the relief of Peter March, Thomas J. Wright, adiministrator, and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON EUROPEAN DOCK-YARDS.

Mr. HIESTAND, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 25) to print 4,000 copies of the report of Naval Constructor Philip Hichborn, on European dock-yards; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HIESTAND. Is that report privileged?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

STORM-TRACK CHARTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 58) providing for the printing of 4,500 copies of Finley's Storm-Track Charts of the North Atlantic Ocean; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CAPT. RODERICK M'INTOSH.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 393) to provide for the payment of the claim of Capt. Roderick McIntosh; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE OF ALABAMA.

Mr. MAISH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4082) for the relief of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of committees for reports is concluded. The regular order now is the call of committees for the consideration of bills for one hour. The hour begins at ten minutes of 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SPRINGER. That committee has exhausted its time, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It did not finish, yesterday.

Mr. SPRINGER. It exhausted its time. There was no bill pending at the expiration of the hour. If there had been a bill pending, the committee would be entitled to finish it, but there was none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was a bill called up by that committee when the hour expired yesterday.

JAMES ALBERT BONSACK.

Mr. WEAVER (when the Committee on Patents was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 593) for the relief of James Albert Bonsack, and I yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], the author of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, is this bill called up under the morning hour for consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not know what the nature of the bill is, but in order to keep the practice of the House correct, I make the point that in this hour a private bill can not be considered. I do this without any reference whatever to the merits of this particular measure. I do it simply because such has been the practice of the House heretofore, and it is a practice which I think should be observed.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope the gentleman will not urge that point. This bill can be disposed of in a moment. There is no objection to it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that; but the difficulty is that if we get into the habit of doing these things we shall use up the whole of this hour with that class of business.

Mr. BLOUNT. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the point. The point of order is well taken. In this hour gentlemen can call up only bills that are on the House Calendar, or the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WEAVER. I know it can only be done by unanimous consent, but I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not press that request. There are other bills here of a public character that ought to be reached in their own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will not object at the end of this hour.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object. I want the regular order.

Mr. MATSON (when the Committee on Invalid Pensions was called). I understand the Chair to rule that private bills are not in order in this hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. MATSON. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has no other kind of bills to report.

SPECIAL REPORT UPON WOOL MANUFACTURES, ETC.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to call up for present consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 23) authorizing the printing of 14,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool. This joint resolution is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and that it be now considered in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That there be printed 14,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool, as follows: 10,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the members of the Senate, and 1,000 for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

The report of the Committee on Printing (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred H. Res. 23, submit the following report:

That they have condsidered House joint resolution 23, authorizing the printing of 14,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool, and report same with recommendation that it do pass.

The estimated cost of same is $1,778.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO PRINTING-OFFICE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 1338) to extend the leave of absence of employés in the Government Printing Office to thirty days per annum. This bill is also on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House.

There was no objection, and the House proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office," approved June 30, 1886, be so amended as to extend the annual leave of absence therein described to thirty days in each fiscal year.

The report of the Committee on Printing (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred House bill 1338, beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee have considered the bill (H. R. 1338) to extend the leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office to thirty days in each fiscal year, and report same with recommendation that it do pass with two amendments, as follows:

First, that these words be added:

"Provided, It shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave to those serving fractional parts of a year."

And, second, add these words:

"And further to facilitate the public work, the Public Printer may, in his discretion, in special cases, credit employés with the amount due them for leave of absence without their actually taking such leave."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question will be upon agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Printing, just read as a part of their report.

Mr. REED. I hope we shall have some explanation of this matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill simply places the employés in the Government Printing Office upon the same footing, as I understand, with employés in all the other Departments of the Government. In all these other Departments employés get annually thirty days' leave. Heretofore, under the law, employés of the Government Printing Office have received only fifteen days. I can see no objection to placing the employés in the Printing Office upon the same footing with persons employed in other Departments of the Government.

The first amendment reported is to add these words:

Provided, It shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave to those serving fractional parts of a year.

This provision, it seems to me, is manifestly just. An employé may serve six or nine months only, but under the existing law unless he serves for the entire term of twelve months he is not entitled to his leave.

Mr. REED. I may not have understood the amendments correctly, but I thought I caught the idea that they authorize either leave of absence or commutation for leave of absence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is correct; that is provided for in the second amendment.

Mr. REED. What is the object of that?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The second amendment provides—

That to facilitate the public work the Public Printer may, in his discretion, in special cases, credit employés with the amount due them for leave of absence without their actually taking such leave.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman will allow me to inquire whether that is the rule in any other Department of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not prepared to answer the question with full knowledge; but I do not think it is.

Mr. RYAN. I understand it is not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not prepared to make, and do not make, any positive statement on that point. But the gentleman will understand that the arrangements of the Government Printing Office are peculiar in reference to the employment of persons—are different, possibly, from those of almost any other Department. In drawing this amendment, about which I may state the Committee on Printing are not very tenacious, we have simply followed the recommendation of the Public Printer, who states that the interest of the public service will be advanced by the adoption of the amendment. I beg to call attention to the report of the Public Printer, who, on page 12, uses this language:

Under recent decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury, all employés who have received their leave of absence for one year are entitled to pro rata leave for any shorter period thereafter for which they make application. A number of employés discharged in the reduction of force a year ago are now entitled to pro rata leave for longer or shorter periods, but no appropriation exists out of which they can be paid. The amount estimated to be due such employés is $2,500, and I would recommend that Congress make provision for its payment. It would facilitate the public work if Congress would authorize the Public Printer, under special circumstances, to credit employés with the total amount due them for leave of absence without their actually taking such leave. In certain cases employés can not take their leave without embarrassing the work of the office, and it seems a hardship that those who are thus compelled to sacrifice pleasure to public duty should be denied the bounty which Congress has awarded to faithful service in the office. Nor should the office be compelled to forego such special service rather than deprive such employés of any benefits under the act.

In other words, as I understand, the law compels an employé of the Government Printing Office either to take his leave of absence or to lose any benefit he might derive from it. The Public Printer suggests the amendment I have read, and the committee recommend its adoption.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of joint resolution and bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

Joint resolution (S. 13) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States;

A bill (S. 1022) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands in Kansas;

A bill (S. 425) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes;

A bill (S. 23) to authorize Dalles City to construct a bridge across the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington;

A bill (S. 388) for the relief of L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovel, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett;

A bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr.; and

A bill (S. 217) to change the limit of appropriation for a public building at Jacksonville, Fla.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE EMPLOYÉS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resumes the consideration of the report from the Committee on Printing, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know from the chairman of the Committee on Printing if this same feature of the enforcement of taking thirty days' leave of absence does not obtain in all the other Departments of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe it does.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I presume the recommendation of the Public Printer is in order that at certain seasons of the year he may have a continuation of the labor of the men employed in the Government Printing Office. Now, while I am willing, and have been during the times these bills for leave of absence have been discussed on this floor, to grant this to this branch of the service, which does more honest work, I may say, than any other in the city of Washington, yet I question the propriety of placing it in a better or more advantageous position than is suggested by this amendment now proposed.

When the bill granting fifteen days' leave of absence to the employés of the Government Printing Office passed in the Forty-ninth Congress, and the committee presented a report which covered the ground and made the leave of absence equal to thirty days, there was only one contingent matter which came before the Printing Committee of that year, and that was whether Congress would admit of any leave of absence at all. As one of the members of that committee I took a more liberal view, but being overruled by a majority of the committee, I agreed to the proposition of fifteen days. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we only got half the apple for the employés of the Government Printing Office.

Now, the proposition of the Forty-ninth Congress had a better effect, and it is only justice and fair play to the employés in that Government Printing Office that they should be placed on the same footing as the other clerks and employés in other Departments in this city of Washington. For, sir, first of all they are skilled mechanics and experts in their calling, and, added to their skill in mechanics, they are also scholars; from the foreman down they are all required to possess qualities in the discharge of their peculiar duties greater than are required under any civil-service rule adopted for any other Department. More than that, while their work is both intellectual and mechanical it is as hard as that any employé can be called on to perform in any other Department; and while the last Congress granted fifteen days, I think the Forty-ninth Congress would have just as willingly given thirty days. The reasons for so doing are now even stronger than then.

I say it is an anomaly to make a distinction between copyists and clerks in the Treasury or Interior or any other Department of the Government, and yet fix them at thirty days' leave of absence with pay, and take your printers, your skilled mechanics, and the hard workers in this bureau of the Government, and only give them one-half of that time to which by every fair consideration they are entitled.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat let me ask him a question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that this bill would put the employés of the Government Printing Office on the same basis as the clerks in the various Departments.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. What I wish to know is if the clerks in the several Departments of the Government have the benefit of this commutation provision.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is the question I myself asked of the chairman of the committee, and I said in regard to it at the beginning of my remarks that I questioned the judgment of this amendment, which gave an advantage to the employés of this bureau that is enjoyed by no other employés under the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then, as I understand it, this is not a proposition to put the employés of the Government Printing Office on the same basis as the clerks in the several other Departments of the Government, but to give them an additional advantage over the other clerks.

Mr. FARQUHAR. So far as this amendment is concerned. That is, that they shall have pay for the time of this thirty days' leave of absence, provided they do not take it but continue to work over and above the time that they are entitled to under the proper leave of absence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me to make a statement again which I made a short time ago, I think I can make this plain. Under the present law granting leaves of absence to Government employés with pay they get paid for full twelve months, although they work but eleven. Now, I can not see, if in the case of an emergency where the Public Printer thinks the services of the employés in his department are necessary for the full twelve months, as it may be sometimes in expert work or special emergencies, why they should not have the benefit of this leave which is granted to other employés, and give them an additional month's pay for twelve months' work as compensation for it. Especially as the whole matter is left optional with the Public Printer, who would only resort to this practice in the exercise of a sound discretion.

Mr. REED. The only ground for granting a leave of absence of thirty days to anybody must be based on the assumption that the work is so exhausting that a month's rest is required to refresh the man to enable him to perform his duties during the eleven months.

We are giving a gratuity to the employés in the public service for the public benefit, and unless it is done on this ground there can be no other sufficient reason given. That is the reason for giving furloughs to Department employés, and that must be the reason we propose to give it to the employés of the public printing establishment.

Now, then, instead of giving them this furlough, whereby they are to be refreshed, we give them an additional month's pay instead, and require them to work during the whole twelve months; we are not acting upon the principle that has governed us heretofore, but are simply raising the pay of these employés 8 per cent. above what it is now. Is that the intent of the committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will understand, I understand, at least, that in all other Departments of the Government the employés are furloughed for thirty days upon full pay; that is, they work eleven months, and the Government pays them for twelve. In this particular case, that is to say, in reference to the employés of the printing department, they are entitled to but fifteen days' leave upon pay, and this bill will extend the time to thirty days if it passes. The amendment provides that in an emergency—and leaves the determination of that to the Public Printer as to whether it exists or not—he may keep the force at work for twelve months, but give them one extra month's pay to compensate for the furlough of which they have not been able to avail themselves. Emergencies may require this force to be kept at work.

Mr. REED. Then you intend that the employés there shall work twelve months and get thirteen months' pay?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is no more than is done where the employés of other Departments work eleven months and get twelve months' pay under the present law.

Mr. REED. And they lose their month's recreation?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If they see fit they do, or if a contingency shall arise where their work is required. They can take the leave if they wish. It is left entirely discretionary with the Public Printer and the employé. They can take thirty days' leave and get compensation, but if the Public Printer needs their services, and they are willing to work, he is at liberty to keep them at work and give them thirteen months' compensation for the year's work.

I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], who introduced the resolution.

Mr. RYAN. Before that I wish to ask a question for information, if the gentleman will allow me.

Under this proposition of his, if the employés of this department, or an employé of this department, shall work twelve months he will get thirteen months' pay?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; provided the Public Printer says that the emergency exists for employing him the whole twelve months.

Mr. RYAN. If he takes his leave of absence he gets twelve months' pay?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; if he takes his leave under the law as it is now he will work only eleven months and will get twelve months' pay.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Is the Public Printer compelled under the amendment of the committee to employ these men for twelve months, provided the work requires it? Or is it left optional with him?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is left optional with the Public Printer; and he need not retain the man twelve months unless he sees fit. This is only intended to be done in case of an emergency, where the work of the employé is necessary for the public service.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me one other question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is it the intention to extend to the other Departments this principle of thirteen months' pay for twelve months' work?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Maine very well knows that I do not represent in the matter now pending any Department except the printing department. And I will add, I know of no other Department that contemplates such an arrangement.

Mr. REED. Would you be able to resist the argument for equality when that comes up?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think there is a distinction between the employés in the Printing Department, because of the peculiar nature of their work, and those in the other Departments. But that is a matter for the House to decide, and what shall be done in other cases should not now be decided, but should be determined on the merits involved in the case when presented.

Mr. BLAND. Do not the employés in other Departments get extra pay for extra work?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think they do in some cases.

Mr. MATSON. I had the honor to introduce the original proposition which gave fifteen days' leave of absence to employés of the printing department as well as this which extends that leave to thirty days in a fiscal year. The original bill, which was passed nearly two years since, was framed on the recommendation of the then Public Printer. He recommended fifteen days' leave of absence. His recommendation was doubtless made because he supposed there would be opposition to it, and it would be easier to obtain fifteen days' leave than thirty days. It was probably made for fifteen days also because there was some opposition to the measure growing out of the fact that many of these employés were not employed for any period of time, but employed on piece-work, as it was technically termed; so that there was some objection as to whether it was practicable to give any leave at all, and some discussion. But that objection has been dissipated. There can be no objection of that kind now.

Under the administration of the former Public Printer, as well as under the administration of the present one, there has been found no difficulty whatever in administering this law and giving to each one of these employés his proper share of leave.

I introduced the bill in the first instance, and have introduced this one, which doubles the leave of absence, because I believe that of all the employés of the Government these who are in the Government Printing Office are the ones that work most with their hands. They are those who perform manual labor more than any others in any department—at least, in the city of Washington, if not in any other department of the public service anywhere. I believe they are entitled as much as any other employés, if not more, to the rest which the Government gives its employés of thirty days in each year. I therefore pressed that measure, and was glad again in this Congress to introduce the measure now under consideration, because I believed it would meet the almost unanimous approbation of Congress to extend the leave and put these on an equality with the other employés of the Government.

As regards the amendments of the committee, the simple proposition being only to extend the leave to thirty days, I have no objection to those amendments. The proposition that there shall be a pro rata leave to those serving fractional parts of the year I presume will not be seriously objected to.

The other amendment, however, which proposes that if the employé sees fit to work for twelve months he shall be paid for thirteen months, seems to meet with some objection, perhaps from a misapprehension. The principle announced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] was certainly a very sound one, one that can not be attempted to be gainsaid by any one, that this leave is granted in order that these employés may have the rest to fit them for the performance of their duties during the remainder of the year. That of course is the principle on which this leave is granted at all. But if they see fit to work the twelve months, it seems to me there should be no objection to paying them for the month they work. There may be some of them that are well able to work during the twelve months, while there are others that need the rest. It seems to me, therefore, the suggestion of the committee in the way of amendment should not be objected to.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. I understand that many of the employés of the department work by the piece. How can this provision apply to them? Or does it?

Mr. MATSON. I have not given that consideration to the amendment coming from the committee which would enable me to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does not the first amendment answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas when it says it shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave?

Mr. RYAN. I think not. These men are compensated for their services, not by the hour; not by the day; not by the week; not by the month; but by the piece. Now, how does your leave of absence or your commutation clause apply to them at all?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not apply to them unless they are there for the whole year.

Mr. RYAN. Then there is a very large class of employés in the office that get no relief under this provision?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true.

Mr. MATSON. I only want to add to what I have already said, that these amendments proposed by the committee are the result of suggestions made by the Public Printer in his report. I think they have probably grown out of the fact that there was a reduction of wages there several years ago, and possibly this may be an attempt to cure what seemed to the Public Printer at that time to be a wrong. Perhaps there is something in that.

Mr. RYAN. I submit to the gentleman that it would be a great injustice to this class of employés, constituting, as I understand, nearly a majority of the whole, to leave them entirely unprovided for.

Mr. MATSON. I agree with the gentleman from Kansas, that whatever is done for these employés ought to be done impartially, so that all may be treated alike. I hope there will be no unnecessary delay in passing this bill. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that the original bill which I introduced does provide for the piece men. I wish the gentleman to understand that.

Mr. RYAN. That is the question I asked, whether it did provide for them.

Mr. MATSON. It does.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] that that point was discussed at the time, and I think there was no difference of opinion about it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to explain to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] that during the fifteen days' leave of absence the piece work was counted by the former Public Printer in such a manner that the piece hands were put on an equality with those who were hired by the day. That was the way the roll was made up for the fifteen days' leave, and I know no reason why the present Public Printer should not adopt the same plan.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is no other gentleman who desires to be heard——

Mr. RYAN. I do not understand yet, Mr. Speaker, that this bill provides for the piece employés, while the original bill did.

Mr. MATSON. It provides for the extension of time.

Mr. RYAN. Leaving the provisions of the original law in operation?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly; untouched.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield now to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GALLINGER. Five or seven minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, my attention was diverted when this report was read, but I think I have gathered the purport of it pretty correctly from the discussion that has been had here. As I understand it, the report embraces three propositions. First, to increase the leave of absence of the employés of the Government Printing Office from fifteen to thirty days; next, to allow them pay for that thirty days provided they choose to work, thus giving them thirteen months' pay for twelve months' work; and third, to permit those who are discharged before the year expires a pro rata allowance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that so far as I am concerned I very cordially recognize the justice of the first proposition to increase the leave from fifteen to thirty days. Next, it occurs to me that it would be violative of good business judgment and of the purpose of this House, in granting the leave of absence to these employés, to permit them to work twelve months and receive thirteen months' pay. The House will recall the fact that two or three days ago the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Printing made the remarkable statement that the present Public Printer was getting more work out of 2,000 men than the former Public Printer got out of 2,400 men. As I understand the matter, the late Public Printer compelled the employés—certainly at least during the last year of his term—to take this leave of absence; but the present Public Printer proposes to let them continue to work and draw their pay; and the next thing we shall hear from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Printing will be that 1,800 employés are doing more work under the present administration than 2,500 did under the late Public Printer. I am opposed to this proposition on that ground, and I am opposed to it also on the broader ground that it is violative of the purpose of the House in granting this leave of absence. Now, Mr. Speaker, in relation to this pro rata allowance, I desire to propound a question to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Printing.

As I understand the case, Judge Durham, the Comptroller, decided that the men who were discharged from the Government Printing Office who had served a portion of the year were entitled to an allowance of one and a quarter days' pay per month. As I understand further, there are perhaps twelve or fifteen hundred of those men who were employed under the late Public Printer who have been turned out of that office, and who, although they have the opinion of Judge Durham that they are entitled to this allowance, have been kept out of it for twelve long months, and when they apply to the present Public Printer they are met with a stern and positive refusal. That refusal, as I understand, is put upon the ground that there is no appropriation to meet this deficit or to pay these men what is due them. Now, I want to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Printing if he has taken into consideration the rights and the wants of these men, and if any means have been taken by him, or by any member of this House, to his knowledge, to see that a proper allowance is made, through some deficiency appropriation, to meet the obligations of the Government to these poor men who have been turned out of office simply because they happen to be Republicans. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know that such a proceeding was incumbent upon me more than upon any other member. Has the gentleman himself taken any steps of that kind?

Mr. GALLINGER. I hold in my hands two decisions or opinions of Judge Durham. He says:

> I have heretofore decided that all employés who may have served one year continuously in the Government Printing Office prior to the 1st day of July, 1886, were on that day entitled to fifteen days' leave of absence. I have further decided that they are entitled also to one and one-fourth days' leave for each month that they have or shall serve in that office after the 1st day of July, 1886.

Now, as I understand the matter——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit that the gentleman does not read all that Judge Durham says. He says that the Public Printer has stated that the amount appropriated for that purpose has been exhausted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly. I stated that fact. The question I raised was whether any steps had been taken or any movement made to obtain any deficieney appropriation or other allowance, so that these twelve or fifteen hundred men may receive what is justly their due.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have taken no steps of that kind, but it is perfectly competent for the gentleman to go to the Committee on Appropriations and ask such an appropriation. He has the same right to do so that I have, and it is as much his duty to do so as mine. Why has not he done it? I never heard of it until this morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. We desire to do something which will compel the Government, under a Democratic administration and Democratic auspices, to pay to these twelve hundred or fifteen hundred men who have been turned out of the Government Printing Office during the present administration the amounts to which they are entitled. I am speaking in the interest of fair dealing. I say that if an allowance of the kind now proposed is to be made, then, in justice to these poor people who were turned out of employment and driven out into the streets of Washington simply because they did not agree politically with the present administration, we ought in the first place to pay them the money due them before we pass any law giving this allowance to the men who have been put in the Government Printing Office under the existing administration.

This is a matter of pure and simple justice. There are twelve hundred or fifteen hundred men to whom the Government to-day owes this money; and I say some means ought to be taken to pay them their honest dues to which they are justly entitled under the decision of Comptroller Durham, before we pass any law giving these allowances to men who have succeeded them in that office.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not desire to enter into any political discussion here to-day. I do not understand——

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] whether he has ever introduced any bill for the relief of these discharged employés or has gone before any committee asking an appropriation in their behalf?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can answer the gentleman by saying that I have not, because my attention had not been called to this matter until this very morning; but the chairman of the Committee on Printing had his attention called to it long ago.

Mr. BLAND. I do not understand it is the duty of the Committee on Printing any more than of the gentleman from New Hampshire to take charge of all the discharged employés of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would like to answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. RICHARDSON. In reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, I wish to say that I do not see any use of our boiling over in political excitement to-day over this question. It seems to be a matter of absolute imposibility to mention on this floor the Government Printing Office without exciting the gentleman from New Hampshire and a few others to such an extent that they fly into a fearful rage. Now, in this matter we have nothing to do with politics. This is not a political question, but is one of business and of doing justice to faithful employés. It seems to me that the complaint which the gentleman makes that a few Republicans have been turned out of office by an honest Democratic official is a matter which gentlemen should cease crying over, because it is a matter which was settled at the polls in November, 1884, when the people in their majesty decided that all Republican employés ought to go and honest Democrats take their places. [Applause.]

Mr. RYAN. But your President, when asking the people's votes, told them that these employés should not go.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; these employés are not protected by civil-service rules. Let us not bring politics here every day. Let us settle a question of this kind on business principles, if we can. This is a simple matter of doing justice to employés in the public service. The law which we propose is not intended to apply simply for a day or a week or a year. We are undertaking in our wisdom, or it may be our unwisdom, to frame laws which, if good, will continue in force for more than one administration. I do not want to see politics dragged into this question; and I hope gentlemen will not indulge in any further partisan discussion upon it.

I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of granting the additional fifteen days' leave of absence provided for in this proposition. But I am opposed to this system of violating the principle involved in the eight-hour law. My idea for the passage of the eight-hour law is that the hours of work shall be shortened. This is a proposition to pay men to extend their hours of labor. Now, if you wish to be consistent in carrying out the principle involved in the eight-hour law, you must not provide payment to men for overtime, whether ten, twelve, or fourteen hours in one day, or whether it is forcing them to work fully twelve months in the year, thus employing fewer men to do the work than would otherwise be required and thus throwing other men into the labor market for the purpose of cutting down the price of labor. I shall, therefore, oppose the proposition, except so far as to extend the leave for thirty days.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will yield to me before he calls for the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will now yield for two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR].

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to correct the misapprehension created in the House by the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and which I am sure he did not mean to convey in what he said. I will read from the report of the Public Printer the following paragraph, which will explain the matter to the satisfaction of the entire House:

> Under recent decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury, all employés who have received their leave of absence for one year are entitled to pro rata leave for any shorter period thereafter for which they make application. A number of employés discharged in the reduction of force a year ago are now entitled to pro rata leave for longer or shorter periods, but no appropriation exists out of which they can be paid. The amount estimated to be due such employés is $2,500, and I would recommend that Congress make provision for its payment.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the whole question. I think the misapprehension came from the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that the Public Printer has desired to withhold this pro rata. Now, the official statement of the Public Printer is that there were not sufficient funds to pay those men when they were discharged. He asks from Congress sufficient money to meet that deficit. I think it is only justice to the Public Printer that this fact should be stated publicly in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in further answer on the same point indicated, the gentleman from New York is entirely correct. I know that the Public Printer has said to these men that the appropriation has been exhausted and there is no way in which this deficit can be supplied and these men paid the amount they claim unless this House makes an appropriation for that purpose. The gentleman from New Hampshire can assist in this work if he chooses.

I will now demand the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me before he demands the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. For how long?

Mr. SPRINGER. For two minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield to the gentleman for that length of time.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New Hampshire made the statement in reference to these charges against the Public Printer that the discharges from the Government Printing Office were of Republican employés. Now, sir, it is a fact, when Mr. Benedict came into the Government Printing Office, in September, 1886, he found that the appropriation for carrying on that office during the fiscal year had been largely exhausted by his predecessor, and that it was therefore necessary, to keep within the limit of the appropriation, that the force of employés should be largely reduced. And he did reduce the force of employés of the Government Printing Office to the extent of two hundred or three hundred in number. Now, in making that reduction he called upon the heads of divisions to name those employés whose services could be dispensed with with the least injury to the public service, at the same time calling attention to the requirement of the statute in reference to Union soldiers and their widows and orphan children. In making that discharge he acted entirely on the recommendation of the heads of divisions, who were Republicans and the appointees of his predecessor.

Mr. BLAND. There were no Democrats to turn out.

Mr. SPRINGER. My friend from Missouri says there were no Democrats there to be turned out. But I believe there were, although few in number, and therefore, according to the number of Republicans and Democrats, there were more Democrats turned out than Republicans.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to say a word in reply.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to have this matter again run into a political discussion on this floor, and therefore I believe I must insist on the demand for the previous question.

The question was put on ordering the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 106.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask for a separate vote on the amendments.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

Add as follows:

"Provided, It shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave to those serving fractional parts of a year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was read, as follows:

Add these words:

"And further to facilitate the public work, the Public Printer may, in his discretion, in special cases, credit employés with the amount due them for leave of absence without their actually taking such leave."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

Mr. CULBERSON. Inasmuch as but four minutes of this hour remain, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered as having now expired.

Mr. BLAND. I object.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit that under the ruling of the Chair this committee, if it now takes the floor, will be concluded in four minutes, instead of having a full hour to-day.

Mr. BLAND. I do not wish to put the gentleman in that position, and hence withdraw my objection. I will ask consent of the House that the hour be extended.

Mr. BRUMM. I object.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 24, noes 62.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be now considered as exhausted. That will relieve the difficulty.

Mr. SPRINGER. It wants but two minutes of the time now.

There was no objection to the request of Mr. PERKINS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Regular order!

JOEL J. GOSS.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2056) for the relief of Joel J. Goss; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On yesterday, by mistake, I sent up what I thought was this report, but I found it to be a bill of the Forty-ninth Congress. I ask consent to withdraw that report.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SUPERINTENDENTS, RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6439) authorizing the appointment of eleven division superintendents of the railway mail service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER NEAR OMAHA.

Mr. MCSHANE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6440) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Omaha, Nebr.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MONTHLY PAYMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. MCSHANE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6441) to secure monthly payments in the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6442) for the relief of officers in the Army who have served continuously in one grade for twenty-one years; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS OHIO RIVER.

Mr. LAFFOON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6443) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near the cities of Hawesville, in the State of Kentucky, and Cannelton, in the State of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

READING RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the special order fixed on yesterday to begin at the end of the hour for the consideration of bills to-day, and the Clerk will report the resolution submitted by the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to investigate all the circumstances connected with the alleged interruption of traffic on the Reading Railroad, and report the facts and their conclusions to Congress, and to exercise their power, if deemed necessary, in the interest of commerce between the States.

Mr. CLARDY. I would like to have the original resolution read, for which this is a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby empowered and directed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure by the Reading Railroad Company to transport such traffic, and to report to the House by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations and service as a common carrier of interstate commerce. Said investigation may be made by a subcommittee at such place as it shall deem proper, and the said committee or subcommittee is hereby authorized to send for and examine persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to employ a messenger and stenographer; and the expenses of such investigation, not to exceed $5,000, are hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], which has just been read, believing that there ought to be at least a prima facie showing of the truth of the statements contained in the resolution before recommending its adoption, instituted an inquiry which resulted in satisfying a majority of that committee that the resolution ought not to be passed. The facts as the committee, or a majority of the committee, understand them are, in brief, as follows: In the month of December last, and I believe on the 18th day of that month, there arrived at Port Richmond certain cars loaded with flour consigned to the Philadelphia Grain Elevator Company. The employés of the Reading Railroad Company in charge of the company's yard at Port Richmond refused to transfer the cars to the elevator company; and that fact coming to the knowledge of the railroad officials, the general manager issued an order addressed to the superintendent of the company, requiring him to cause the removal of the cars and to discharge such men as refused to aid in their removal.

A number of men—five crews, it is stated—were in turn discharged because of their disobedience to the orders of the superintendent, whereupon the representatives of the labor organizations to which those gentlemen belonged declared a strike, and the employés of the Reading Railroad, to the number of over twenty-five hundred, quit the service of the company. In a few days thereafter the strike was declared off, I believe; anyhow the railroad company continued to do its accustomed business, employing new hands in some instances and in other instances taking back the old ones.

That the statement of facts I have made is a correct one I think I can satisfy the House. On the 1st day of January last the men in the employ of the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company, a corporation whose stock I am informed is owned largely, if not entirely, by stockholders of the Reading Railroad Company, quit the service of that company because of an alleged violation of an agreement respecting the compensation which they were to receive. A short time afterward Mr. Corbin, the president of the Reading Railroad Company, published a card addressed to the public, in which he stated the facts that I have stated in regard to what is known as the railroad strike, and then entered upon a discussion of the miners' strike, as it is called. To this card of Mr. Corbin a joint committee of the miners and laborers of Reading and vicinity caused to be published counter-statements in which they deny specifically the statements of Mr. Corbin in regard to the miners' strike, but left undenied what he said about the railroad strike. To this counter-statement Mr. Corbin published a rejoinder in which he incidentally referred to the railroad strike, and in reply to this rejoinder the labor committee published another letter, which opens with the following statement:

Of the railroad matter we have little to nothing to say. For that is not, and has not been made by any one with authority to speak for the miners, an issue.

The Committee on Commerce had no testimony before them showing that interstate traffic had been interrupted on the Reading road a week, a day, or an hour, if we except the interruption at Port Richmond, caused by the refusal of the men to obey the lawful orders of the superintendent. On the contrary, it appears affirmatively that there has been no sort of interference or interruption with interstate traffic or any other traffic on the line of this road.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I presume it was not in the mind of the mover of the resolution at the outset that we should investigate anything but the result of that strike upon interstate commerce, there was a statement made to the committee that the Reading Railroad Company in making what are called its allotments of cars to the various mining companies in the Schuylkill and Lehigh regions discriminates in favor of some companies and against others, never forgetting the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company; that in fact the railroad company, for a series of years, has given undue preferences to the corporation to which I have just referred.

I know that railroad companies do not "walk in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord blameless," and I conclude that this may be true.

But the majority of the Committee on Commerce, Mr. Speaker, believe that there is a statute that affords all the remedies that can be afforded by any statute that may be passed at the instance of any committee appointed by this House. They believe that any of the persons aggrieved, knocking at the door of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in whose integrity and ability the whole country has confidence, can secure the relief to which they are entitled. The third section of that act provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular persons, company, firm, corporation, or locality, etc.

The application may be made by the complainants to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or they may go into the United States courts at Philadelphia, and there, too, they will realize the truth of the maxim, "Wherever there is a right there is a remedy."

The minority of the committee state that the Reading Railroad Company and the Iron and Coal Company, to which I have referred, while having different names, are in fact one and the same corporation; or, in other words, as I said in the outset, that the owners of the stock of the Reading Railroad Company are the owners of the stock of the Coal and Iron Company. If that be true, and if it be true, as recited in the minority report, that the railroad company is in that regard violating its charter and acting in contravention to the constitution of Pennsylvania, then they ought to go into the courts of Pennsylvania and secure, as they would be able to secure, a forfeiture of the charter of the company.

What is to prevent them from proceeding by a writ of quo warranto against the corporation if it has abused its charter privileges as they claim? Their forum is in Pennsylvania, not in Congress. But, Mr. Speaker, while they claim that these organizations are one and the same thing, yet at the same time it is claimed that they are distinct entities, and that they have conspired together in order to affect the price of coal. If that be true, then the resolution adopted by the House the other day, authorizing the Committee on Manufactures to investigate questions of "trusts" and all manner of combinations and conspiracies, would be applicable to this case, and I trust that it will not be the disposition of this House to make another investigating committee of the Committee on Commerce. I think one investigating committee during the session will be about all that we shall be able to stand. I do not believe that an investigation should be ordered, but if the House determine to do otherwise, I trust that a special committee may be selected. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask my colleague one question, if he will permit me.

Mr. CLARDY. I will.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that this corporation is operating in coal and iron. Now, coal and iron being protected by the tariff come under the revenue laws, and I want to ask my colleague whether that does not give us jurisdiction to inquire how it is that protection enables these corporations to dominate labor?

Mr. CLARDY. In reply to my colleague, I will say that, like himself, I had presumed that there was a duty on anthracite coal, and I had constructed an argument, a right good one, on that presumption, but

I found upon examination that there was no duty at all upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. And this is not an iron company, either.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, I think that when the House fully understands the two reports that have come in from the committee, it will find no difficulty in adopting the minority report. I do not believe, for one, in any half-way measures upon this subject. I am very frank to say that when monopoly combines to drive the ranks of labor to starvation's point, labor has an equal right by every natural law of justice to combine and strike for living wages. The Reading Railroad Company can pool its interests with other roads to crush and grind the yeomanry of toil, but when the men upon whose bent bodies and bowed shoulders this great enterprise has been constructed and sustained are on their knees begging for bread, we are told that their ranks must scatter and disintegrate at the bidding of a lordly clan, who have organized an infamous "trust" to control the prices of articles of consumption and to corner the markets of this land. I utter this not in the spirit of demagogism, because I have neither the arts nor the aspirations of a demagogue. I utter it because I believe it to be the living truth. I am the mortal foe of violence in all its forms, but I am the friend of labor and of its sovereign power, ordained by nature, that by every peaceful method it may assert and vindicate its rights.

The Reading mines are closed, and why? Because, as has been properly stated here, the company has violated a solemn compact that it had made with its employés, and now commands them to surrender, threatening that otherwise it will proclaim to the consuming public of America that that great channel of commerce shall be closed, and not a ton of traffic shall be freighted over it. In other words, this corporation says to them, "We will unite the Lehigh and the Schuylkill mines, and we will so appreciate the price of this commodity, coal, that the overwhelming power of public necessity, speaking from every hearth and fireside of this country, shall drive you to your dens." Shall this be done? I, for one, say never. Have we the power here beyond the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to bring this great monopoly to bay? I say that we have. I say that under the power to regulate commerce between the States this body has the right to pursue this investigation as an independent body, and I am sustained by an unbroken current of authorities and decisions, from the case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, in 9 Wheaton, to the last case, of Texas vs. The Telegraph Company, in 105 U. S. Reports, in support of this elementary proposition of constitutional law. Now, gentlemen, I will ask you to give your attention to what I am about to say, because I shall occupy only five minutes more of your time.

Do you know that the constitution of Pennsylvania prescribes in express terms that this company has no right to carry on a mining business? Let me read a paragraph from the constitution of that State, and then observe what a fraud this company is practicing to-day upon the consumers of this country. I read:

> No incorporated company doing the business of common carrier shall directly or indirectly prosecute or engage in mining; nor shall any such company directly or indirectly engage in any other business than that of common carriers.

What does the Reading Road do to evade that provision? It has incorporated a legal company, known as the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company, managed by the same directors, officered by the same president, controlled by the same agents and the same superintendents as the Reading Railroad Company, and under the mask of this legal fiction, that railroad company is now violating the constitution of the State that chartered and created it. But this is not all. Let me call your attention to a most remarkable feature in connection with this controversy, which I think will somewhat surprise the learned chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAYNER. If you will give me five minutes uninterrupted, you can put me through a civil-service examination on this business. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only want to ask you a question.

Mr. RAYNER. Just give me five minutes first.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only wanted to ask the gentleman a civil question, directly in the line of his argument.

Mr. RAYNER. All right. Ask your question, then.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the Reading Railroad is a company chartered under the laws of Pennsylvania, and if it has deviated from the business which is authorized by that charter in the direction in which you have indicated, would not a proceeding in quo warranto in the courts of Pennsylvania be the proper remedy?

Mr. RAYNER. Oh, yes! The courts of Pennsylvania are in the habit of granting these writs of quo warranto! We know too much about the courts of Pennsylvania——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that the courts of Pennsylvania used the writ of quo warranto thirty or forty years ago, and were probably the first courts in the United States to use it. As long ago as I have stated that writ was granted on the application of William M. Meredith, one of the greatest lawyers of his time—no greater lawyer ever lived. I am referring the gentleman to the history of the law of the country as to writs of quo warranto.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We had Democratic judges then.

Mr. RAYNER. The history of the law is in the law books. I wish to call attention to a point which we think decisive in favor of the opinion of the minority in this case. I am not referring to general principles, but I propose to give you a case in which this very road that we are now seeking to investigate was the complainant. I refer to the case of the State of Pennsylvania vs. The Reading Railroad Company, reported in the Supreme Court decisions, 15 Wallace. Mr. Gowen, who was then the distinguished counsel of the Reading Railroad Company, and afterwards its president, came into court and claimed that the Reading Railroad Company was not a State corporation, that it was a carrier of commerce between the States, that the State of Pennsylvania had no right to tax its freights, that Congress alone could do so in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce between the States. That was Mr. Gowen's argument; it was the company's argument. Now let me give you the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this question, delivered by Mr. Justice Strong:

> The transportation of freight is a constituent part of commerce itself. Hence a statute imposing a tax upon freight taken up within the State and carried out of it, or taken up without the State and brought within it, is repugnant to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States which ordains that Congress shall have the right to regulate commerce between the States.

When this company is called into the courts of Pennsylvania to pay its tax as a company deriving its rights from the sovereignty of that State, it goes into the courts and says, "The State of Pennsylvania has no power over us; Congress alone can deal with us, because we are a carrier of commerce between the States." And now when we are seeking to investigate this traffic it says to us, "You have no power as Congress over us because we are a State corporation claiming our rights from the sovereignty of Pennsylvania."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will let me ask him a question, I will give him a corresponding portion of my own time. I only wish to ask him right here whether he knows that any of these corporations are seeking to prevent this investigation—whether he has any evidence of it?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir; we have the evidence here of 82,000 starving men turned out of employment in the dead of winter with families dependent upon them for sustenance. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the gentleman as to that. I asked him whether he knows that the Reading Railroad Company, or the Reading Coal and Iron Company, are seeking to prevent this investigation. I say for one, they are not.

Mr. RAYNER. Then why not allow the investigation? If they are not seeking to prevent it, why not pass this proposition?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; we will pass it. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYNER. If you will pass it, then I am done. The only reason I am discussing this proposition is because I fear you may not pass it. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I want but two minutes more and then I will sit down. We shall have plenty of time to vote.

Mr. BRUMM. The question is not yet in a shape to be voted upon.

Mr. RAYNER. Before sitting down I want to say one other word to the House. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is entitled to his hour.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, this proposed reference of the question to the Interstate Commerce Commission will amount to nothing. You might as well refer it to the Chinese embassy or to the Public Printer; you would get it back again just as soon. [Laughter and applause.] What is the use of my friend talking about knocking at the doors of the Interstate Commerce Commission? You may knock there until the day of judgment. They never take up a case ex mero motu. It is proposed that we request the Interstate Commission to pass upon this question—not command them to do so, but politely request them. By the time they will have done with it these men will all have starved to death.

Let us investigate this subject; let us trace the trouble to the fountain-head. Let us discover, as I believe we shall, that this is a conspiracy of capital, not of labor; and when we have done this, let us at once apply the most heroic remedies that legislation can devise to break up these infernal systems which, under the deceptive form of "trusts," are now overshadowing the prosperous homes and the business centers of this country. I know that it is a hard fight. I know that monopoly, utterly unscrupulous as to the methods it employs, is an enemy terrible to encounter.

It lies in ambush, and under the cover of darkness its poisoned shafts fall thick and fast. But let me say to my friends that, within my humble experience, I have never yet seen the day in the halls of legislation when honor that has no price and manhood that knows no fear could not drive it like a skulking coward from the field of battle. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARDY. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for ten minutes.

Mr. RAYNER. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, both the majority and minority of this committee desire to ask for an investigation, and it is only a question of method in order to secure the fairest, most intelligent, and most searching inquiry and the best results. I wish to state now that no request was made, during all the discussions of this committee, from any interest or person directly interested, for action by Congress.

It was rather singular that, upon the very day when these reports were made, a committee claiming to represent 85,000 people presented a petition asking for an investigation.

Now, every member of this House represents a constituency of about 170,000 persons, and in a general sense he represents a constituency of 60,000,000, but he would hardly feel like signing a petition for all those citizens, and I very much doubt whether the 85,000 miners and railroad employés of Pennsylvania have placed their consciences and their judgments in the keeping of any committee.

The petition appears before this House coincident with the action of this committee, and while I do not charge that it has been suggested by any member of this committee, or any member of the House, it is at least a reasonable inference that it has been the result of a parliamentary rather than a business exigency.

But, sir, all this is immaterial to the issue, inasmuch as we all desire an investigation. A majority of the committee object to an investigation by Congress because we do not believe a committee representing Congress is the body to investigate a subject of this character.

I yield to no man in my respect for Congress when in the performance of its legitimate functions as the popular branch of the law-making power of the country, or as the custodian for a hundred years, and it is to be hoped for many centuries to come, of the rights and interests of the American people.

But its constitution and character unfit it for such an investigation as this should be. Congress is a political body, made up of two political parties whose antagonism is emphasized at this time, and its proceedings must inevitably partake more or less of a partisan character, and will just to that extent be impaired in value. An investigating committee of the House will be subject to the same infirmity. Its members will be made up of each political party, and there will probably be two reports antagonizing and neutralizing each other.

The history of the Congressional investigation during the last Congress of the strike on the Southwestern railroads illustrates this fact. The committee had a most important subject to consider—a railroad disturbance which involved an immense system of railroads and an interruption of interstate commerce throughout the country, and which was associated with violence, riot, and bloodshed.

It was a subject which required probing to the bottom, and a committee of this House was appointed for the purpose; the distinguished war governor of Pennsylvania, Mr. Curtin, was its chairman; another member of the committee is a distinguished member of this Congress [Mr. BURNES]; the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], whose massive frame typifies his sturdy and vigorous intellect, was also a member of that committee. That committee spent much time which would have been valuable to this House, their constituents, and the country in the investigation of this matter. Did they come to any conclusion? Did they throw any light on this subject? None whatever.

It is remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that they came absolutely to no conclusion, and I can not characterize their action better than in the language of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] in his report, a paragraph of which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

If ever there was occasion presented in which the whole problem of railroad transportation, the powers and duties of common carriers and their relation to the public, the power of the General Government to compel the carrier to transport interstate commerce, and the extent, if any, to which it may, in the exercise of that power, lay its hand upon the carrier, and the employés of such carrier, through Federal legislation, came up legitimately for discussion, it was the occasion in hand. No such discussion is had. But little, if any, consideration of the existence or character of the power of the Federal Government in the premises, and no discussion of the extent to which such power, if it exists, might be safely used, nor of the means by which it might be exercised, appears in the report.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. That report was made a whole year afterwards.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was made thus late not through any fault of the minority of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, after all this blaze we had a right to expect something better than ashes, or the unsightly and blackened embers of a dead controversy; but that was all we had. We had no advice, no policy suggested, no remedy proposed. I do not blame the committee for this, because, as I have already said, it was composed of gentlemen who were among the very ablest members of this body. It was the fault of their construction. They obeyed the law of their being, and could not escape from their environment, and consequently that investigation had no result.

Mr. BURNES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to be oblivious to the fact that when that committee reached the Mississippi River the governors of three States were in consultation, unable to devise a proper remedy to quiet the excitement and suppress the disturbances then existing. Commerce was paralyzed; cities of that country were without business or life; railroad trains were stopped, and men were in the throes of anger and distress, were practically under arms. He seems to forget the fact that within twenty-four hours after the arrival of this committee in the city of St. Louis peace was restored and commerce made free. [Applause.] He seems to be oblivious to the fact that the committee, with the illustrious war governor at its head, made serious and earnest recommendations in its report to the House, after detailing all the facts and circumstances, which recommendations——

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the gentleman will not occupy the floor longer in my time. I yielded to the gentleman for a moment, not for a speech.

Mr. BURNES. I will yield to the gentleman out of my time. I say he seems to have forgotten the fact that this committee, in summing up all the evidence taken upon that occasion, added a recommendation to the House and the country——

Mr. DAVIS. I must object to the gentleman entering into a vindication of the committee in my time.

Mr. BURNES. I only desire to say, with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts and in response to his own statement, that the committee alluded to recommended seriously and solemnly to Congress to place every railroad employé under the control of the Government, as the employés of steam-boats carrying interstate commerce on navigable rivers and the high seas are placed by existing law.

Mr. DAVIS. I will give the Clerk time to read the paragraph out of the brief time allotted to me, if the gentleman from Missouri will point out the page of this report on which any recommendation occurs.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to state, as a member of the minority of that committee, that I never agreed to any such recommendation.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be obliged to the gentleman from Missouri if he will point out any paragraph in this report, which is now at his service for that purpose, where such a recommendation occurs. The gentleman pointed it out to me as he thought, but I could not find it, and I do not think that any member of this House can find it.

The report was a nullity, and it is for this reason that we desire another tribunal. We desire a tribunal of a judicial character which can calmly investigate, in a judicial manner, all the facts and circumstances connected with this strike. We have such a tribunal created by the last Congress; a tribunal which has amply justified its existence, because it has dealt most ably, and to a great extent successfully, with the great problem of transportation over the complex system of railroads in all parts of this country, numbering now over 130,000 miles in extent.

It has brought order out of chaos, and substituted amicable competition for destructive rivalry. An investigation of this character, as will be shown by an examination of the twelfth section of the act creating that commission, is already within its province and could be proceeded with and a report made to Congress which, it seems to me, would embody some general suggestions for future action as well as a remedy for present troubles.

If the present strike terminates promptly, still there are great questions to be considered, and some proper and efficient policy for the future evoked from the existing condition of things, on a full consideration of all the circumstances. There should be some remedy for these frequent disturbances which will at the same time protect the rights and guard the interests of labor. No class need quiet and freedom from these conflicts between capital and labor, which check production and obstruct the channels of trade and commerce, more than the workingmen of the country. Such interruptions always affect their interests first and most seriously.

I yield to no man in my sympathy for the workingmen of our country. My life has been spent among them in one of our busiest cities, and my professional avocations have brought me into the closest relations with them in their hours of trial, sickness, suffering, sorrow, and poverty. I have closely observed for many years the struggle between labor and capital in that city, famous for its strikes, some of them bitter and prolonged to the injury of both parties; and, sir, I have seen and hailed with joy the gradual approach to a better policy, which I now believe to be firmly established.

Within a fortnight a committee representing the manufacturers of Fall River have met a committee of the operatives employed in the fifty mills of that city, and have agreed upon a schedule of prices which provides for a satisfactory advance of wages now, and also a sliding scale to be adapted to future conditions of the market. Fall River having first learned in the school of bitter experience the lesson of mutual concession and compromise, has now the honor of teaching it to her sister manufacturing cities, who will not be slow to learn the same lesson.

Our railroads must at some time adopt a similar policy. Meantime let us have this investigation in some form—let it be colorless, impartial, judicial, and complete. Let us have a report from the commission, which shall present the facts and their conclusions, and which may suggest safe and beneficent legislation.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, out of deference to what seems to be the wish of the House to order this investigation I want to say, and I think I speak for the majority of the Committee on Commerce, that if the gentlemen representing the minority will so amend their resolution as to take the committee from the House, so far as we are concerned, we will withdraw all opposition.

Mr. BRUMM. That is all we want.

Mr. RAYNER. We will amend our resolution accordingly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will offer, Mr. Speaker, this amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. It is intended as a substitute for the existing substitute, and in order that it shall come within the parliamentary rules, I shall put it in the form of a motion to strike out of the substitute proposed by the chairman of the committee all after the word "resolved" and insert before that word the preamble which I send to the desk, to be followed by the resolution accompanying it.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas when the resolution is read to call the previous question.

Mr. CLARDY. I have not yielded for that purpose. I retain the floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is authoritatively alleged that a certain unlawful combination has been formed between sundry corporations and individuals for the purpose of unduly raising the price of anthracite coal, and in pursuance of said purpose have forced a lockout, whereby they have prevented the mining and shipping of coal from the Schuylkill and Lehigh regions, thereby entailing great suffering and distress among thousands of our people, and clogging the wheels of commerce: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a special committee of five members of the House of Representatives be appointed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure of the Reading Railroad Company to transport such commerce, and to report to the House, by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations to serve as a common carrier of interstate commerce, and to investigate all the facts in relation to this matter, and to report the same to the House with such recommendations as the committee may agree upon; and that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and at such places as it may find necessary, to employ a stenographer, to administer oaths, examine witnesses, compel the attendance of persons, and the production of books and papers; and the expenses of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CLARDY. I adhere to my proposition and ask that the original proposition may be reported; I mean the proposition reported by the minority of the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question as to how any further time in discussing this subject is to be given out. There are some members of the committee who want to say a word.

Mr. CLARDY. Not wishing to interrupt my friend from Pennsylvania, I will say that I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That will be acceptable to us.

Mr. RANDALL. The best speech the friends of this proposition can listen to is a vote of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Might not the chairman of the committee consent that the special committee should comprise more than five members? I think myself this is the proper solution of the subject, to have an investigation by a committee of the House rather than by a portion of the Committee on Commerce. Let the Speaker of the House select the committee, but let it comprise seven or nine members. And then let the investigation be started at an early day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] calls for the reading of the resolution reported by the minority of the committee. Is there objection to considering as pending the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas which has now been read?

Mr. CLARDY. I object. I ask to have the resolution reported by the minority read.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to know what is the exact position taken in this matter by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CLARDY. I am now calling for the reading of the resolution reported by the minority. I said out of deference to what seemed the sentiment of the House, I spoke, I thought, for the majority of the Committee on Commerce when I said that I would assent to the appointment of a committee, if it was a special committee; and if the resolution reported by the minority was amended in that regard I thought there would be no objection to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] calls for the reading of the minority resolution.

Mr. RAYNER. I am willing that the minority report shall be amended as suggested. That report as it stands is in favor of the original resolution offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which sends the investigation to the Committee on Commerce. I am willing to accept the proposition on the part of the minority if other gentlemen agree with me to send the investigation to a special committee, adopting a resolution to that effect without any preambles or whereases.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to ask one question. If the report of the minority be adopted, amended as suggested, leaving the investigation to a special committee—the number I do not care about—will not that limit the examination to the railroad company alone?

Mr. CLARDY. I think not.

Mr. BRUMM. Let the resolution of the minority be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby empowered and directed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure by the Reading Railroad Company to transport such traffic, and to report to the House, by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations and service as a common carrier of interstate commerce.

Said investigation may be made by a subcommittee at such places as it shall deem proper, and the said committee or subcommittee is hereby authorized to send for and examine persons, books, and papers, to administer the oath to witnesses, and to employ a messenger and a stenographer; and the expenses of such investigation, not to exceed $5,000, are hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. RAYNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "Committee on Commerce" and insert "a special committee of five members."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I also call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland to the fact that in the following paragraph there should be stricken out the words "by a subcommittee," and in the next line the words "or subcommittee."

Mr. WEAVER. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that it would be better for him to insist on his own resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, which is this: I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] to consider as pending the substitute which I offered, which was first read. That, I think, was the statement of the Chair at the time; and I would like to suggest this to the gentleman, that the House first take a vote upon the substitute, the preamble and resolution which I offered, and, if that be voted down, that we then take the vote upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is pending.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think if the Chair will look at the record he will find that the gentleman yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CLARDY. I yielded in order to have the amendment read. Now I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas that I am willing to accept any amendment enlarging the powers of the committee, but I do not think that the preamble to the resolution should stand.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Very well. If I withdraw the preamble will the gentleman then accept the substitute?

Mr. CLARDY. I think I will. Let us have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of five of the House of Representatives be appointed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure by the Reading Railroad to transport such commerce, and to report to the House by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations to serve as a common carrier of interstate commerce; and to investigate all the facts in relation to this matter, and report the same to the House with such recommendations as the committee may agree upon; and that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, etc.

Mr. BRUMM. With the preamble stricken out the resolution does not affect the miners at all. If the gentleman will consent to include the miners we will withdraw all objection.

Mr. CLARDY. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inquire whether this is intended to be a substitute for the original or for the substituted resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the Chair please state whether the original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and reported back, is before the House, or whether the question before the House is the resolution which was reported as a substitute by the majority of the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the original resolution is before the House, but the vote must first be taken on the substitute reported by the committee.

The Chair understands that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has now pending an amendment to the substitute. Does the gentleman withdraw that amendment?

Mr. RAYNER. If it does not meet the approval of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] I will withdraw it. I do not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I want to hear from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] on this subject.

Mr. CLARDY. There is objection. If this investigation is to be made, I trust that the committee will have power to go to the bottom of the whole matter.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is what we want.

Mr. CLARDY. I suggest, therefore, that an amendment be inserted including the Iron and Coal Company.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. All right.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I think I can suggest an amendment which will meet the case. I propose to amend the resolution so as to read in this way:

Resolved, That a special committee of five of the House of Representatives be appointed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure by the Reading Railroad to transport such commerce, and to report to the House by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations to serve as a common carrier of interstate commerce, and to investigate all the facts in relation to the mining companies and individual miners of anthracite coal in connection therewith, etc.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] will give his attention, I think I can suggest a proposition in the nature of an amendment which, added to the resolution of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] will constitute the better part of this proposition. The controversy between the railroad company and its employés is but one branch of the inquiry. The much more important controversy is in relation to the difficulties which exist between the coal corporations and the miners. The case of the miners, in my judgment, is a vast deal stronger than the case of the employés of the railroad company, and I therefore suggest that the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas be amended by adding these words:

And, further, to investigate the existing difficulties in the Schuylkill and Lehigh coal regions of Pennsylvania between the corporations mining coal and the miners.

Mr. BRUMM. We will accept that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I accept that. I now move my resolution with that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote must be taken first on the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask leave to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the substitute reported from the committee is withdrawn.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose, in place of the original resolution, my amendment, with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] added.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit a suggestion? The resolution provides for the employment of a stenographer. I will remind him that we have two stenographers for committees regularly employed by the House under the law, and probably their services can be secured if they are not otherwise engaged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, and then the proposition as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of five of the House of Representatives be appointed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure by the Reading Railroad Company to transport such commerce, and to report to the House, by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations to serve as a common carrier of interstate commerce; and, further, to investigate the difficulties existing in the Schuylkill and Lehigh coal regions of Pennsylvania between the corporations mining coal and the miners; and to investigate all the facts in relation to mining corporations and individual miners of anthracite coal in connection therewith.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. As I understand it, that last clause is withdrawn by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. No. Leave it all in; it does no harm.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, only one moment shall I occupy the attention of this House. I regret very much, sir, that I have to differ from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, but I think that we are getting into a little bit of confusion over this matter. I want to say to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who has just offered his amendment, that I do not believe this House has any authority whatever to investigate local institutions within the State of Pennsylvania. It becomes simply an incident to the general inquiry which is contemplated by the minority of this committee, with whom I am in hearty accord. As a member of the Commerce Committee, who served upon it during the last Congress, and who has the honor to serve upon it now, I want to know whether these railroad companies are defying the law. I want to know whether this strike in Pennsylvania, as some people call it, is not a lockout forced by the railroad corporation itself.

Now, I want to know whether it is true, according to information which seems to be reliable—information which we absorb on all sides, no matter from what source—that these thousands of men who are out of employment, and who with hundreds and thousands of hungry wives and children are suffering over in Pennsylvania, are not actually forced out of employment by this railroad corporation, simply for the purpose of raising the price of my coal in Saginaw, Mich., $2 a ton. [Laughter and applause.]

When you talk about interstate commerce, Mr. Speaker, it does not mean the method of transportation; it does not mean whether it shall go on keelsons or on wheels; it means traffic; it means trade between the people of different States and different nations And if we have builded up in our country these immense corporations that are combining to absorb the very life-blood of the nation, then we ought to know it; and as a member of the Committee on Commerce I want to see this investigation go on, so that when the report comes back we may have intelligent and reliable information.

I am not here to fight a railroad corporation; nor am I here in the interest specially of the miners. I am one of those who believe in the general equality of mankind. Labor will take care of itself, if it has an equal chance. But I want to say to you who are forming these combinations, these great monopolies through this country, that you are simply throttling and robbing labor. I do not claim to be a laboring man in the ordinary sense [laughter], although I think I work pretty hard—more than twelve hours a day. But I am not here as a member of any labor organization. I am here to say in behalf of common humanity that we should do all that we can to equalize the laws, so that all the members of the community shall have an equal chance in the world. We do not ask anything more. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, let the amendment be read as modified.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the pending proposition as modified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five of the House of Representatives be appointed to investigate forthwith the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the continued failure by the Reading Railroad Company to transport such commerce, and to report to the House, by bill or otherwise, for consideration at any time, such legislation as is necessary to secure to the public the regular and complete execution by a railroad company of its obligations to serve as a common carrier of interstate commerce, and to investigate the difficulties existing in the Schuylkill and Lehigh coal regions of Pennsylvania between the corporations mining coal and the miners, and to further investigate all the facts in relation to the mining corporations and individual miners of anthracite coal in connection therewith, and all the facts in relation to the matter, and report the same to the House, with such recommendations as the committee may agree upon, and that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and at such places as it may find necessary, to employ a stenographer, to administer oaths, examine witnesses, compel the attendance of persons and the production of books and papers; and the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CLARDY and Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, called for the previous question.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I understood it was suggested and agreed to that the committee should consist of seven members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand. The question is on the amendment as read, upon which the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Missouri demand the previous question.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I would like to move an amendment to provide that the committee consist of seven members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARDY. I have demanded the previous question, but withdraw the demand temporarily, and yield for a moment to my colleague [Mr. BURNES], who desires to have read a passage from the report of a previous investigating committee.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the gentleman from Massachusetts made an issue with regard to the report of Governor Curtin, claiming that it contained no suggestion of a remedy in such cases of disturbances as that of the Southwest strike. As an answer I now desire that a paragraph be read from that report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The power of Congress to deal with the situation presented by this strike must be found in the provisions of section 8, Article I of the Constitution of the United States, by which Congress is empowered to provide for the general welfare of the United States, and to regulate commerce among the several States, and to establish post-offices and post-roads.

Congress has already provided, by section 3964 of the Revised Statutes, "that all railroads or parts of railroads which are now or may hereafter be in operation shall be post-roads, established as such under the authority of the Constitution."

Having cited the express provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce among the States, we need but refer to the statutes enacted protecting post-roads, and those regulating commerce upon the high seas, and on our navigable rivers, in defining the duties, obligations of, and penalties against, those engaged therein, as proof that ample power to control and regulate, so far as interstate commerce is involved, as well the rights and duties of the employers as of the employés therein, exists, and has been and may be further exercised.

Mr. CLARDY. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, what is known as the "Curtin committee" has been referred to here. The House will pardon a few remarks from one who was a member of that committee and who knows personally of its labors. The committee began the examination in Washington. It then proceeded to the city of St. Louis; after taking some testimony the committee divided, one part going South to Arkansas and Texas, the other proceeding to Kansas. These subcommittees subsequently reunited at St. Louis and completed the taking of the testimony, with a slight exception. The committee then returned to Washington. In the records of the report of the committee—

The subcommittee in the Southwest was absent ten days, and in that time traveled 2,000 miles and examined 328 witnesses. The subcommittee which went to Atchison, Kansas City, and Sedalia traveled over 700 miles and examined 250 witnesses, making a total of miles traveled from Washington and return of 4,880 miles and an examination of 578 witnesses.

Certainly the committee was as industrious in the collection of testimony as the most exacting economist could have demanded. It did this at a total cost to the Government of $4,002.40. Upon the return of the committee to Washington a long delay ensued in the preparation of the report, and when presented I felt it my duty to myself to file with it my views as a member of the minority. As these views state more fully the matters connected with such delay, I will ask the privilege of making it a part of my remarks.

The minority report reads as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned is one of those referred to in the report of the majority as not being able to assent to all portions of that report. The report is divided into two parts: First, a narrative of the events antecedent to and during the strike:

and, second, conclusions arrived at from a consideration of the testimony. The narrative portion is the result of much labor spent in the study of the testimony, and the arrangement in consecutive order of the facts contained therein. The result is a clear and comprehensive statement, correct in the main.

In one important particular, however, this statement is defective. By inadvertence, no doubt, one of the main causes of discontent on the Texas and Pacific just preceding the strike on that road is but incidentally mentioned in the report, and even that mention is not in its proper place in the narrative. Convinced that any history of this most disastrous strike must be incomplete which does not make prominent the grievances suffered by the employés on that road, their abortive efforts to have those grievances redressed, and the angry and discontented feeling engendered thereby, the undersigned has thought it important to supply this deficiency by giving the matter somewhat more in detail.

That such grievances existed is abundantly shown by the testimony. They were of various kinds, such as reduction of wages below the point named in the agreement signed on the termination of the previous strike, non-payment of wages at the rate of "time and a half for overtime," as provided for in said agreement; no extra pay for work in water, or travel on Sunday and at night; small deficiencies in amounts of checks forwarded for wages earned, and other matters. The testimony taken by the subcommittee which visited Texas, as to the existence and character of these grievances, was so complete as to be conclusive, and, in fact, after a few attempts at overcoming it on the part of the railroad officials, all further effort to disprove it was practically abandoned by them.

These grievances not being redressed, save in a few instances, the uneasy feeling left by the old strike was thereby deepened into discontent, and the way was the more easily prepared for the strike which followed. The failure to have these grievances redressed was very unfortunate. The responsibility of such failure will be located by a moment's attention to the testimony as to methods adopted by the workmen to secure redress.

It appears by this testimony that when a workman suffered what he felt to be a grievance, the orderly method was for him to make complaint of the injury to his local assembly. It was then investigated by the committee on grievances of such assembly. If his complaint was found just, it was then forwarded to the chairman of the executive committee of the district assembly, to be by him presented to the officials of the company for adjustment.

Many such grievances were thus investigated, found well founded, and forwarded to Martin Irons, chairman of District Assembly No. 101. No redress arriving, the parties aggrieved naturally supposed that their grievances had been presented and remained unredressed. In fact, a number who testified that they had complaints which had been presented and which had not been rectified, when subjected to cross-examination admitted that all they knew about the matter was that the complaints had been forwarded and no redress had arrived.

The supposition that the officials had refused redress was undoubtedly strengthened by the promise of the redress of "many other grievances" contained in the circular issued by Mr. Irons to the subordinate assemblies on the eve of the strike, asking for a vote upon the ordering of the strike, and as stated the discontent and anger among the employés were greatly increased by this supposed failure to redress their wrongs. Upon the cross-examination of Mr. Irons at St. Louis, he admitted receiving these grievances, and said that he had presented but one of them to the railroad officials at St. Louis, and that one was promptly redressed. He claimed, in explanation of his failure to present them, that these grievances were not properly to be presented to the chief officials of the road at St. Louis, but belonged for adjustment to the local officials stationed at the points where the grievances arose.

Whether this claim be correct or not, it will be seen at a glance that, between the local assemblies and Martin Irons on the one hand, and the chief officials of the road at St. Louis and the local officials at other points on the other hand, the apparently well-devised machinery for the redress of grievances failed in its intended operation and effect. Had the full fact been made known to the workmen that their grievances had lodged somewhere between them and the persons they were designed to ultimately reach, no doubt a kindlier feeling would have existed. Without this knowledge, and believing, and with reason to so believe, that their complaints had been persistently ignored, they were incensed, and who shall say, from their standpoint, that they had no cause to be incensed? At all events, all this largely prepared the way for a hearty co-operation by them in the strike when ordered, and largely contributed to their willingness to unite in favor of the strike being ordered, and no history of the strike on the Texas Pacific is complete without mention of this fact.

As to the destruction of property and the assaults upon life which occurred during the strike, attention is called to the fact that perhaps in no State in the Union is there any lack of local law sufficient, if enforced, to protect both person and property. Certainly, with possibly an exception, by the faulty wording of one of the statutes of the State of Texas, the committee found the local laws already in existence sufficient for such purpose. That these laws were not enforced in some places, for weeks even, can not be disputed; but the fault lay not with the law, but with its sworn administrators. The protection of life and property within the confines of any State is primarily the duty of that State. The policing power is for the State to exercise, and if those charged with that power fail to execute it, the remedy would seem to be, not the enactment of more law, but a change of officials.

And yet the fact must be recognized that the problem of railroad management and regulation seems to be rapidly outgrowing State lines and is pushing to the front for recognition and solution. While the police powers are for the State, the security of uninterrupted transportation for the shipper of interstate commerce seems to be within the power of the General Government to protect. Some legislation, crude, it must be acknowledged to be, and but tentative at the best, in relation to the transportation of interstate commerce, has been enacted by the present Congress.

The practical workings of that legislation may suggest further and additional regulation and more complete remedies in the future. While we are wise, perhaps, in relying upon such workings for additional suggestions for legislation, still regret must be expressed that the report does not discuss more fully and exhaustively the various questions which present themselves to any intelligent reader of the testimony relating to this question of the regulation and control of the carriers of interstate commerce.

Here was a strike which presented, in one phase or another, every question which can arise in connection with this subject. The strike was unprecedented in extent and completeness. It covered, among others, a road already in the hands of the United States court. It extended to a demand for the severance of all traffic with another road in the hands of another United States court. All the roads affected were engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce. By the stoppage of traffic large quantities of interstate freight were detained, and some of it perished for want of transportation.

If ever there was an occasion presented in which the whole problem of railroad transportation, the powers and duties of common carriers, and their relation to the public, the power of the General Government to compel the carrier to transport interstate commerce, and the extent, if any, to which it may, in the exercise of that power, lay its hand upon the carrier, and the employés of such carrier, through Federal legislation, came up legitimately for discussion, it was the occasion in hand. No such discussion is had. But little, if any, consideration of the existence or character of the power of the Federal Government in the premises, and no discussion of the extent to which such power, if it exists, might be safely used, nor of the means by which it might be exercised, appears in the report.

The undersigned will not undertake such discussion. If other reasons for declining such undertaking were wanting the following facts would seem to be sufficient excuse. They are stated not by way of complaint, but by way of explanation. The committee immediately upon its appointment met and arranged for the prosecution of its work. It proceeded to the West, divided into subcommittees, and took testimony simultaneously at different points. It is confidently claimed that no committee ever traveled more miles, examined more witnesses, and took more testimony in a given time. The matter was probed to the bottom, every essential fact was obtained, and every effort made to arrive at an impartial ascertainment of the truth. This done, the committee returned to Washington.

One witness, whose testimony was thought by some to be desirable, was sick and could not be examined. He remained ill, and finally died, never having rallied sufficiently to appear in answer to the subpœna of the committee. Meanwhile the committee were not called together, and at the commencement of the present session some members of the committee made urgent and repeated requests for a meeting. Finally a meeting was held, and the steps taken to formally close the testimony. Another meeting for consultation was held, at which the undersigned could not be present.

The first draught of a report was not presented to the committee for consideration until about the middle of February. It was referred to a subcommittee for revision. The undersigned first saw the revised report March 1, and it was first read to the full committee March 2. The undersigned expressed his dissatisfaction with the report, and his conviction that it was then too late to properly frame and supply the discussion which the importance of the subject demanded.

It was then near the close of the session; important legislation was being finally acted upon, and the duties of the members lay in attendance upon the session. However, he obtained leave to add some supplemental views, and an adjournment was had, as he understood, until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the next day. Before the time fixed for such adjourned meeting had arrived the report was presented, and all opportunity to present and discuss additional views was at an end.

No bad faith in this is charged. It was, no doubt, a pure inadvertence, but the effect was the same nevertheless. The effect of this late presentation of the report must necessarily be to prevent any consideration of the subject being entertained by the present Congress, and the only benefit to the country at large of the labors of the committee must consist in the fact that a large mass of testimony covering every phase of a widely-extended, fiercely-fought, and long-continued suspension of operations on thousands of miles of railway has been gathered together for the study of the economist and the legislator.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

I do not know but that the concluding remark in that report about the "only benefit," etc., is a little too broad.

The majority say in their report that—

On the evening of the 1st of May a correspondence was begun between the executive board of the Knights of Labor, which was at that time in St. Louis, and members of the committee, which resulted in declaring off the strike, to take effect on May 3.

And when they say further—

The effect of the strike was and is a serious loss to the business interests of that section of the country; the public generally, the producing classes, the mercantile population, and everybody was caused to suffer even more than the strikers, or the railroads, for their losses were beyond computation. The loss to the strikers alone, 9,000 of them, for 50 days, at $2 a day, would amount to the enormous sum of $900,000;

The loss of the non-striking employés, necessarily deprived of employment pending the strike, is roughly estimated at $500,000;

The loss of property, destruction of engines, cars, bridges, machinery, of the company and the loss of revenue to this company, taking the earnings of 1885 as a comparison, was about $2,800,000;

The loss to the general public certainly amounts to millions of dollars; and thus show the magnitude of the strike and the disastrous effects of its continuance, it must be admitted that any action of the committee which hastened its termination was a benefit to the country. I have thought proper to say this much as to the work of our committee. Its work was done speedily and with a thoroughness none will question. Its failure to report in time for such report to be of value is not chargeable to the minority in the least degree.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] yields to me, as I understand, that I may read an amendment which I desire to offer:

Amend the resolution by adding the following clause:

"And that said committee be, and is hereby, directed to inquire also whether there has been any unlawful combination of large bodies of men to interrupt the business of said Reading Railroad, and to deprive it of freight destined for transportation by said railroad to points beyond the limits of the State of Pennsylvania, and if such illegal combination is found to exist, to report what legislation is necessary and proper on the part of Congress to prevent and punish such combinations in the future."

Mr. BRUMM. I do not object to that.

Mr. CLARDY. I do, and demand the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 145, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills and joint resolutions of the following titles were introduced and referred, as indicated below:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOAR. I observe that in journalizing the ruling of the Chair yesterday on which an appeal was taken to the Senate, the Journal says that the Chair held that the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] was out of order under Rule XXII. I understood the ruling of the Chair to be, and voted accordingly, that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] being entitled to the floor it was not in order for a Senator to interpose another motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was a part of the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. That does not come under Rule XXII. Will the Chair be kind enough to have that part of the Journal read again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the entry in the Journal.

The Secretary read as follows:

When Mr. RIDDLEBERGER submitted a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution yesterday submitted by him to amend the thirty-seventh rule of the Senate, the President pro tempore decided that the motion was not in order under Rule XXII. From the decision of the Chair Mr. RIDDLEBERGER appealed to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the Journal would be correct if the descriptive words were omitted, merely stating that the motion was not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I find on looking at the RECORD that the Chair does not appear, so far as I can see in running it over rapidly, to have mentioned any particular rule at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did mention Rule XXII, and directed the Chief Clerk to read it, but upon further disclosure of the facts in the case it appeared to be unnecessary, and therefore the rule was not read. The Journal will be amended by omitting, after the word "order," the words "under Rule XXII." The clause will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

The President pro tempore decided that the motion was not in order under Rule XXII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand with the words after "order" omitted, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and as so amended, if there be no further motion to correct or amend, the Journal will stand approved.

PORTRAITS OF EX-SPEAKERS OF THE HOUSE.

The following concurrent resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the addresses delivered in the House of Representatives on January 19, 1888, upon the presentation of the portraits of Speakers Sedgwick, Varnum, and Banks, for the use of the House.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

A bill (H. R. 1338) to extend the leave of absence of employés in the Government Printing Office to thirty days per annum; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 23) authorizing the printing of 14,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool.

The bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

STATEN ISLAND BRIDGE.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I present a petition, numerously signed by parties engaged in transportation on what is known as Arthur Kill, between Staten Island and New Jersey, with respect to the structure now being erected over the Arthur Kill, known as the Staten Island bridge. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to simply make a brief statement before presenting the petition, as I wish to make a motion touching it.

It will be remembered that Congress passed an act, approved June 16, 1886, authorizing a certain kind of structure, to be called a bridge, to be built across the Arthur Kill by the Staten Island Bridge Company, or the Rapid Transit Railroad Company, as it is called. At the last session of Congress that bridge was deemed to be so serious an obstruction to navigation that I offered an amendment to the existing bridge law, before anything had been done by the bridge company towards the construction of the bridge under the act of 1886.

That amendment was in form in accordance with the recommendation of a Board of Engineers appointed by the Secretary of War under the power granted him in the act of 1886, which required his approval of the plan of the bridge before they could proceed to construct it; and deeming that some information and some knowledge more than he possessed was necessary to authorize, or rather to induce, him to undertake so great and so important a work as approving or disapproving the plan, it was first referred to a board of engineers.

He appointed a Board of Engineers consisting of five of the principal engineer officers of the Army, headed by Lieutenant-Colonel Duane, of the Army, and the report of that board was unanimous condemning the bridge. At the time I submitted the report of this Board of Engineers to the Senate I introduced my amendment for changing the plan of the bridge; they were both referred to the Committee on Commerce, and very strangely indeed the committee reported back adversely my amendment to the bridge act, as I understand, without ever referring it at all to the Secretary of War.

The matter remained in this shape until, I think, in the month of December last, the Pennsylvania Railway Company and the Lehigh Valley Railway Company joined in a petition to the Secretary of War, conceiving that under a certain section of the act he had the power to alter the plan even while the bridge was under construction, and asking him to change the plan of the bridge for reasons found in their petition.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to state some of the salient points of the petition, and then I shall ask to have it printed at large in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company are very largely interested in the navigation of the Arthur Kill, and their interests are seriously affected, and those of the public through them, by the facts and circumstances disclosed in the affidavits and papers accompanying this petition, to which your attention is respectfully invited as demanding the exercise of the power in reference to the removal or modification of the structure vested in you by the act of Congress authorizing the erection of a bridge over the Arthur Kill.

Now I will read from a statement made by Mr. Sayre, the present general manager of the Lehigh Valley Railway, in which he says:

If the bridge across Arthur Kill is erected as now proposed, it would, in my opinion, be so obstructive to the movement of the traffic by water and so increase the expense of such movement that I would deem it my duty to advise the said company to cease all further development of its said terminal facilities at Perth Amboy and to endeavor as soon as possible to secure some other location for its said business, and I believe that said company would take such action in accordance with the views above expressed.

He further states that they have expended $2,000,000 for a terminal point for the discharge of coal from their trains at Perth Amboy. The Pennsylvania Railway Company at South Amboy have also an investment of upwards of $3,000,000, and the Raritan Canal, which furnishes the only interior route of communication between New York and the South, is also interested largely.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey what became of a proceeding before the supreme court of his State? Somebody sent me a report of an argument made in that court two or three months ago, from which it seemed that this question had been submitted to that court.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It was decided adversely to the State of New Jersey. I think an appeal has been taken to the full bench, but when it will be argued I do not know. However, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this matter only refers to the plan of the bridge. There is no objection on the part of anybody that I know of to the construction of the bridge, certainly none on the part of these petitioners. There may be so far as the State of New Jersey is concerned, but as regards these petitioners they only find fault with the plan of the bridge, and desire that a change be made in the plan.

As I said before, the matter has been referred to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War telegraphs me this morning to this effect:

It is not before me in such a form that I can at present deal with it.

I present this petition on the part of these two railway companies, and also in behalf of some 200 or 300 citizens of my State and New York State and Staten Island, who are engaged in transportation upon the Arthur Kill, and I desire to have this matter referred through the committee to the Secretary of War in order that we may get at the precise state of facts touching it.

The actual bridge in part is there to-day, and a very correct judgment may be formed of the amount of obstruction it will be to the channel when the entire bridge is completed. I think one of the piers—the center pier—has been located in the middle of the river, and it is that particular pier of which these gentlemen complain. It has only been built for a short distance above water, and certainly if any change is to be made in the structure—and surely it ought to be made with the evidence we have before us—it is much better that it should be done now than to wait until the entire structure is complete, and be compelled then to remove it, as we surely will be, except it be the resolve of Congress to utterly destroy this great water-way.

The Board of Engineers of which I speak, whom the Secretary of War called to his aid, went upon the ground, examined the location, examined the plans, examined the currents, and they unanimously condemned the bridge. I will read a single sentence from the report of the board as to the importance of the stream. They state the amount of tonnage, which amounts to about 6,000,000 tons annually, and say:

It is thus seen that so far as tonnage is concerned this is one of the great water-ways of this country, and indeed of the world.

They go on to speak of affidavits made by gentlemen engaged in traffic over the Arthur Kill. The petition is signed by more than 200 people—boat-owners who are engaged in traffic in the Arthur Kill.

I need not go further and read the report, nor need I read the affidavits, but I will call attention to a single instance. Here is an affidavit of Mr. F. B. Morris, very largely engaged as a shipping agent and in trafficking on the Arthur Kill. He says that the cost of running, or the expenses of the towing line, have been increased about 30 per cent. since the erection of the middle pier, and when the other pier is constructed upon the shore he says it will be absolutely impossible without great cost, and he thinks it will increase the cost more than 50 per cent.

Mr. Chase and Mr. Fisher concur in this view.

Now, Mr. President, here is practically an obstruction of one of the great water-ways of the country, national in its character, for what purpose? Simply to gratify the Staten Island Transit Company or the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad—for one are both and both one—in the attempt they are making, with the aid of Congress, in crippling their rivals in transportation by the erection of such a bridge as will compel their rivals to cross said bridge and locate upon the lands of the bridge company on Staten Island with their vast terminal stations. This alone should cause us to cry a halt, to say nothing of the canal company, which uses this route as well, and saying nothing of the vast factory interests along the route. The Board of Engineers recommend a structure which is accepted by everybody (except the company now erecting the bridge); by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, by the Raritan Canal, and by all of these 200 petitioners, who say they are perfectly satisfied if such a structure is built. They think it will not seriously interfere with the navigation of the river, and petition that such a bridge be built, the cost of which, as I understand from competent authority, would not be more than $150,000 above the estimated cost of the present structure. I submit that the case as presented by these petitioners demands immediate action by the Senate.

I present this petition for reference to the Committee on Commerce, and I ask that it be printed at large in the RECORD. I also make request of the honorable committee that they refer the whole matter to the Secretary of War, and require of him an immediate investigation, and report as to what is proper to do under the circumstances. I desire further to say that it is my intention during the morning hour, when that order of business is reached, to submit a bill to the Senate to amend the bridge act so as to conform to the recommendations of the Board of Engineers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the petition presented by him be printed at length in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that no such request will be made, and certainly, if it be made, that no such request will be granted. I wish again to call the attention of the Senate to the abuse which has grown up in the last two or three years, in violation of the rules, by printing long documents in the RECORD, where they are not conveniently to be had. If the Senator wishes to have the petition printed as a document in the ordinary way for our information, a certain number of them, say 1,900 or thereabouts, for our convenience, in pamphlet form, in convenient type, then it is well enough to have it done. I have no objection to that; but when it is carried into the RECORD, more than ten times, yes, more than twenty times, the expense is incurred, and the document is placed beyond our reach for immediate use, and becomes a part of the perpetual memorials and records of the country.

I make these remarks more fully now in order to call attention to the fact. I do not complain now of any particular case, but I have noticed lately that during the morning hour there is a vast amount of petition matter presented and published in the RECORD, which is of no practical use for us in the current order of legislation, but is put there probably without thought of the expense and trouble incurred. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will modify his request.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am as unwilling as any Senator to burden the RECORD with any matter that I think is not very important, but let me say to the Senator from Ohio, there is certainly no subject now before the Senate that I think more important than this.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the case, then there is greater reason for having the paper published as a document.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The copies of the petition printed as the Senator proposes would of course be scattered, and perhaps would not come to the notice of any Senator, while if printed in the RECORD, reference may be made to it at all times, because every Senator has a file of the RECORD before him.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, when printed in document form it is convenient of access at all times—a Senator can at any moment send a page and get it—while the copies of the RECORD are very difficult to be had. I can not keep my copies of the RECORD, and when I turn to the files I find that they are probably imperfect and I can not get what I wish. At any rate, the object of such a publication is merely to aid us in legislation, and as an aid to legislation it is better to be put in pamphlet form, and it costs about one-twentieth part as much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The cost is less than that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Thousands of matters of less importance than this find their way into the RECORD, and I think it is a rather late day for the Senator from Ohio to offer an objection to so important a matter being spread at large in the RECORD. The petition certainly shows a state of facts that the Senator from Ohio and every other Senator ought to know.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to appeal to the Senator from New Jersey to withdraw his request that the petition be printed in the RECORD. I think the object he desires to accomplish can be much better accomplished by printing it in documentary form, in any number he may desire in reason; there is no question about it. To print in the RECORD this petition, which I understand to be one of considerable length, with the names attached to it, would probably cost from twenty to fifty times as much as to print it in documentary form. However, the great evil is this: We have seen the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD swell in size until now at a long session of Congress it means ten or eleven, and, with the Appendix, sometimes twelve or thirteen, large volumes, and it is largely because of this padding, which seems to me to be entirely unnecessary.

There is certainly no desire on the part, I think, of the Senator from Ohio or myself to combat this very important measure. I admit its importance. I have recognized that it is not only of local importance but of great importance to the country at large; but I think the result desired would be better accomplished by printing it in documentary form.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am aware that I have no right to have the petition printed in the RECORD if objection be made, and therefore I withdraw that request, and move that 500 copies be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce, and if there be no objection 500 additional copies will be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not "additional copies," but 500 copies.

Mr. HARRIS. The limited number is to be 500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from New Jersey to ask for 500 additional copies.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask that 500 copies be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the order to print is made, 1,900 copies will be printed; but if the Senator from New Jersey limits the number to 500 the Chair will take that number.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Nineteen hundred copies will be sufficient.

Mr. HAWLEY. The order to print what is called the usual number sends the document to certain places on file and we get only two or three apiece. If an order is made to print a thousand copies for the use of the Senate, you will get ten times as many apiece as to print under what is called the usual order. If 500 copies are printed in addition it would cost only a little press work and paper. I suggest a simple order to print 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, an order will be made to print 1,000 copies of the petition for the use of the Senate. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] wish to have his name recorded as voting?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Reporter thought the Senator had voted, but the clerks did not.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have a great deal of committee business to do and do not expect to be here. I therefore let other Senators decide the question of adjournment over for themselves.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—38.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, numerously signed, praying for the amendment of the laws of naturalization, immigration, and citizenship so as to bar, first, all criminals and pauper immigrants whose passage has been paid; second, to prevent landing of immigrants under contract; third, to debar from citizenship all foreigners who owe allegiance to any power, potentate, etc.; and requiring twenty-one years' residence before eligibility to any public office or trust. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BERRY. I present a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of Fort Smith, Ark., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Arkansas River. I will state that the petition is accompanied by statistics showing the amount and kind of commerce of the various towns located along that river. It also shows the vast importance of this river, not only to the people of Arkansas, but to a large portion of the people of Kansas and of the Indian Territory; that many of them are dependent wholly upon the river for the transportation of their farm products, and it is their only protection and security against exorbitant charges by the railroads.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce, with the request that when the bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors comes before them they will give it due consideration and make a liberal appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the faculty of Adelbert College, at Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the enactment of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance, of Wisconsin, officially signed, praying for a submission to the States of a national prohibitory constitutional amendment; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SPOONER. I present the petition of J. A. Johnson, president of the Fuller & Johnson Manufacturing Company, of Madison, Wis. Mr. Johnson is a distinguished citizen of Wisconsin, of Scandinavian birth, who has recently published a very able criticism of the message of the President on the subject of the tariff, and as the petition is short, I ask that it may be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Reading it makes it go in the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. It is very short.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may as well be ordered printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the petition will be read.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned would respectfully petition your honorable body to abolish all import duties on agricultural machinery, such as plows, harrows, seeding-machines, hay and grain harvesting machines, thrashing-machines, straw-cutting machines, feed-grinding mills, farm vehicles, including farm wagons, that may be imported to the United States from countries that admit like machines manufactured in the United States free of duty.

Your petitioner would represent that he is a manufacturer of agricultural machinery at the city of Madison, Wis.; that he believes that import duties on all such articles of manufacture are superfluous and useless; that they only harm the producer, and are of no value to any one.

Your petitioner would further represent that the law imposing such duties works harm to the manufacturer of the goods named in this: That there are citizens who continually represent that the import duties on the goods named compel the agriculturist to pay much higher prices for them than he would if no duties were imposed, which allegations, while incorrect and untrue, nevertheless cause ill feeling on the part of agriculturists toward the manufacturers of such implements, which ill feeling may be wholly avoided by abolishing the import duties on them.

Your petitioner would further represent that he believes American workingmen should be protected against foreign cheap labor by suitable import duties, but that the manufacture of agricultural implements is in such advanced state, and that our implements are so superior to those of foreign manufacture, that none will be imported if the duties on them be wholly discontinued.

Trusting that Congress will take early action on this petition, your petitioner will ever remain,

Your obedient servant,

J. A. JOHNSON,

President Fuller & Johnson Manufacturing Company, Madison, Wis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a highly respectable body, in the State of Vermont, praying for a national commission to examine into the alcoholic liquor traffic, etc. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of 109 citizens of the Seventeenth and Fifth Congressional districts of Illinois, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of James W. Bowman, of Poplar Springs, Henderson County, Tennessee, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of members of the faculty of the University of Texas, at Austin, Tex., praying for the passage of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WALTHALL presented a petition of members of the faculty of the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, Miss., praying for the enactment of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FAULKNER presented the petition of A. C. Collins and 71 other citizens of Marion County, West Virginia, and the petition of A. N. Campbell and 56 other citizens of Nicholas County, West Virginia, praying that increased compensation be allowed fourth-class postmasters; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER presented a petition of citizens of the northern central section of the city of Washington, praying that certain improvements be made in that section of the city; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Joseph F. Little, a citizen of the District of Columbia, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a petition of the Maryland State Temperance Alliance, officially signed, praying for a national commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of 111 citizens of the Twenty-seventh Congressional district of Pennsylvania, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of 119 citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5352) to grant an American register to the foreign-built bark Nordstjernen, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1474) to grant an American register to the foreign-built bark Nordstjernen to report it adversely, the House bill just reported having superseded its necessity. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5728) to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 104) authorizing the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from the State of Colorado to the Uintah Valley reservation, in the Territory of Utah, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1376) for the relief of John W. Blake, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 258) for the relief of Maj. Daniel N. Bash, paymaster United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 81) to authorize the purchase of the lands necessary for the construction of locks and dams on the Cumberland River, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1103) to provide for an Indian school at Carson City, Nev., reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 38) granting to the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1035) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 667) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1669) authorizing the Mississippi and Louisiana Bridge and Railroad Company of Natchez, Miss., to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Natchez, Miss., reported it without amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 795) for the relief of the volunteers of the Fourth Regiment of Iowa Infantry, to report it adversely. This adverse report is made because of the fact that the committee has reported a general bill which reaches the object of this bill. I therefore move that this bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1346) to authorize the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1129) granting to the Newport and King's Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the Siletz Indian reservation, reported it with amendments.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back a House concurrent resolution favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1886–'87 there be printed 6,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 12,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon. Is that a resolution which will give rise to debate?

Mr. MANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not propose to give up this morning hour for the consideration of anything except that which properly comes before the Senate in its regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that if the resolution shall lead to debate I will withdraw my report.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I shall not object.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out of the resolution "6,000" and insert "4,000," to strike out "12,000" and insert "8,000," and to strike out "25,000" and insert "20,000;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1886–'87 there be printed 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 20,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that the number heretofore ordered?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the number for the Commissioner of Education heretofore allowed, 20,000. The House desires 25,000; we cut the number down to 20,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. How about the copies for the Senate and House?

Mr. MANDERSON. My impression is that the number as reported by the committee is the same as heretofore ordered. At any rate, in the opinion of the committee, it is ample for the purposes of Congress that 4,000 should be printed for the use of the Senate, and 8,000 for the House. We desire, if possible, to reduce somewhat the expenses of printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it is a good place to commence with this report. We might reduce on some other publication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back a Senate resolution on the same subject adversely, and ask that it be indefinitely postponed. A letter of the Commissioner of Education accompanies it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the resolution is omitted from the files sent to the desk by the Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a Senate resolution to the same purport, to print the report of the Commissioner of Education, submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] January 16, 1888, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the request of an esteemed citizen of this District I introduce a bill, which I send to the desk, without committing myself to the support of it in any way.

The bill (S. 1834) enlarging the powers of the Columbia Title Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1835) for the relief of officers of the Army who have served continuously in one grade for twenty-one years; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1836) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of the county of Schuylkill, in the State of Pennsylvania, for money advanced by it under allotments made by soldiers from said county during the late rebellion, by virtue of section 12 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property," approved July 22, 1861; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 1837) to amend the military record of Timothy McCarty (or McCarthy); which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1838) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Mott; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Daniel C. Rodman and others, sureties on the bond of Ozias Morgan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1840) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Saginaw; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1841) granting a pension to Mariah Scales; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to introduce a bill for reference, being a bill to amend "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road," simply conforming to the recommendations of the Board of Engineers.

The bill (S. 1842) to amend "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1843) granting an increase of pension to Florida G. Casey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1844) granting an increase of pension to Ann Atkinson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1846) for the erection of a public building at New London, Conn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, introduced a bill (S. 1847) for the relief of Carrie P. Machenheimer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1848) to grant a pension to Anna G. Valk; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1845) to provide for the appointment of justices of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico authorized to determine the validity of Spanish and Mexican land grants in said Territory; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That should go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moved its reference to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BUTLER. I was requested to ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories. It relates to a matter within a Territory, and I trust it will take that direction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, but certainly if anything belongs to that committee it is that very question, which it has always had and has under consideration at this very moment of time.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well. If the Committee on Private Land Claims has jurisdiction, and is now considering it, it will not be necessary perhaps to have this bill referred to it. The Committee on the Territories of the House has the same bill before it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims is here. The matter is nothing to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. RANSOM. I have not heard the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill to provide for the appointment of justices of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico authorized to determine the validity of Spanish and Mexican land grants in said Territory."

Mr. RANSOM. I will simply say that that question, in all of its branches as it relates to the Territories and lands of this character in the States, has been for years and is now especially before the Committee on Private Land Claims. That committee has reported from time to time to this body a bill on this subject, and it is now anxiously considering the subject. I think this question, as I understand it, ought to go to that committee. I have no personal wish about it, however.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no preference.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask how that bill gets before the Senate under a rule according to which the President said we could not introduce resolutions without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not yet completed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The order of bills had been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It had not been so announced by the Chair.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Chair did certainly announce that the order was now "concurrent and other resolutions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of morning business has not been closed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I see it; but I ask if this is a bill that has to be presented by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive morning business under any of the orders until the close of morning business is announced. Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories?

Mr. PLATT. If this bill or one similar in its features is now under consideration by the Committee on Private Land Claims, I do not know that I shall insist that the bill go to the Committee on Territories. I have not had time to examine the bill sufficiently to be informed upon that subject, but I do want to say that I think several of the committees of this body have in some way come to have jurisdiction of many matters that ought to be within the consideration of the Committee on Territories; in other words, that the jurisdiction of the Committee on Territories seems at least, not particularly by this Congress, to have been shorn, so that a good many matters which they ought with reference to the consistency of legislation to consider are parceled out among many different committees of this body.

Mr. BUTLER. The facts about this bill are simply these: It was brought to me by the governor of the Territory of New Mexico, Governor Ross, a former Delegate from that Territory, Mr. Manzanares, and two other very respectable, intelligent, and reputable gentlemen from that Territory whom I had not met before. In a general conference in regard to the affairs of New Mexico the fact was mentioned that they were extremely anxious to have these disputed titles settled by some tribunal. It seems under some treaty with Mexico or Spain the courts of the Territory of New Mexico have no jurisdiction of the questions, and this bill is intended to organize a special tribunal to which all questions arising under the land grants may be submitted. These gentlemen, with great force it seemed to me, objected to be concerned in any measure which involved the land question in other Territories. This bill relates exclusively to New Mexico, and I suggested that it seemed to me, as it related to a matter concerning the Territory of New Mexico, the Committee on Territories was the proper committee before which this bill should go, and hence I have asked that reference.

Now, in regard to the Committee on Private Land Claims having jurisdiction of bills similar to this, I think my friend from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] and my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] are mistaken. They may have bills which relate——

Mr. RANSOM. If I may correct my friend from South Carolina, I will state to him that this identical bill which has been introduced here has been sent by a gentleman of whom he speaks to the Private Land Claims Committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sure the Senator from North Carolina is mistaken.

Mr. RANSOM. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. The bills are different.

Mr. RANSOM. Are they different?

Mr. BUTLER. They are.

Mr. RANSOM. The governor of the Territory, of whom he speaks, has sent to the Committee on Private Land Claims a bill which he represents to be a proper bill, and which is now under consideration before that committee.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a difference in the two, so I am informed. This bill relates alone to New Mexico. The other bill relates to other Territories, Arizona and others. So I shall insist on the reference of the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We may as well take the judgment of the Senate once for all in respect to the disposition of this particular business.

It is true, no doubt, as the Senator from South Carolina states, that the bill he now presents is drawn up with phrases which would confine it to the private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico; and another might be drawn confined to the private land claims in the Territory of Arizona, and another might be drawn which would confine it to the private land claims in the State of Nevada, and in Colorado, and so on. It is very easy for the draughtsman of a bill to limit it to one State or to one Territory, but all these grants that are spoken of, Mexican and Spanish, are now brought forward and must be under one treaty. The Spanish ones are almost entirely in Louisiana; but they mainly arise under the treaty with Mexico. Every one of the claims under the Mexican negotiation is a claim for private grants that Congress is asked to confirm upon the supposition that the holders have not already got a perfect title. As far as they have, the judicial courts of each Territory and of each State have just the same jurisdiction in those cases that they have in any others arising between citizens.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask the Senator from Vermont is it true or not that the courts of the Territory have not jurisdiction of these cases?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is true that they have perfect jurisdiction of every case where a man alleges that he has got a title under Mexico or Spain or anybody else; but where he has not a title, and appeals to further legislation for some kind of action to confirm his grant to him, which had not been completely confirmed when the sovereignty changed in 1848, then the courts have not jurisdiction, not because they have not jurisdiction of every question of legal and equitable private right between everybody, but because the man in the case I state has not any right which a court of law or a court of equity can recognize. That is the only reason why they have not jurisdiction.

Mr. BUTLER. Why can a court not recognize it? Because of the treaty stipulation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No. Because the man has not a title, and a man who sues in a court to get somebody off his land or to get into it, of course, has to stand on the title that he can make out. If a man had not a perfect Mexican grant when the sovereignty changed and it has not since been confirmed by Congress, he would fail for want of title, just as I should fail in the courts of South Carolina in suing my friend to get possession of his plantation. The court has jurisdiction of the question, but I can not prove my case because I have not got the title.

That is all the trouble there is about what I call want of jurisdiction, which is a misnomer. It is purely and simply the case of the consideration of the private land claims of people who claim to have got incomplete and imperfect grants from the Government of Mexico, which they say the Government of the United States under treaty is bound to recognize. Accordingly, bills have been passed as to California, a long time hitherto, creating a commission in that State for this purpose, and then an appeal to the courts, and so on to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Senate on reports from the Committee on Private Land Claims has passed three or four times, after full discussion, a bill for settling all these claims under the Mexican treaty by one set of procedure, and naming both the Territories and the States that have parts of the old Mexican or Spanish territory within their borders, so as to dispose of that single subject altogether, and there is nothing in regard to it that has anything to do with Territorial lines or State lines. It is not a Territorial matter in any other sense than that every matter is of interest to the people where the question arises, so that it is, as it respects the thing to be done, purely a matter of private land claims. As it respects the mode of doing it, creating more judges, it is a matter that for twenty years I know has always been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. But I care nothing about that; I only want to preserve to the different committees of the Senate the subjects that clearly in their very nature and necessarily belong to them.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I should like to have the bill read, whatever it is, by title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill to provide for the appointment of justices of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico authorized to determine the validity of Spanish and Mexican land grants in said Territory."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I believe there is nothing that circumscribes what a Senator shall say here in respect to any pending bill; and seeing, as I must this morning, that the morning hour is to be passed over before resolutions under the rule, concurrent and other resolutions, shall be called for, I may avail myself, possibly, of an opportunity that some other Senators sometimes avail of to debate the tariff on some proposition that does not in anywise relate to the tariff.

If I understand the rules of the Senate they distinctly lay down regular orders of procedure, and when we reach the order of "concurrent and other resolutions" nothing can be introduced except that which belongs to that order, unless by unanimous consent. The Chair this morning has, according to my understanding, changed that rule, and said that the Chair would receive any business during the morning hour without regard to these orders. If that be the case, then the rest of the morning hour is as open to the other Senators as it possibly can be to the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER. Will not the Senator allow me to have this matter disposed of? I will introduce some other subject on which he can speak. I am obliged to leave the Senate Chamber and want this matter disposed of. If the Senator will give way to have this motion acted upon, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am afraid the Senator wants to dispose of the matter I have in hand at the same time.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all. I will promise the Senator from Virginia that I shall not disturb him in the slightest between now and to-morrow morning, if he desires to hold the floor until that time, if he will allow this matter to be disposed of.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have entire confidence in any statement he may make about a matter of this sort, but the Chair intervenes between the Senator from South Carolina and the Senate, and while I have the utmost confidence there, still I think I can debate the bill now before the Senate in my way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Virginia that the next order will be "concurrent and other resolutions" after this question is disposed of.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from Virginia does not need that information, because he heard the Chair announce that nearly fifteen or twenty minutes ago. I yield now to the Senator from South Carolina to let "concurrent and other resolutions" be called up, but I do not want an executive session before this morning hour closes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to refer the bill, whose title has been read, to the Committee on Territories?

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to make one single statement, that this bill has never been introduced into the Senate at this session before. I am just informed that several copies have been sent to individual members of different committees, but in point of fact this bill has not been introduced into the Senate before.

Mr. RANSOM. This is the correct statement: This bill was sent to the Senator from Vermont and by him referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BUTLER. Did he introduce it?

Mr. RANSOM. No, he did not introduce it, but he referred it to the committee, and it is now before the committee in connection with a bill regularly introduced on the same subject.

Mr. BUTLER. That confirms the correctness of my statement that it has not been introduced before at this session at all, and I am very frank to state that it is substantially a copy of one which is before another forum which it is not necessary for me to mention, and in that body it has been referred to its Committee on Territories.

I will state while I am on my feet that the people of New Mexico have been struggling for years and years to get some Congressional action upon this question, and I am informed that the settlement of the Territory is very greatly impeded by reason of the unsettled land claims; that the desire of the people of the Territory is to have some action by Congress, by some committee.

Inasmuch as this is the first time this bill has been introduced I submit to the Senate that it is entirely competent that it should go to the Committee on Territories, which has jurisdiction of all matters relating to the Territories. It is entirely germane, entirely legitimate and proper. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], the chairman of the Committee on Territories, that a great many questions should have been referred to that committee which have gone to others.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the questions involved in the settlement of private land claims occasioned the formation of the Committee on Private Land Claims. The very subject-matter of this bill suggested the organization of that committee years ago. These matters formerly sometimes went to the Judiciary Committee and sometimes to the Committee on Public Lands; but as they were questions involving special considerations, a committee was organized for the purpose of considering them, and it has had the matter under consideration for the last fifteen or twenty years, and reports have been made to the Senate, I believe, at nearly every session of some bill, but it has failed between the two Houses.

The committee now having the matter under consideration has given it careful attention and will, we hope, be able to report in a few days. If the matter should now be transferred to the Committee on Territories it may be some months before they can familiarize themselves with the whole subject and make a report. It is a new subject to them, and that committee has already a great deal of business before it which would make it impossible to consider this, and I believe that the people of New Mexico will be better served if we allow this whole subject-matter to remain where it is and where it is being orderly considered.

It does not relate to New Mexico alone, but relates to all the Territories and States where citizens have title to land in the territory ceded to the United States by the Guadalupe-Hidalgo treaty and the Gadsden treaty. Wherever the land may be situated the questions are the same, resulting from the same laws; and it is a matter of considerable difficulty to investigate; it takes time. If the subject should be taken from the Committee on Private Land Claims and placed in the hands of the Committee on Territories, I am certain much time will be occupied before that committee will be competent to make a report on the subject. So I would suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that it would be better to send this bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, it was Ordered, That the following papers be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolutions of the Alabama Legislature, commending the proposed national colored industrial exposition.

Petitions of citizens, white and colored, of Alabama, for Congressional aid to the proposed national colored industrial exposition.

Resolutions of the Tennessee Legislature, commending national colored industrial exposition to favorable consideration of Congress.

Also, petition of Colored World's Fair Association.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of James White be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. PLATT. I think this is a proper time to say that on Monday morning next I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to listen to some remarks from myself on the motion to refer the President's message to the Committee on Finance. I understand that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has given notice of some remarks on another subject at that time. I do not wish to interfere with his remarks.

INDIAN WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. DOLPH. Yesterday I gave notice that on to-morrow I would call up the bill (S. 63) for payment of balance unpaid on Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war claims for suppression of Indian hostilities in 1855 and 1856, as found due by commission appointed by Secretary of War, consisting of General Rufus Ingalls, Capt. A. J. Smith, and Hon. L. F. Grover, pursuant to act of Congress, and disallowed by Third Auditor of the Treasury, as per his report of February 7, 1860, for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it and having it referred. I will now renew my notice, as the Senate has agreed to adjourn over until Monday, for Tuesday next after the expiration of morning business, when I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for the purpose of allowing me to make some remarks upon it and have it referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further bills or joint resolutions to be introduced, concurrent and other resolutions are in order. Are there resolutions concurrent or other? If there are none the Chair lays before the Senate the first resolution on the Calendar of resolutions heretofore submitted.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the order of resolutions on a former day take precedence of those to be now introduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive resolutions now introduced.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer a resolution and ask its present consideration.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia objects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution must be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to its consideration, not to its reading.

LAND OFFICE FEES.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. PLUMB, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate whether the charges made by registers and receivers of land offices for reducing to writing testimony in contest and other cases is greater than the cost of performing such service, and, if so, whether, in view of the financial needs of those called on to pay these charges, the same might not properly be reduced to an amount sufficient only to cover the cost of the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

MILITARY CEMETERY AT MOUND CITY, KANS.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate as to whether the military cemetery at Mound City, Kans., is under the charge of his Department, and, if so, whether adequate means have been taken for its care and protection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia objects, and the resolution lies over under the rule until to-morrow. The first resolution coming over from a former day will now be read.

THE MAIL SERVICE.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLUMB January 30, 1888, as follows:

Whereas there have been for many months serious complaints as to the inefficient character of the mail service, especially in the West and South, and the same continue, indicating that the trouble is of a permanent character:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to make thorough inquiry into the cause of such inefficient mail service, and report to the Senate their conclusions thereon, with suggestions as to remedy.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Senator from Kansas to accept an amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to submit remarks on the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order. I inquire whether my objection does not carry that resolution over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not under the rules. This resolution was offered on a former day and objected to, and then it went over under the rules, and is, under the practice of the Senate, now entitled to consideration.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. This is not either of the resolutions offered to-day, then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. PLUMB. It was not my purpose in introducing this resolution to get up anything which could be called a partisan debate or to introduce any suggestion of a partisan character into the consideration of the resolution. But a condition of things exists, by common consent, in the Western country in regard to the mail service which ought to be rectified; and I did not myself enlarge, for what I conceived to be sufficient reasons, upon the existing condition of things, and I reflected upon nobody in any serious way. I might have multiplied the testimony on the subject of the inefficiency of the mail service in the Western country very largely. I do not think it will be necessary to rely on newspapers alone, but the mails received by members of this body and of the other House are burdened with complaints of a similar character. I do not think I have opened my mail for a week without at least one complaint being contained in it, either formally made directly or incidentally in connection with communications on other subjects.

It is not a subject to be considered in connection with any partisan aspect of the case, but with reference merely to the public convenience, which is not being served by the Post-Office Department as it ought to be. There was no necessity for excuses of the kind which had been made by the various Senators who have spoken on this subject in defense of the Department, and there is no recommendation in the report of the Postmaster-General that touches upon this case even remotely.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said that if I would consider the report of the Postmaster-General I would find there recommendations which covered everything necessary to make the service what it ought to be, and the lack of which was not the fault of the Postmaster-General, but the fault of Congress, first, because Congress did not make adequate appropriations for carrying on the service, and, second, because they did not provide such compensation for employés as they ought to have, considering the value of their services and the very great acceptability with which they were rendered.

That is an entire mistake. As I said, there is no recommendation in the report of the Postmaster-General that goes to this question at all. There are recommendations, I have no doubt valuable ones, relating to the book-keeping of the Department, to the system of accounts, to the method of their adjustment, and to determining responsibility, and so on. I have no doubt they are good suggestions. The late Postmaster-General had great merit in that direction as a man of system, a man having ability to organize the force under his immediate control in the Department for the purpose of performing the duties imposed on that force by law. But with reference to all the matters that pertain to the gathering up, to the carrying, and to the distribution of mail matter, the Postmaster-General has as absolute a discretion as though he were the emperor of America. Under the law, every clerk in every post-office is paid a compensation fixed by the Postmaster-General. The law imposes no terms whatever. He may pay $500, $200, a thousand dollars, or $5,000, if he sees fit. Unlike the compensation of postmasters, which is regulated by law, the employés under them have a compensation which the Postmaster-General himself determines. He not only determines their compensation, but he determines absolutely their number. The whole force is discretionary to the last degree. There are no classifications and no grades in all this force.

When it comes to the employés known as postal clerks or route agents, or both in common phrase, the difference is just this: The law provides that they shall be classified and says what the compensation of the different grades shall be; that is to say, fixes a maximum. The lowest grade is fixed at a salary not exceeding $800 per annum, and they are graded above that until the salary is $1,400 per annum; that is to say, not exceeding that amount. The Postmaster-General can number and grade these clerks as he pleases. He can put them all in the $800 class if he sees fit, or in the $1,000 class, or all in the $1,200 class, or all in the $1,400 class, and he can put just as many in each of these grades as he sees fit.

He therefore determines not only the number in gross of these employés, but he determines the compensation they shall have and the grade in which they shall be enumerated for the purposes of the service. The Postmaster-General has never put a single employé of his Department in the $1,400 grade; in other words, he has decided that no employé of that Department of the class known as postal clerks receive as much as $1,400. He therefore, himself, has put a discrimination of price or compensation on this class of employés. If, then, these men are not getting enough for their work, it is because the Postmaster-General has so decreed. The only thing Congress has to do with it is from time to time to give him a lump sum of money which he is authorized to spend, and spend as he sees fit, for compensating this class of employés.

If the Postmaster-General can say that he asked for money which Congress did not give him, he would then put the fault on Congress, except that he might, of course, in a given case employ less of the higher grades and more of the lower grades, and thereby eke out the appropriation; but this Postmaster-General has had ever since he came into office every single dollar that he asked for, and in that he is in striking contrast to his predecessors. Not a single one of his predecessors, for many years at all events, has had anything like as much as he has had to carry on the service. Congress gave him what the Senate freely conceded, and the Postmaster-General has had every single penny of his estimates for every branch of the postal service.

The consequence is that there is no fault with Congress. Not only was this so, but last year when this service began to deteriorate the Postmaster-General turned into the Treasury of the sum of money we appropriated for postal clerks more than $80,000. So he did not use all the money that he estimated for; and the consequence was that the service was not properly rendered. This year he has got again all he asked for. Whether by the 1st day of July all of it will have been expended or not, I do not know; but I do know that by reason of the fact that there have not been persons enough in the service to take care of the mail that was put upon the trains by the people of the United States under the invitation of the Government the service has come into the deplorable condition it is as stated here, and which statements are not denied.

But, Mr. President, I do not care, as far as I am concerned, whether the Postmaster-General turns out or retains the old employés. That is entirely apart from this inquiry. He had a perfect right to turn out as he saw fit, and it was his duty to do it if he found men in the service who were not competent. Allusion has been made to the large number of changes in the personnel of the postmasters. No doubt that was accompanied by an equivalent change in the clerical force of the various post-offices in the country. When I was referred to the report of the Postmaster-General for signal reforms in the mail service, which were pointed out by him and which he thought ought to be adopted, I was reminded of his report on the condition of the dead-letter office. One paragraph of that report is in this language:

> The total number of pieces of original dead mail matter received at the dead-letter office during the year ending June 30, 1887, was 5,335,363, an increase of 543,665 pieces, or nearly 11.4 per cent., over the number received during the last fiscal year, or about 17 per cent. over that received during the year previous. There were also received 239,816 letters without valuable inclosures, returned to the writers, but again sent to the dead-letter office as undeliverable, making, with the original matter received, and 263 held-for-postage letters and 3,523 letters of foreign origin on hand June 30, 1886, the total number of pieces treated during the year 5,578,965, classified as follows.

Then follows the classification. From this it appears that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, the first year of the administration of the Post-Office Department by the late incumbent, the increase of letters returned to the dead-letter office undelivered was 11.4 per cent., while the total increase of the general business was less than 8 per cent., and during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1887, the increase in the number of letters undelivered and returned to the dead-letter office was 17 per cent., more than twice the total average percentage of increase of the postal business of the United States during that period. I do not say that that was because there had been this wholesale change in post-office officials. It is not for me to furnish a reason for it. All this reference to the dead-letter office was apart from any design I had in offering the resolution.

I desire that the postal service of this country may be what the law requires it to be and what the interests of the people require it to be. It is the one sensitive interest that touches all the people of the country; it is the one thing in the public service that affects everybody; and I imagine now, as I said before, that whilst they are desirous of having all facilities for the transaction of the public business, when it comes to the Post-Office Department the first requirement is speed and safety in the delivery of the mail, and economy, if it is to come in, as of course it ought, is to come in later. I am not here to upbraid, as I have never upbraided any one for exhibiting economy.

I think I have said as much for economy in the public service, certainly, as the average of the members of this body. I am the last one to complain of any undue care in the expenditure of public money; but in this case there seems to have been an undue desire to make both ends meet, to exhibit a clean account at the expense of the general public. The condition of things in this Department as it has been latterly administered, has proved to be inconsistent with that safety and certainty in the delivery of the mails which I think is the first requisite.

Mr. President, there has been something said in this debate about the reduction of postage, and it has been urged here as a proposition which was thought to be sound that there was no more reason why the Post-Office Department should be made self-sustaining than that the Army should be made self-sustaining. If that were true, then why not deliver all the mails free? Why charge anybody anything for delivering a letter or a paper or a package of merchandise through the mail? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] well knows that this very question of the deficiency in the revenues itself causes a more careful scrutiny of the outgo, and he knows that if that deficiency were greater than it is now, there would be a more careful scrutiny still.

When we reduced the postage on letters from 3 cents to 2 I was told, on what I believed to be good authority, that we saved $100,000 in a single year to a firm in New York City; but I know of a great many people in this country to whom it did not save more than 5 cents per annum. I know of many others in active business to whom it did not save $25 per annum. I know, therefore, that when we come to reduce this service in such a way as to take its burden off the tax-payers, it is to the benefit largely of a very few people and that it does not affect the general public practically at all. If we were to take off entirely this charge for carrying letters and carrying newspapers, would it reduce the cost of newspapers or of magazines or of merchandise to the persons who purchase them? Not at all.

Mr. BECK. Will it interrupt the Senator if I refer him to what the Postmaster-General has said as to the effect of the reductions we have made and the possibility of further reductions?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. BECK. The Postmaster-General, after commenting on what we have done heretofore in the way of reducing postage and increasing the maximum of weight, says:

> Thus the deficiency charged upon the general Treasury, which two years since was a round seven millions and a year ago but about seventy thousand less, has been reduced almost three-sevenths, while the fair augury from our present circumstances gives hope that during the current year it will nearly if not entirely disappear. If there shall remain at the year's end any excess of cash expenditure above receipts, it can not but be much less than the postages upon the mail matter of the Government itself, estimated to be at least two millions annually, and reasonably its debt to the postal service. It may, therefore, be fairly affirmed that from the beginning of the current fiscal year the postal service has again become substantially self-sustaining, and the prediction be ventured that if the revenues be not further crippled, and only a similar ratio of increasing expenditure be held, the next fiscal year will yield a surplus which should, under the same conditions, annually increase.

All I have to say about my proposed reduction to 1 cent per letter is that we have a very large surplus on hand now, and it is a good time to begin, even if it costs a half million at first, believing that the increase of letters will in a very few years make the service again substantially self-sustaining.

Mr. PLUMB. I was not addressing myself particularly to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, but to the proposition that there was no necessary relation between expense and revenue in this Department, more than there was in the Army. I have believed in the reduction of letter postage from 3 cents to 2, and reported the bill which provided for it—a bill which anticipated by six months the time named in the bill which came from the House. I am in favor of keeping on with such reductions, not, however, totally regardless of the revenue, but in such a way that we may keep them, if not together, at all events not too wide apart, and for the reason, as I said a moment ago, that if that margin is too wide Congress will undoubtedly to some extent inevitably consider the questions of appropriation, and thereby prevent the people from having what they are entitled to as the first consideration, that is, a valuable service instead of a cheap service.

But, Mr. President, I was speaking about this proposition with reference to what means substantially a free delivery all over the United States of everything that may be mailed, and I said that would not be in the interest of the people. It would benefit a certain number of persons who use the mails more freely than anybody else, and who would take all the advantage of that elimination of postage to themselves. The publishers of the great newspapers, the great magazines, the men who ship merchandise, etc., would get all the advantage; they would not give any part of it to those people to whom they send the articles.

Mr. BECK. I would suggest to my friend that what causes a great many letters to go to the dead-letter office, is the idea that by putting on a 1-cent stamp a letter can go to the post-office to which it is directed. A great deal of matter gets back to the dead-letter office in that way, more than one-tenth of it not being received at the place of destination, but sent to the dead-letter office because of deficient postage.

Mr. PLUMB. That does not affect the question; that does not show why there was an increase of 17 per cent. in the letters returned to the dead-letter office under 2-cent postage the last year over the number under 3-cent postage.

Mr. BECK. The improvement of the roads in the far West helped that very much. We have seen places where gullies were filled up with mail-bags unable to get across. That has passed away now, perhaps. That caused many letters to go to the dead-letter office.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator thinks that under former administrations the mails were thrown away. Then they did not get back. That will do very well for a joke, but the serious fact remains that there has been a steady increase, not only a 10 per cent. increase the year before last, but 17 per cent. last year. I do not know of any mail-bags having been thrown into gullies since the time this Administration has been in power.

But I was a good deal edified yesterday at the very kind remarks which were made by the Senators on the other side of the Chamber in regard to the faithful character of the employés of the Government and in regard to the need that there should be greater compensation to them. I never heard that remark made during the time of the Republican administrations. Generally speaking they were then abused as men who were getting too much out of the Treasury, getting pay for services which they did not render at all, or which they rendered very imperfectly, and they were accused—not a few of them, but a great many of them—and one of the staple cries in the canvass preceding the election of Mr. Cleveland was that there were too many officers in all branches of the public service and that they were getting too great compensation.

I have not heard of any of them being cut off, and I have not heard of any of our Democratic brethren advocating a reduction of the pay of any of them. On the contrary, whatever change there has been has been in the direction of an increase both in numbers and in compensation. I defy any man to find a single salary which has been reduced since the time this Administration came into power. On the contrary, a number have been increased. The Departments say, "We can not get along with these underpaid employés." The salaries which were ample according to the ideas prevalent on that side of the Chamber during Republican administrations are now totally inadequate. I am not much surprised at this. They are looking out for their own. They probably were not sincere at the time they were berating Republican administrations for extravagance. Since they have come into power they are found to be just as willing as anybody else to take all they can get.

As I said before, whatever the failings or shortcomings of the railway mail service may be, they are not attributable to the lack of appropriations, or if they are, then it is because the Postmaster-General did not ask for as much as he wanted. They are not attributable to the small pay of the men in that service, because the Postmaster-General himself has declined to give all the pay the law now authorizes. I do not mean to say that his reasons have not been good. I have no doubt in the world that he has consulted the public interests. The result is, however, that on great lines of railway and on all the connecting lines there has been a stoppage of mails, a lack of that proper and speedy delivery which the people have a right to expect and for which they pay, which has disturbed business over large areas of country.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield the floor?

Mr. PLUMB. I do.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, this debate starts out in a singular manner. A Senator rises and informs another Senator that he means to use up the half hour left for morning business when he rises. But that is not the kind of fairness which I look for, and certainly it is not according to the parliamentary custom that I was trained in. When I heard that Senator announce distinctly to his right-hand neighbor that he intended to take that half hour, I knew what it meant. Now, sir, the proper order of business to-day would have been to have considered a resolution of mine offered to change the rules of the Senate, and though I have but three minutes I will use them in saying again to this Senate that it is my right to have that resolution considered, and to appeal to the Senate, notwithstanding the tactics that are resorted to here, to give me a hearing upon that resolution.

I now intend to do more than I started out to do, and that is to let the country know how each man stands on this floor. I repeat that I heard the Senator from Kansas say that he intended to use that half hour. For what purpose? To prevent the consideration of a resolution which would bring before the Senate the British treaty, and as an American I am ready to meet it any day and every hour and never have to take a half hour of time that does not belong to me in order that I may consume time.

Mr. President, when the minute hand on yonder clock shall mark 2 o'clock I shall be called to time, and then shall appeal to the Senate to give me time. I have the public opinion of the British treaty. Here is the New York Tribune of July 21, 1886, and I have a right to read what appears there, as it seems to be signed by Edward J. Phelps and the other man. I suppose he was an earl before he signed his name, as there is but one word as a name signed to it. That is not private property, and notwithstanding the endeavor of the Senator from Kansas to keep me from speaking to this matter to-day, I hope the intelligence of the Senate will allow me to lay before it some few matters, such as a message that emanated from President Grant. I know that the object of this whole treaty business is to get us into executive session. In executive session no man is responsible. It sometimes appears to me that those that have active private secretaries manage to get their speeches out to the press very much in the order in which they said them. Still it is perfectly understood that we are not to hear anything that transpires in executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated by the Chief Clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools."

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does the Senator from West Virginia desire to make any remarks?

Mr. KENNA. I hope gentlemen, according to the notice which I gave the other day, will allow the unfinished business to be laid aside informally.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia that I will give him whatever time he wishes.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to call up the motion to refer the President's message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks that the pending order may be informally laid aside for the purpose of enabling him to submit remarks under the notice previously given.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope under the somewhat peculiar circumstances of the case that I shall not be blamed as lacking due fidelity to the education bill if I assent to the request of the Senator from West Virginia, a Senator that has yet to make a suggestion such as has been so common on the floor in regard to my conduct of this bill hitherto. I would submit the matter to a vote of the Senate, but that I know very well the generosity of the Senate would vote the postponement, and I therefore consent to it myself.

INCREASE OF PENSION RATE.

Mr. QUAY. Before the Senator from West Virginia proceeds with his remarks, I would ask the indulgence of the Senate to be allowed to call up Senate bill No. 1000 and put it on its passage. It is a bill indorsed by many departments of the Grand Army, and to which there is no objection, and it is important that it should be disposed of early.

Mr. KENNA. I have no objection myself, but throwing myself on the indulgence of others, I can not accede to the request.

Mr. QUAY. Then I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. What was the request, to consider a bill without debate?

Mr. QUAY. To consider a bill without debate, which is deemed very necessary. It has been reported unanimously from the proper committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I waive objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the pending order may be informally laid aside for the purpose of enabling the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 1000) to increase the pensions of certain soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the service of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I reserve the right to object if the bill gives rise to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The bill was read. The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That from and after the passage of this act all persons who are or who may become totally helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the military or naval service of the United States shall be entitled to receive a pension of $72 per month.

SEC. 2. That the increase allowed by this act to those persons who may hereafter become totally helpless shall be made to commence in strict conformity with section 4698½, Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to file certain papers to accompany the bill, to be sent to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be received and filed with the bill, if there be no objection.

PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces that the message of the President of the United States and the accompanying reports of the Pacific Railway Commissioners will be referred to the following select committee, under the resolution of the Senate adopted January 24, 1888:

Messrs. FRYE, DAWES, HISCOCK, DAVIS, MORGAN, BUTLER, and HEARST.

The Chair begs the indulgence of the Senate to say that in the formation of the select committee for the consideration of the message of the President and the reports of the Pacific Railway Commissioners, the mover of the resolution, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], would have been entitled to priority for the chairmanship of the committee; but before the resolution was adopted the Chair was informed by the Senator from Massachusetts, who moved the resolution, that under no circumstances whatever could he accept a place upon this committee.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN December 19, 1887, as follows:

Resolved, That the President's annual message be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President, on the 4th day of last month the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] submitted to the Senate and to the country his reply to the President's message. I had read the message of the President more than once, and with more than ordinary care; and, detained from my seat in the Senate by the illness of my little boy at the time the honorable Senator's speech was made, I have likewise devoted to that speech more than a casual examination.

The honorable Senator, as we all know, is conspicuous in the councils of his party. He has had much to do with the shaping of its policies. His assault on the President's position in favor of revenue reform and reduction of taxation is therefore to be regarded as significant. The honorable Senator from Ohio does not speak precipitately. The President's message came on the 6th day of December, 1887, and the motion of the Senator to refer it was made on the 19th day of the same month. His speech upon it was made fifteen days thereafter. Time and thought were devoted to the preparation, and the assault was deliberate. It may, therefore, be fairly assumed that the "reply" of the honorable Senator is exhaustive of his own and of his party's resources on this important subject. In the light of this fact, as the message has provoked his criticism, the speech may justly be regarded as a challenge to the examination of others.

The honorable Senator has been prominent for years in the discussion of subjects of revenue and taxation. I have heard much and read more of what he has said. I have had something of familiarity with his past utterances, and knew something of his past connection with this class of legislation. When I read his recent speech I confess that it surprised me. It presents, Mr. President, the square issue as to whether the honorable Senator's party shall stand in this assault or fall in the defense. His speech is before you. His past record is equally a part and parcel of his contribution to the literature of the country and to the debates of Congress. I can not reconcile the one with the other, nor have I the right in this presence or in decent respect for the proprieties of daily intercourse, to ascribe the irreconcilable conflict to the exigencies of political or party necessity. I only know that the speech of the honorable Senator, taken in connection with his former utterances on the same and similar subjects, presents a contrast as astounding as it is unexpected—a conflict as irreconcilable as it is positive and absolute—an enigma which, confessing my own inability to solve, I will now proceed briefly to analyze and will then leave its further consideration to the Senate and to the country.

The President, in his message, calls attention to the unnecessary accumulation of a surplus of the people's money in the Treasury, already amounting to $55,000,000, presages that it will reach $140,000,000 by the end of the fiscal year, and declares that if disaster shall result from the continued inaction of Congress, the responsibility must rest where it belongs. The honorable Senator has dismissed this solemn warning of the President with a wave of the hand. "The existence of a surplus has been a constant occurrence before and since the close of the war," he says. And, continuing, he declares that—

When, in 1806, President Jefferson had the good fortune of a surplus revenue, he, in his message, said, "To what other objects shall these surpluses be appropriated * * * after the entire discharge of the public debt and during those intervals when war shall not call for them? Shall we suppress the impost and thus give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?" He believed the patriotism of the people would "prefer its continuance and application for the purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, and canals."

From this extract it would be fairly assumed that Mr. Jefferson had treated the unnecessary accumulation of a surplus in the Treasury as lightly as the honorable Senator is disposed to do. But, Mr. President, the extract which has been quoted is unfair to Mr. Jefferson, unfair to the Senate, unfair to the country, and does no credit, if I may be permitted the remark, to the fairness of the honorable Senator himself. I can not say that the Senator has deliberately garbled Mr. Jefferson, but I can and do say that he quoted the half of a sentence and that he omitted the other half, the qualifying part, which will be found on page 68, volume 8, of Mr. Jefferson's works, in the following words:

And such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers.

The Senator has gone further. He has interpolated in his extract from Mr. Jefferson before the word "canals" the word "and," thus, innocently of course, leaving to the hearer and to the reader the impression that the sentence closed there. And the Senator has omitted entirely the declaration of Mr. Jefferson which follows soon after, in the same message, in the following words:

I suppose an amendment to the Constitution by consent of the States necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution, and to which it permits the public funds to be applied.

What a contrast! Mr. Jefferson on the one hand, as the honorable Senator presents him, contemplating as a trivial matter the probable unnecessary accumulation of money in the Treasury with the passing suggestion that it be devoted to internal improvements, and Mr. Jefferson on the other, patriot President as he was, solemnly invoking a change in the organic law of the land, in order to anticipate and to avoid the dangers of a surplus revenue.

In his message of December, 1832, General Jackson declared that the—soundest maxim, of public policy and the principle upon which our republican institutions are founded recommended a proper adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure; and they also require that the expenditure shall be limited to what by an economical administration shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government and necessary to an efficient public service.

And so of Mr. Webster. Contemplating in 1836 a surplus which would be regarded as hardly significant in these days of overtaxation, Mr. Webster declared, and in the very substance of the President's message, that—this present pressure is not known or felt or believed here in anything like its true extent. If we give no relief I know not what may happen, even in this day of high prosperity.

In his message of December 6, 1881, dealing with the surplus in the Treasury, President Arthur said:

In view, however, of the heavy load of taxation which our people have already borne, we may well consider whether it is not the part of wisdom to reduce the revenue, even if we delay a little the payment of the debt. It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden, and that by due economy in the various branches of the public service this may readily be effected.

He then proceeds to recommend certain modifications of internal-revenue taxes and the abolition of others, excepting, however, those upon tobacco in its various forms and upon distilled spirits and fermented liquors, and also makes other exceptions in the same line. He proceeds to add:

The tariff laws also need revision, but that a due regard may be paid to the conflicting interests of our citizens, important changes should be made with caution.

And so said the Democratic national platform of 1884, and so says the President in his late message.

Again, in his message of 1882, President Arthur recommends the abolition of all excise taxes, except those relating to distilled spirits, and in his message of December 1, 1884, he renewed this recommendation, and proceeded to add:

In case these taxes shall be abolished, the revenue that will still remain to the Government will, in my opinion, not only suffice to meet its reasonable expenditures, but will afford a surplus large enough to permit such tariff reduction as may seem to be advisable when the result of recent revenue laws and commercial treaties shall have shown in what quarters those reductions can be most justly effected.

Secretary Folger, in his report of December 4, 1882, presents an estimate in round figures of $75,000,000 of surplus for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1883. He then says:

There could not be that surplus, surely not so great a one, if the subject of taxation were lessened and the rates made smaller upon those retained.

He further declares that the—accumulation in the Treasury of a large surplus, which must occur unless immediate measures are enacted for a reduction of the revenues, is not to be placidly contemplated, and the question confronts us, in what manner may it best be prevented?

His report is elaborate and able. He declares that the—radical cure for the evil is in the reduction of taxation, so that no more will be taken from the people than enough to carry on the Government with economy.

And, after stating the proceeds of revenues from customs for the then current year, he asserts that—

It seems, therefore, that a reduction should be made in the revenue from the customs. * * * And it is believed that the time has arrived when a reduction of duties on nearly all the articles in our tariff is demanded and is feasible.

In addition to this, he continues:

A careful revision of the tariff should be made with a view to placing upon the free-list many articles now paying a duty.

While these views were expressed and enforced by Hon. Mr. Folger, a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, no word denouncing him as a free-trader emanated from the honorable Senator from Ohio. But I quote the language of the former Secretary of the Treasury mainly for the purpose of exhibiting the fact that neither he nor his principal, the President of the United States, regarded an accumulated surplus with complacency. Nor was either confronted by the cry of wolf at the door when he demanded a reduction of the tariff.

In the report of Mr. McCulloch, a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, of December 1, 1884, recommending a commission for the purpose of revising the tariff, and also pressing his views for conservative protection, he declares:

First. That the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufactures should be removed. This can be done in the interest of our foreign trade.

Second. With the changes upon the articles used or consumed by those who are the least able to bear the burden, the taxation should be reduced. This also can be effected without prejudice to our export trade.

With these utterances staring in the face of the honorable Senator from Ohio, we heard no assault by him upon the honorable Secretary of the Treasury as a free-trader. Thus, Mr. President, I assert that prominent officials of the Government, of late years especially, have united in their antipathy of an accumulating, unnecessary surplus in the Treasury, and have denounced over and excessive taxation.

We are all familiar with the recommendations of the late Mr. Manning when Secretary of the Treasury, and of Mr. Fairchild, the present Secretary, in the line of tax reduction.

So, Mr. President, four successive Secretaries, two Republican and two Democratic, and two successive Presidents of the United States, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, have united in their condemnation of a surplus, idle revenue, and their demand for a reduction of the public burden.

And thus it has been throughout the history of the Government. There never was a time, there never was an administration, there never was a sentiment among the people, excepting possibly the Senator himself, which justified or calmly contemplated the unnecessary withdrawal from circulation of the currency of the country and its hoarding and holding in the public Treasury. The honorable Senator from Ohio is the only person who seems to regard such a condition as a "good fortune." Such a condition has always created apprehension, and, sometimes, contributed to panic and financial disaster. And yet, when the President, inspired by the teachings of his country's history, dares to raise his voice to arrest impending calamity, the honorable Senator from Ohio would laugh to scorn the faithful admonition and hold up its author to the ridicule of the public. But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator has forgotten his own anxieties when surrounded in both Houses of Congress by a majority of his own party friends, and when he felt more keenly perhaps the political responsibilities of the situation.

It was in 1882, when impelled by conditions somewhat similar to those which confront us to-day, that the honorable Senator exclaimed in this Senate:

There is no sentiment in this country stronger now than that Congress has neglected its duty thus far in not repealing taxes that are obnoxious to the people and unnecessary for public use; and if we should still neglect that duty we should be properly held responsible by our own constituents. Now, sir, for one, I am determined that this sin shall not lay at my door.

It is not strange, perhaps, that the Senator has somewhat modified his views in the presence of one Democratic administration and in the prospect of another.

Further on, Mr. President, constituting himself the censor of a House of Representatives with a small majority, Democratic, struggling with their own differences as to method, the Senator in his recent speech proceeds to say:

I may also ask, why did not Congress then apply the remedy? The Forty-ninth Congress lived its two years and died. Mr. Cleveland was then as now President of the United States. The House of Representatives contained a large majority of his political friends. They alone had the initiative, the origination, the constitutional power to introduce a bill to reduce taxes. Why was it not done?

Such, sir, is the animadversion of the honorable Senator when a House of Representatives, with a small Democratic majority, can not do as it pleases in the face of a determined opposition. But hear the observations of the same honorable Senator, when a Republican Senate, of which he was one, dealing with the same subject, finds itself helpless to carry out its will:

We acknowledge the power of the minority here, almost our equal, because whether there is a majority of the Senate is a question always of doubt and uncertainty. We acknowledge their power; we pay obeisance to it; we respect their power.

And such, Mr. President, is the testimony of one who is not without experience himself. "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?"

The honorable Senator kindly agrees with the President that unnecessary and extravagant appropriations ought not to be made. To avoid a surplus of revenue "no money," he says, "should be collected from the people except to meet the requirements of the Government properly and economically administered." This expression is superfluous on the part of the Senator, unless it be intended to apply to the existing condition of affairs. He is therefore in harmony with the President, upon whom he makes his assault, when the President uses the following language in his message:

When we consider that the theory of our institutions guaranties to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise, with only such deduction as may be his share towards the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him, it is plain that the exaction of more than this is indefensible extortion and a culpable betrayal of American fairness and justice. This wrong inflicted upon those who bear the burden of national taxation, like other wrongs, multiplies a brood of evil consequences.

But the honorable Senator assails the President because, speaking of spirits, tobacco, and beer, the President says that "there appears to be no just complaint of these taxes by the consumers of these articles, and that there seems to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardships to any portion of the people." The Senator then proceeds to say that—

It may be that there is no complaint by the consumers. But can he say that of the producers of these articles? They are all either the product of the farm or immediate fruits of the product of the farm. Their chief cost is in the leaf-tobacco, or the corn, rye, wheat, and barley of the farm. Do not farmers complain of this tax? If the President thinks they do not he is greatly mistaken. * * * The traditions and policy of our people are against internal taxes. During and since the war they were a necessity. Now, if continued, they should be reduced; especially the tax on tobacco, no longer necessary, should be remitted.

When, may I be permitted to ask, did the honorable Senator undergo a change of heart on this important subject? In 1867 he declared:

The luxuries are mostly contained in the items spirits, wines, and tobacco. These are undoubtedly the first objects that should be taxed.

In 1870 he declared:

And these two taxes on spirits and tobacco, together with the tax on fermented liquors, over $6,000,000, are paid without complaint in every part of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so now. It is not the consumers that complain, but the manufacturers; the farmers complain.

Mr. KENNA. I beg pardon, but I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon. I will not interrupt the Senator, if he does not wish to yield; but he seemed to appeal to me personally, and I felt bound to say what I have said.

Mr. KENNA. I am frank to say that my whole appeal is to the Senator personally, every word of it, as he will see as I proceed.

In 1882 the honorable Senator said:

These taxes ought to be left as a part of our permanent system of taxation as long as any other taxes, internal or external, more oppressive, remain on the statute-books.

And I ask the honorable Senator, when he comes to answer that question, whether he says that now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you want my answer?

Mr. KENNA. I will yield to the Senator to answer the question, but not to make a speech.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do say that as long as any system of internal taxation about which I was speaking——

Mr. KENNA. Ah! Ah!

Mr. SHERMAN. I say as long as that remains, I believe this tax ought to remain; but the tax on the internal-revenue list that I propose to repeal, and the only one I propose to repeal, is the tax on tobacco, which is an article produced by the farmer, raised on the farm, four-fifths the cost of which is in the raw material. That is the only internal-revenue tax I propose to repeal. I do not propose to repeal the others.

Mr. KENNA. Now, I think we all understand the Senator from Ohio. I shall answer him by reading what I have just read from him, and then in order that the Senate and the country may understand precisely what the Senator's views really are on this question, I shall proceed to read further from what he has said at various times.

These taxes ought to be left as a part of our permanent system of taxation as long as any other taxes, internal or external, more oppressive remain on the statute-books.

And again, in 1882, the honorable Senator, growing eloquent on this subject, declared in the Senate, and I direct attention especially to it:

I do not hesitate to say that there is a general desire among all classes of our people, without regard to party, that the remnants of the internal system shall be swept away, except on whisky, tobacco, and beer. * * * This tobacco tax, of all others—

Now, in connection with the Senator's remarks, made only three minutes ago, I want his attention to this declaration of his:

This tobacco tax, of all others, is the easiest collected, the most certain, increasing constantly from year to year, dependent upon an appetite that will be indulged no matter what may be the tax; a tax that has been more stable than any other. No amount of tax likely to be put upon tobacco will prevent its being chewed and smoked and snuffed. In all other countries where taxation prevails this is a favorite subject of taxation. * * * I say the tax on tobacco does not diminish the price to the farmer who raises it. * * * And I say we are throwing off a tax, which, by the judgment of all nations, is the best source of taxation.

What, I may again ask, has brought about this change of heart and of conviction on the part of the honorable Senator? Is it a change in the method of producing tobacco? We know better than that. Is it a change in the method of taxing it? There has been no change in that process. Is it a change in the condition which confronted us in 1882, and which confronts us now? The conditions are practically the same. Has the change in the political complexion of the administration affected the honorable Senator, or have we reached that happier period when men decline to smoke or to chew or to snuff? I leave these questions to the consideration of the honorable Senator from Ohio.

But the Senator has undertaken to say that the surplus in the Treasury is due to the failure and refusal of the President and of the House of Representatives to permit the application of public funds to objects of necessity and legitimate demand upon the Treasury. I shall not go into all that he says upon the subject; two instances will suffice to characterize the whole argument. He denounces Congress for its failure to provide subsidies for postal communication with the South American States, and in the same connection denounces the President for his failure to approve the river and harbor bill. The question of subsidies is familiar to the whole people. The antagonism of the Administration and of his party to the subsidizing of special interests or classes needs no defense at my hands. This invention of the Republican party has never found favor with the Democracy. It is against the fairness and spirit and genius of our institutions.

Subsidies to ships! We have no ships! Your policy of pretended protection has driven our commerce from the high seas. You confine our producers to the limitation of their home market, and you deny them the agencies to carry the fruits of their industry to the markets of the world. Sir, we have no ships! A line to Brazil, does the Senator say? Perhaps. Another straggler here or there? It may be. But like the ancient parrot of the Attures, which sat croaking the language of the people who had taught it after the last of that tribe had been gathered to his fathers, they serve but to make more plaintive the appeal for a recall of the cruelties of our commercial fate. We have no ships. We can not build them to compete with the Continent or the Clyde, and your obstructive policy will not allow us to sail them under our flag.

The report of the present Secretary of the Treasury shows that our carrying trade has gone down from 75 per cent. in 1856, to 14 per cent. in 1887, and this in the face of the development of a continent, and in spite of the energies of the most enterprising people in the world. And so the little army of American citizens who might be engaged in carrying our products—a service for which last year we paid more than $100,000,000 to foreigners—have been left ashore to enter into competition for a livelihood with those who are expected to join in the universal hallelujah to republican protection to American ships.

The honorable Senator has spoken of Schedule E and of Class D of our tariff laws. But, Mr. President, there is another class to which the Senator has failed to allude. Where is your Class "Ships?" Turn to that! But ships are prohibited, you say. So they are. They have their classification in fact nevertheless. Ships and obscene books, they are prohibited! Ships and counterfeit coin, they are prohibited! Ships and contagious diseases, they are prohibited! There, sir, contemplate it! There is your Class "Ships," grim monster of national injustice and of commercial sickness and sorrow and death.

But if the honorable Senator views with complacency the surplus in the Treasury he may likewise congratulate himself that we have no surplus in ships. We have the obscene literature. That can come. We have the counterfeit coin. That will find its way to our shores. We have the contagious disease. In spite of all our quarantine, that will invade our ranks and lay our people low. But, thanks to the inspiration of Republican protection, the Senator from Ohio may exclaim in the pride of his heart, "We have no ships!" What an illustration of the extremes to which men may come when the honorable Senator would continue the policy of driving our ships from the sea by the excess of arbitrary protection and subsidize their relic, while in the same act he would put sugar on the free-list in the interest of the "Pampas and the Helots" of whom he speaks, and subsidize the memory of its American producers.

It is suggested to me by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to read, and I will read, in this connection what the Secretary of the Treasury says in his report on the subject of the decline of our commerce:

A citizen of the United States may buy a foreign-built vessel in a foreign port; he may put the United States flag upon it and trade with all the countries of the world except his own. Our Government will protect him with all its power in such trade; but if he brings his ship with our flag upon it to one of our ports, our Government will confiscate it or impose prohibitory duties. He may, however, put the flag of any other country on that same ship and bring it to his home without molestation by our Government; it is then protected by the power of a foreign country. It is difficult to understand why it would not be well to so change our navigation laws as to allow foreign-built ships owned by our citizens to come and go between this and other countries while bearing the flag of the country of their owners.

But the honorable Senator goes on:

The President, on what I regard as a frivolous reason, refused his signature to a bill providing for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. President, I yield to no man a stronger desire than my own to encourage proper appropriations for great works of national importance which are calculated to facilitate water transportation. For many years I have, both in and out of Congress, held myself ready, by voice and by vote, to support proper measures in that direction. I believe that judicious expenditure in the line of improvement of navigable waters which are within the jurisdiction of Congress is money expended in the direction of the public interest as against monopoly and exclusion, and has a valuable tendency to sustain and perpetuate a natural element of free competition.

But, Mr. President, the President had already approved a river and harbor bill appropriating more than $10,000,000 the preceding year. The last river and harbor bill was presented for his signature within an hour of the final adjournment of Congress. It appropriated $14,000,000 and covered many pages of text. The "frivolous" reason to which the honorable Senator from Ohio alludes consisted of the fact that the President was called on to affix his signature to a bill appropriating $14,000,000 of the public money without the opportunity to read or know a line of its provisions or an object of its application. He was engaged in the very act of reading the bill, and in this Capitol, when the hammers fell and Congress adjourned.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENNA. For a correction I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Either the Senator is misinformed about that or I am. The bill to which he refers——

Mr. KENNA. I will not yield further for that purpose. I speak from my own personal observation. I was in the room occupied by the President and his Cabinet, and I saw the President, as other Senators here saw him, engaged in the very act of examining the bill when Congress adjourned.

Mr. SHERMAN. The river and harbor bill?

Mr. KENNA. The river and harbor bill, in which, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I was interested.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator makes that statement I do not controvert it; but I understand just the reverse.

Mr. KENNA. I speak from personal knowledge on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood that the bill was delivered to the President three or four days before the adjournment; but still that is a matter which the records will show.

Mr. KENNA. If I am understood as saying that it was delivered to him within an hour of the adjournment, I submit to the Senator's correction. Of that fact I do not speak personally. I was stating the fact of his being engaged in the examination of the bill at the time of the adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the bill was placed in his possession three or four days before the final adjournment. I do not know any of these facts; the records will show them.

Mr. KENNA. I yield to the correction as to the time of the delivery of the bill to the President, because of that I do not speak from personal knowledge, but the fact that he and his Cabinet were in this building engaged in the examination of the bill at the time when they had more than a hundred for examination, and that they were engaged in that examination until the very hour of adjournment, I do know.

Mr. SHERMAN. He may have been engaged in examining some other bills, pension bills or the like, which he was considering, for he certainly had the river and harbor bill three or four days according to the record.

Mr. KENNA. It is useless for the Senator to undertake to divert me by the introduction of other subjects. I am not going to be diverted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KENNA. I can not yield; I beg pardon of the Senator. After I am through I will, of course, cheerfully answer the Senator's question as far as I can.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. KENNA. I will yield to the honorable Senator promptly, the moment I get through. [Applause.]

Faithfulness to public trust and a judicious regard for the public interest stood alike as barriers to an act whose omission the honorable Senator from Ohio condemns. To such a verge have we come at last that the President is denounced because he does not choose to play "hide and go seek" with the trivial sum of $14,000,000 and affix his signature to a bill appropriating that amount of the public money, "sight unseen," simply to aid in the disposition of an unseemly surplus.

But the honorable Senator complains that the House of Representatives refused to pass a bill for the support and encouragement of schools. Mr. President, I have been the friend of what is known as the Blair educational bill to which the Senator alludes. In spite of the warning of many Senators that it would tend to break down the public-school system of the States and eventually defeat the object it was designed to accomplish, a general sympathy for its purposes, even with serious misgivings of its policy, commended it to my solicitude and elicited my support of the measure. But when the honorable Senator from Ohio invokes the Blair bill in opposition to the relief of the present burdens of the people, and holds it up a menace and a reproach to the demands of the country for reform and a reduction of taxation, the Blair bill and I must part company.

I have been afraid before, but yielded that apprehension to a generous impulse for the schools, that the theory of the Blair bill would ultimately interfere with the school systems of the States. But when it is boldly asserted now that it shall interfere with the tax system of the Government and contribute by its passage to the perpetuation of intolerable burdens upon the people, I can not yield to that. I shall interpose my objection to that, and I admonish the honorable Senator from Ohio that if his purpose has been to defeat the passage of the Blair bill in this Congress he has adopted an entirely practical and feasible way to do it. I for one shall accept in this feature at least the full force and measure of his argument.

But, Mr. President, the Senator makes a sweeping review of the President's message. In a single dash he disposes of it all:

All this is under the pretext that the surplus revenue must be diminished,

He says.

Does not experience show that reducing the duties increases importation and adds to the revenue?

Let us examine this assertion, and invoke the testimony of the Senator himself in solving it. The tariff laws in force now, with some modifications adopted by peculiar and by questionable methods in 1882, are substantially those known as the "Morrill tariff of 1867." The Senator from Ohio aided largely in passing that tariff. He denied that the large increase of that period was intended for the protection of labor. He denied that reducing the duties increased the revenue, for he supported large additions to the duties for that very purpose. And so the Senator has recognized the fact, which we are all bound to admit, that whether the lowering or increasing the duty will add to the revenue is a question depending upon other considerations than the arbitrary amount of the schedule. A duty may be so high as to prevent importations and yield no revenue. The other extreme is free trade, which would likewise destroy the income; and nobody asks for free trade. The true solution is the fair and just medium which shall produce the revenues the country needs, no more and no less, according to the plain dictates of common honesty, as declared by the last Democratic platform, in "a spirit of fairness to all interests."

But, Mr. President, let us, as I have suggested, compare with his present attitude the former utterances of the Senator from Ohio himself on the subject. The President, in his message, uses the following language:

Our progress toward a wise conclusion will not be improved by dwelling upon the theories of protection and free trade. This savors too much of bandying epithets. It is a condition which confronts us, not a theory. Relief from this condition may involve a slight reduction of the advantages which we award our home productions, but the entire withdrawal of such advantages should not be contemplated. The question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant; and the persistent claim made in certain quarters that all efforts to relieve the people from unjust and unnecessary taxation are schemes of so called free-traders is mischievous and far removed from any consideration for the public good.

The Senate and the country will be surprised to find how closely allied to the sentiment of these expressions were the utterances of the honorable Senator from Ohio when this very tariff of 1867 was under consideration:

In considering so complicated a subject as a tariff, nothing can be more deceptive than the application of such general phrases as a protective tariff; a revenue tariff; a free-trade tariff. Every law imposing a duty on imported goods is necessarily a restraint on trade. It imposes a burden upon the purchase and sale of imported goods and tends to prevent every importation. The expression a free-trade tariff involves an absurdity. * * * so the phrase protective tariff may be applied to every bill imposing duties on imported goods.

This was in 1867, when the large increase demanded in our impost duties, by the honorable Senator and by his associates, was based on the necessity for increased revenue, and on that alone.

"The first and obvious inquiry of every Senator discussing the question," said the Senator from Ohio, "is, how much is it necessary to raise by tariff on imported goods," and, going on, he declared:

IT IS, THEREFORE, SIMPLY AN ABSURDITY TO TALK NOW ABOUT FREE-TRADE TARIFF, AND TO TALK ABOUT A PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS UNNECESSARY, BECAUSE THE WIT OF MAN COULD NOT POSSIBLY FRAME A TARIFF THAT WOULD PRODUCE ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY MILLION DOLLARS IN GOLD WITHOUT AMPLY PROTECTING OUR DOMESTIC INDUSTRY.

Yet, Mr. President, when our finances are reduced to a gold basis, and when this very system is yielding in a single year the enormous sum of $212,000,000 in gold, or its equivalent, and when a Democratic administration dares to suggest a reduction of this burden to something like the proportions which the honorable Senator himself declared would be amply sufficient for the purpose of protection, the Senator raises his voice in denunciation, and advertises the President and his party as bent on free trade and destruction. The Senator from Ohio went further, when he was pressing the adoption of the high rates of the Morrill tariff:

They [the manufacturers] do not ask protection against the pauper labor of Europe, but they ask protection against the creation of our own laws. These are, our paper currency and our internal taxation. * * * It is not British or foreign competition that produces distress among the manufacturing interests of this country at this time. It is the effect of our laws. The chief evil arises from the depreciated currency.

Mr. President, our paper currency has long since been reduced to a gold basis; our internal taxation, to which the honorable Senator alluded, in its effect upon the manufacturers, has long since to that extent been repealed; the stamp taxes, the income tax, the conveyance tax, and a multitude of impositions upon which he then based his argument have disappeared from the statute-books. The productions of manufacturers have been reduced to a specie basis and they have been relieved of special burdens. Yet, it was at the time of the adoption of this very tariff that the Senator from Ohio declared:

If you reduce their productions [the manufacturers'] to a specie basis, and put them on the same footing they were on before the war, the present rates of duty would be too high. It would scarcely be necessary for any branch of industry to be protected to the extent of the present tariff law.

Who would believe that the same honorable Senator who gave utterance to these expressions upon the adoption of the laws which have remained substantially in force ever since, could acknowledge authorship of the speech which was recently addressed to the Senate and to the country; and yet, Mr. President, I find the speech I allude to in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 5, of this year, and the expressions I have quoted in a speech of the same honorable Senator delivered in the Senate on the 23d of January, 1867, as published in a book entitled "Speeches and Reports on Finance and Taxation, by John Sherman," and edited by himself.

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator has appealed to the labor of the country. When we would undertake to lift the burdens of the laboring man and give him equal opportunities in the great struggle for life, the Senator declares "that we would degrade him."

The Senator from Ohio has made history on that subject also. On the 4th of July, 1864, under his special patronage, a bill to encourage immigration, afterwards known as the contract labor bill, became a law. Its second section reads as follows:

That all contracts that shall be made by emigrants to the United States in foreign countries, in conformity to regulations that may be established by the said commissioner, whereby emigrants shall pledge the wages of their labor for a term not exceeding twelve months, to repay the expenses of their emigration, shall be held to be valid in law, and may be enforced in the courts of the United States, or of the several States and Territories; and such advance, if so stipulated in the contract, and the contract be recorded in the recorder's office in the county where the emigrant shall settle, shall operate as a lien upon any land thereafter acquired by the emigrant, whether under the homestead law when the title is consummated or on property otherwise acquired, until liquidated by the emigrant.

So unpopular did this section become that a bill to repeal it was promptly passed by the Forty-eighth Congress in 1885 when the question was agitated here, and more than once the House of Representatives had assailed it.

It brought the "industrious laborer," of whom the honorable Senator has said our "protective system has brought a vast army to this country," to a strange and to him a foreign country. It mortgaged for a year his earnings and his liberty. It was the first formal and official introduction of foreign serfdom into free America. When the bill was under consideration the honorable Senator said:

If an official document prepared from official sources could be furnished them, giving them accurate information as to the needs of labor in this country, there is no doubt it would encourage a great deal of immigration. In the Western States labor is absolutely demanded; common laborers are receiving a very high price.

Could it have been that the Chinese immigration which poured into our western gates created the "very high price" of "common labor" of which the Senator complained, or was this measure enacted with a purpose of prophecy to accord with the spirit in which he soon after declared that "our manufacturers did not need protection against the pauper labor of Europe."

In very recent years the honorable Senator voted against a bill to restrict the immigration of the Chinaman. He afterwards pleaded for a limitation of the term of the exclusion to five years, and finally voting for the last bill he insisted that every skilled laborer in China should be excluded from its operation.

Mr. President, these are matters of public history, of public record, and it is right that they should go to the country with the speech of the Senator from Ohio.

It is undoubtedly true that while our excess of impost duties has had a tendency to build up and foster monopolies and enrich the few at the expense of the many, it has had a like tendency to invoke free competition to labor and to reduce the workingmen to the minimum of compensation. It has drawn a vast army from Europe, as the Senator says, who enter into competition with the labor they find employed when they reach America, and who enter into like competition among themselves. It has not simply invited a tide of honorable and manly emigration, to which extent we would all concur in its beneficence, but by the increased cost of his living and the multiplied exactions from his earnings it has made life a precarious burden to him here. By artificial and false stimulus to his industries for a time it has invited millions into the walks of his open competition from every hill-top and valley in our own country and from every quarter and section of the civilized world. The Hungarian, the Italian, and the Chinaman have crowded him alike.

They have "come from every nation, come from every way"—

Come as the waves come,
When navies are stranded;
Come as the winds come,
When forests are rended.

Take for example your lumbering interests on the lakes. I am told, and by those who know, that whenever wages in the United States are not satisfactory to the operator, instantly the borders of Canada are filled with posters and hand-bills, "Lumbermen wanted" at such and such a place and at such and such a price in the United States. And so, under a system of protection to labor, the American operator and owner is protected against the importation of Canadian lumber and the Canadian lumberman is protected in his right to come into the United States, drive out our own citizens, and fell our forests. Thus the operator can maintain his profit, while labor is destroyed under this gigantic forgery of its interests and its name. And thus has our free trade in labor multiplied its competition, held it in subjection, and left it where it is to-day, conscious of injustice and wrong, and bent on their redress.

Yet our laboring men are blandly told that they are to bind themselves hand and foot forever and forever to a system which gives them all the free trade and competition, and to others and the privileged few the monopoly and the profit.

Sir, I am mistaken in the freedom, the intelligence, and the manhood of American labor, natural born and naturalized, if, with its power at the polls, it allow this condition longer to exist.

Mr. President, I have no further purpose in this discussion than to indicate my co-operation in the demand of the President in the interests of the people for the reduction of their burdens, as he stands squarely by the platform upon which he was elected. The only question before the Senate is the motion of the honorable Senator from Ohio to refer the President's message to the appropriate committee.

A bill to reform the revenue system and reduce taxation will come from the House of Representatives. I do not doubt that it will be framed in a spirit of conservative fairness to all sections of the country, and to all interests.

Much has been said which seemed calculated to alarm the country, and I am not sure it has not been designed for that purpose, with reference to the President's recommendations for reduction of taxation. Much that his message contains has been inadvertently or purposely overlooked. He declares that—

The considerations which have been presented touching our tariff laws are intended only to enforce a recommendation that the surplus revenues of the Government be prevented by the reduction of our customs duties, and at the same time to emphasize a suggestion that in accomplishing this purpose we may discharge a double duty to our people by granting to them a measure of relief from tariff taxation in quarters where it is most needed, and from sources where it can be most fairly and justly accorded. Nor can the presentation made of such consideration be with any degree of fairness regarded as evidence of unfriendliness toward our manufacturing interests, or of any lack of appreciation of their value and importance.

He further says:

These interests constitute the leading and most substantial element of our national greatness and furnish the proud proof of our country's progress. * * * No demand is made that they shall forego all the benefits of governmental regard. It is not proposed to entirely relieve the country of this taxation. It must be extensively continued as a source of the Government's income, and in the readjustment of our tariff the interests of American labor engaged in manufacture should be carefully considered, as well as the preservation of our manufactures. It may be called protection, or by any other name, but relief from the hardships and dangers of our present tariff laws should be devised with a special precaution against imperiling the existence of our manufacturing interests. * * * All will acknowledge the force of an argument which involves the welfare and liberal compensation of our laboring people. Our labor is honorable in the eyes of every American citizen; and as it lies at the foundation of our development and progress, it is entitled, without affectation or hypocrisy, to the utmost regard. The standard of our laborers' life should not be measured by that of any other country less favored, and they are entitled to their full share of all our advantages. * * * But the reduction of taxation demanded should be so measured as not to necessitate or justify either the loss of employment by the workingman, nor the lessening of his wages; and the profits still remaining to the manufacturer after a necessary readjustment should furnish no excuse for the sacrifice of the interests of his employés either in their opportunity to work or in the diminution of their compensation.

So we see that the cry of the demagogue the country over that the President and his policy are aiming at the lessening of a just reward of the labor of the country is as indecent as it is false. The system of taxation in force in this country for the last twenty years has been a standing menace and a source of constant injury to the laborer himself. It has made four or five States of the Union more wealth than all the rest command, and has proven an apt illustration of the doctrines and theories of the Republican party, which have had for their object the creation and fostering of privileged classes and special advantages against the masses and the many. Under its divine inspiration for the promotion of the "interests of the workingman" it has squandered millions of acres of the public domain on private corporations and foreign syndicates, thus establishing in free America a system of landlordism unheard of until the Republican party came into power. It has appealed for the votes of the people upon liberal application of their own treasury to purposes of avarice and corruption. It has said to the ship-owner, Give us your support and we will subsidize your ships out of the people's money. It has said to the manufacturer, Give us your support and we will enrich your coffers out of the public treasury by what we will call your protection. At the same time we will maintain labor at starvation rates by the increased cost of its consumptions. We will maintain a system of free competition to labor, both at home and from abroad, even to the extent of 150,000 imported Chinamen who are now driving your industrial strong arms from the Pacific coast. It has taken the great corporations of this country into the high places, as in the instance of the tempter of old; it has pointed out to them vast empires of the people's domain and said unto them, "Give us your support and all this shall be yours;" and it has kept the pledge. I shall not quote in detail the action of the honorable Senator from Ohio in favor of these great subsidies in lands, although you will find the record an interesting one in contrast with his observation in the House in 1860, that to "invite every man who desires to locate on Western lands to go there and make for himself a home, is the only honest, the only noble, the only manly system of disposing of the public lands."

And so the political machine has gone on. Who will deny that the system which has prevailed under Republican administrations in this country, and for years past has made more strikes, driven more men from employment, filled the country with more tramps, aggravated more distress, created wider discontent, and produced more starvation and death than any other system the country ever saw? Is it not time for a change? And yet when the President of the United States, confronting bravely the solemn requirements of his high office and daring to preserve a patriotic regard for his public responsibilities, ventures the suggestion of a remedy which has over and over again been presented and demanded by one administration after another, he is assailed by one of the acknowledged leaders of the Republican organization as frivolous in his action or bent on destruction. Sir, it had as well be understood now as hereafter that this movement for reform and the relief of public burden in which the President has gallantly and manfully taken the lead, means practical result. The country is aroused to the justice of its demands. The ranks will be closed. A spirit of fairness and of justice will prevail in all things, and both the benefits and the burdens of our system of taxation will be distributed fairly. That system, both internal and external, will be treated as a whole.

True, the President does not recommend the reduction of internal-revenue taxes; true also that in discussing the wool question, speaking of raw wool, he uses this language: "Reasons are suggested why the removal or reduction of this duty should be included in a revision of our tariff laws." But it is equally true, as I have already quoted, that with reference to this and every other suggestion made by him, the President declares, "The considerations which have been presented touching our tariff laws are intended only to enforce an earnest recommendation that the surplus revenues of the Government be prevented by the reduction of our customs duties," etc.

The Senator from Ohio has been greatly agitated over the wool question. It may be that his vote in 1882 to reduce the duty on wool, when as a leading member of the conference committee which practically framed that revision he led in the movement, has made him unduly sensitive on this subject. I may be pardoned the suggestion that having aided in reducing the product of the wool-growers, he may now feel impelled to "pull the wool over their eyes." I should not use such an expression, Mr. President, if it were not for the statement made in open Senate and in the hearing of the country by the honorable Senator in 1881—and I quote his words—that "anything that will beat down that party and build up our own is justifiable in morals and in law."

But, Mr. President, both the internal and external tax systems will be treated as a whole. The tax on tobacco will, I do not doubt, be reduced or wholly repealed; of this I shall be glad, and my vote on the subject will be governed by what I deem to be the fairness of the general revision. Iron and coal and the wool and other products of labor and of care and of enterprise will not be sacrificed in this revision. They will stand as other industries of the country stand, subject to their fair share in the benefits of whatever the system may be as revised, and bearing as, they ought to bear, their fair share of the burdens of the common lot. Why should the Senator from Ohio be apprehensive on this subject when he is surrounded in this Chamber by a majority of his own party friends? Why should he seek to alarm the wool-growers or the producers of the country when a majority of his own way of thinking stand here ready to obey his behest for their safety? Is it because of the honorable Senator's having once voted to reduce the duty on wool, or is it because he declared in 1882 "that whether there is a majority of the Senate is a question always of doubt and uncertainty."

Even if it turn out, Mr. President, in the fluctuations of politics, and the uncertain quality of the calculations of men that the honorable Senator should find himself at the head of a minority instead of a majority on this question here, as in the other House, I shall be pardoned for assuring him in his own language that

We acknowledge their power, we pay obeisance to it, we respect their power.

Mr. President, there is ample room for a reduction of the existing taxes and of the burdens of the people without violence to any interest. No extremes need be resorted to. The measure of duty which fills the difference between the cost of production here and its cost abroad and transportation to our shores is protection to labor and fair competition to the employer. The measure which goes beyond that limit is monopoly to the employer and unfair competition to labor.

The laboring man need not heed the suggestion of the Republican orator who looks him in the face and declares, "I am better than my brother." The Democratic party has never been the enemy of labor. Maintaining its ancient doctrine of home rule, special privileges to none, and equality before the law, it has ever been, as it ever will be, the safest guardian of the poor and the humble. Labor will find under its control of the Government a fair, and, I trust, a securer and a better reward; but monopoly fortified and intrenched behind twenty years and more of Republican exaction and misrule, will have to go. Its citadel will be stormed, and in this Congress. Its exactions will be denied. Its hold on the throats of the masses will be broken. The mask of Republican protection will be torn from the face of hypocrisy and deceit and extortion.

The system which, in the language of the honorable Senator from Ohio, has brought a "vast army of industrious laborers to our shores," will be so modified that that vast array, whether engaged in the line of pursuits to be found in the East, or in the broader expanses of the great West, shall not be starved in the interests of money and monopoly when here. The details will suggest themselves for our consideration when the House shall have sent us a bill. We will then look, as I believe the House will look, to the generous and equitable treatment of every product in the list.

The question before us at this time is the bare reference of the President's message. The debate upon that question has been precipitated and calculated to alarm and to terrify the country. But the country has been long preparing for this conflict. It is now ready for the fray. It is my candid judgment that the great masses of the people will indorse and support this brave struggle for their rights, and for the relief of their bondage. Our people are becoming more and more intelligent day by day. Information is better disseminated and our action here is subjected to a daily scrutiny which would not have been dreamed of twenty years ago. A generation of young men is rising up about us who are to control the destinies of the Republic. They are its pride and its hope. While places of power and position are open to their aspirations, they are to be taught that the password to their future advancement is "equality before the law." They are to realize their obligations to country, but they are to realize and cherish as well the obligations of country to them. The child of labor and the child of fortune, linked in a common destiny, bound by the ties which should know no breaking, are to go on together guided by the spirit of our institutions and inspired by the genius of our country's freedom. These are to constitute the men of the Republic.

What constitutes a state?
Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall, or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, proud navies ride;
Nor starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed Baseness wafts perfume to pride
No! Men, high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued,
In forest, brake, or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], to refer the President's annual message to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is not wearisome to the Senate, I will detain it only a few moments.

Mr. BLAIR. The unfinished business was simply laid aside informally for the convenience of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that can be considered as still pending in the same way. I will detain the Senate but a very few moments.

Mr. BLAIR. I give notice that I shall object to any further postponement, and I hope the Senator from Ohio will be brief.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the school bill be laid before the Senate, and that it be laid aside informally to allow me to proceed, and I shall go right on for a few moments.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; let the bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays the unfinished business before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. "A bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks that it be temporarily laid aside. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I congratulate my friend from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], for I really esteem him such, that he is able now to make proclamation of the fact, which should have been made ten years ago, that the ranks of the Democratic party are closed. It may be that we shall now have a distinct, affirmative issue presented by the Democratic party. I hope to God we shall. They have had possession of the legislative powers of the Government in the main, certainly they have had the control of the House of Representatives, for ten out of the past twelve years, and they have also had possession of the powers of the Senate for two years, yet there is not a single affirmative proposition or measure which they have submitted to the judgment of the American people. If there is, I want to know what it is.

On the tariff question I congratulate my friend that he is able to say, and I hope he will make it good, that the Democratic party have closed their ranks. If they have, then we shall have a fair and manly contest on a great question of public policy upon which more than any other rest the greatness and power of our country.

I should like to take part in such a contest, but I do not believe it will be presented to us. Let the ranks be closed, and make your proposition, that you have had the power to make for ten out of twelve years, to reduce taxation in any form and send it to us as the Democratic position, and you will find the old ranks unbroken on this side of the Chamber, willing and ready if we disagree to present the issue that you give to us to the people of the United States.

For gentlemen to come here and assail us because from time to time we have expressed views that appear to be different, when we were performing the responsible duty of Government, that they have had the power to perform for ten years, seems to me to be rather a small hole to creep out of a great responsibility. It is true that in the discussion of the tariff question in thirty years I may have changed my mind. If I had not changed my mind as circumstances and conditions changed, I would be unworthy to hold a seat here. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will suspend for a moment. It is the duty of the Chair to caution the galleries that marks of approval or disapprobation are forbidden by the rules of the Senate, and silence will be enforced even if it is necessary to clear the galleries.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have been called upon to debate and vote on the question of the tariff under conditions as strikingly changed as men can find in the history of any country. Before the war we had an overflowing treasury at one time and a great dread about the surplus revenue. We reduced taxes in 1857 by one fell stroke; and a revulsion occurred after the passage of that law, not perhaps caused by the law, but by a financial panic the revenues fell off I do not know how much. At any rate, when we came back here in December, 1857, we actually had to receive for our pay Treasury notes after the panic in the summer and fall of 1857. I believe my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] was then a member of the other House, and he will remember that remarkable fact.

I have seen these changes frequently occurring. When the war commenced we had fortunately secured at the close of the previous administration what was called the Morrill tariff bill, a bill which was debated at great length in both Houses of Congress, but was only passed in the Senate by reason of the absence of Senators who had gone South in an attempt to secede from the Union. It became the law in March, 1861, and it was a great piece of good fortune to this country that that law had been passed, because it gave us the foundation of a revenue system, and it was immediately put in force, and had a great and powerful influence in enabling us to carry on our financial operations. But the very moment when, during the war, we collected the duties imposed by that tariff, we levied enormous taxes on home productions, yielding us at one time over $340,000,000 a year of internal revenue.

Then after the war was over we commenced the reduction of those taxes, not so much of the tariff duties as internal taxation. It was on the bills proposing to reduce taxes, to take off the stamp duty on deeds and conveyances and all that sort of thing, to take off the taxes on domestic manufactures, to sweep away the mass of internal-revenue taxation levied during the war, that I uttered the language in 1867, quoted by the Senator from West Virginia, and every word of it was true, and is now heartily approved by me.

Such was the general policy, I believe, of both political parties at that time. The party lines were not drawn on these taxation questions at the close of the war; and during the war no party lines were drawn at all on these questions, if I remember correctly. Then it was the general desire to leave the tariff alone, with only slight reductions, so as to enable us to sweep away the whole mass of internal-revenue duties as rapidly as possible; and we did it. It was on a bill of that character in 1867 that I made the remark that of all the taxes which were most willingly paid by the people of the United States were the taxes on tobacco, beer, and spirits; and so they were; so they are to-day.

But only within two or three years has there come complaint to us, and mainly from the Southern States, of the tax on tobacco. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] represents that feeling, and so does his colleague [Mr. RANSOM], and so do the other Senators from Southern States; so do the Senators from the States of Ohio and Indiana; that is to say, the growers of tobacco begin to feel that while they have willingly paid that tax and the farmers have been compelled to buy of licensed dealers and nobody else—while they have willingly borne that tax as long as it was necessary for the support of the Government, yet now the farmers do complain of it.

They say it does affect their production. This complaint has only come to us within two or three years, and when it came to us, especially from the South, I felt we ought to heed it. I do heed it. I do regard it, and have so far modified my views as to be willing to repeal the tobacco tax, leaving the beer and whisky tax still stand to enable us to meet the great expenditures still occurring in consequence of the war.

Am I right in this? I wonder that Senators on the other side of the Chamber do not heed that voice, too. It is general all over the Southern States, and I yield to that opinion so generally expressed in Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Kentucky for the repeal of the tobacco tax. I see that there is a demand made, especially by the farmers of that region, for the farmers of Ohio care less about it; and when I yield to that demand I only do what the Senators from those States ought to do, yield to the public will when it comes to us in an authentic form from great masses of our fellow-citizens.

As to the great issue which divides the two parties as to the expediency of protective duties on imported goods, I hope it will divide the people of the South as well as the North. I want to see the declaration this day made carried out. I want to see those lines closed. I want to see a proposition coming from the Democratic side of a measure proposing affirmative legislation on this vital question of public policy. To-day we have heard declamation against land grants, as if that system was the work and effort of the Republican party. Sir, that system had its birth in the Democratic party.

Mr. KENNA. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. KENNA. Will the Senator stand in his place and say that the Democratic party ever granted an acre of land to a private corporation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us see how ridiculous such a claim is. A great party can not stand in that position, Senators. Here it is: The first grant of public land ever made to aid the construction of railroads was to the State of Illinois in trust for a particular company to build a railroad on a defined line, and because Congress interposed a trustee between the grant and the beneficiaries in a State is that a dodge or distinction the Democratic party will stand behind? I do not believe it, sir, nor did they do it. Up to 1861 there were no grants made to Territories except to one, Minnesota, and that was of doubtful authority. But in 1861 it became necessary to grant lands to build railroads in Territories. Were Territories to stand as trustees between the cestui que trust and the Government? No; because those Territories were mere transient agents of local authority. Therefore Congress created corporations, and it was done by the voice and act of Democrats and Republicans alike. When I am arraigned here for any mistakes that were made in that legislation, I beg leave to tell my honorable friend that Mr. Hendricks was the most potent and able advocate of the law organizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The records will show it, although I have not looked over them for years; but there they are. So with Reverdy Johnson, and so with all the Democrats; there was no difference between parties then on that question.

Mr. KENNA. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator will hardly say that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nearly all, I think.

Mr. KENNA. He has named every Democrat he can name who supported that measure. Can the Senator say there was no difference between the parties on that subject?

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that the records will bear me out in the statement I have made.

Mr. KENNA. The records do not show it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the records will show that the vote was almost unanimous on those bills, and I remember well that it was the active agency of Mr. Hendricks in regard to the Northern Pacific bill, which I thought was not well enough guarded, and also the active agency of Reverdy Johnson, who contributed, I believe, more than any other man to the passage of the second Union Pacific Railroad act in 1864.

You can not shield yourself behind any subterfuge, or any trustee, or any mere form of law. That grant was made by consent of the people of the United States, by and in pursuance of a resolution of the National Democratic Convention of 1860, and of the Republican Convention of 1860. It was made by the common consent of the people, and by the common will of the people without regard to parties, North or South. Even before the war the South had their project also for a Southern Pacific Railroad, and that was favored as well as the rest. No; let there be no dodging behind the trustee. When the lands were within a State the State was a naked trustee, and when within a Territory the lands were granted to corporations created by Congress, and this formula was adopted in grants by both parties.

As to the vital question that divides the two parties, it is this: We still stand upon the position that I stated in 1867, that it was better to do away with the internal-revenue taxes as rapidly as possible, and they were at last swept away, with the exceptions I have stated, by the Forty-eighth Congress, the last Congress, Republican in both branches, which existed in this country. That was in 1882; and there is quoted to us what was said by Arthur in 1882 and by his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Folger. What they recommended was right; it was entirely consistent with what I said at the time; it was entirely consistent with what the honorable Senator who sits near me [Mr. MORRILL] and I have endeavored to carry out; and a Republican Congress did it. The difference between the Democratic party and the Republican party is that when Arthur and the executive authorities, Republican in character, called our attention to the necessity of a revision, we went and did it, and passed the law of 1883.

That is precisely what you have not done, and that is precisely what I want you to do. You take the responsibility of power, make your plan, and then we will meet you and discuss it with you at your pleasure.

There is a broad line of division between the two parties as they exist now and as they will exist in the future. The President says, retain all internal taxes and reduce the duties on imported merchandise that come in competition with home industries. We say we will not strike down any prospering industry of our country; that where manufactures have sprung up in our midst by the aid of a duty, this protection, as you call it, we will not reduce; we will not derange contracts, industries, or plans, or lower the prices of labor, or compel laborers or manufacturers to meet any sudden change or emergency. We say that we are willing to join with you in reducing the taxes. We will select those taxes that bear most heavily upon the people, especially internal taxes, and repeal those. We will preserve the spirit of protection by tariff duties just so long as it is necessary to give our people the benefit of a home market and diversified productions a fair chance in the trade and commerce of our country, but we will not invite into our country foreign importations to compete with and break down our home industries.

The Senator from West Virginia has quoted a law. I do not remember that law. I do not remember to have had anything to do with the passage of the law to which he refers. But I will not speak of that.

Mr. KENNA. I will furnish it to the Senator, if he will permit me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will look at it for myself.

Mr. KENNA. I have here the page and date and entire proceeding, which will show that the Senator had charge of the bill throughout its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. What year was that in?

Mr. KENNA. In 1864, and the act was approved July 4 of that year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ah! I thought the date would disclose it. That is sufficient; I want no other reason. The law was enacted in 1864, in the midst of war, when 2,000,000 of our people were down South. That was a sufficient justification for that or any other law which would invite people here to help us make good the absence of those brave Union soldiers of the Army. I thought the date or something would disclose it. The language quoted in that law was not consistent with my feeling, and I thought there must be some explanation of it. I have no doubt that I supported it then. Indeed, I would have passed any kind of a law at that time. I would have done what I said afterwards I would do, anything to beat the Democratic party, because the success of that party was the dissolution of the Union. I did not exactly mean this when I said it, but the Senator from Alabama came down upon me so strongly that I was determined not to retreat on compulsion, and so I stood by it, though then willing to qualify my remark. But in 1864 I would have done anything in the world to defeat the Democratic party. I understood it to be then, during the war, the enemy of my country. I considered that upon the success of the Republican party depended the preservation of the Union and the existence of our country. So in 1864 I might have voted for some such law, but I warrant you I voted to repeal it whenever the matter was presented. I had forgotten even about its introduction or having anything to do with such a law.

Mr. President, I will go no further. I congratulate the country that we are about to have a fair, square, and manly issue upon an industrial policy which affects the life and property and interests of every citizen of this country without regard to State or section; a question between protected labor in our country, protected against undue foreign competition with the pauper labor of Europe; a question of diversified productions and diversified interests; a choice between a country strong, prosperous, and independent within itself and a country dependent upon agriculture alone, with a few blacksmith shops and carpenter shops scattered through the country.

The policy that I aim to develop is one that will make us practically independent of all the nations of the world, that we may make in this country not only all that we need to eat, except the luxuries of tropical climes, and all we wish to wear, all the manufactures necessary to human life, that this great and powerful nation of 60,000,000 people, extending over a vast region, from ocean to ocean and from the Gulf to Canada, may be independent in themselves, so that if European nations will be at war with each other, here we may have a republic of freemen, making its own way in the world, able to keep itself, and, if necessary, to help the country north of us and the country south of us. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries will be in order.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio made a challenge the other day upon the Democrats to show what they had done affirmatively since they came into power in the House of Representatives. That challenge is repeated to-day with emphasis, and the charge is made that though the Democratic party has been substantially in power for ten or twelve years it has furnished the country with no affirmative act of legislation.

It will be remembered that while the Democrats have had a majority, sometimes larger and sometimes smaller, from the Forty-fourth Congress to the present, with the exception of the Forty-seventh Congress, during all those years until the present President was elected we had a Republican President, and during all those years we had a Republican Senate, except during the Forty-sixth Congress. During the only term when the Democrats had the control of the two Houses of Congress they did not have the control of the executive department. I mention this for the purpose of saying that a party to be held responsible for an affirmative public policy ought to be in possession of both branches of the legislative department and of the executive department of the Government.

But I rose for the purpose of saying that there have been some things done by the Democratic party which have subserved great public interests. Previous to 1872, in the policy of contraction of the currency by the Republican party, in its policy of retiring the legal-tender notes from circulation, in its policy of suspending the coinage of silver, it brought us down in 1872 to a time when there was not enough money in the country to carry on its ordinary business, and when the property of the country was being sold for taxes from one end of the Union to the other. That dearth of currency it was said was produced by the policy of getting down to hard-pan, and getting to that hard-pan was wrecking and ruining the country.

When the Democrats came into the control of the House of Representatives they commenced the struggle to arrest the taking up and cancellation of the legal-tender notes, and tried to prevent them from being turned into an interest-bearing bonded debt to increase the burdens of the people, and to preserve them to the people as a part of the currency necessary to carry on the industries of the country. With the aid of a few Republicans, but the measure being essentially a Democratic measure, it was carried through so as to preserve $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes as a part of the currency of the country to aid its business and to restore its prosperity.

It commenced at the same time the effort to secure the recoinage of the silver dollar, and by the aid of a few Republicans—Western Republicans mostly—the Democratic party did secure the recoinage of silver; and the honorable Senator from Ohio, as Secretary of the Treasury, informed Congress in his report the fall after that was done that the recoinage of silver had enabled the Government to reach a specie-paying basis. I remember that was the substance of his report. And the silver which had been theretofore coined had been added to the circulating money of the country, and had aided to promote the prosperity and business thrift of the country.

Another measure, one which had for its object the restraining and controlling of the monopolistic powers of the railroad corporations of the country, had its origin in the Democratic House and was sustained and carried through essentially and mainly by Democratic votes; a measure which was necessary to the protection of the masses of the people against corporations which had shown disregard, in a large degree, of popular rights; a measure which I apprehend will be held in the future to be one of the most important and beneficent measures that Congress has ever adopted.

Besides that, during the time referred to by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, when the Republicans were voting away public lands by the tens of millions of acres, by, I believe, nearly 200,000,000 acres in the aggregate, to corporations, the Democrats inaugurated measures, struggled for them in the House and secured the adoption of measures there, some of which were adopted here in the Senate, but supported, I believe, mainly by Democrats and opposed chiefly by Republicans, by which about 50,000,000 acres of the public domain were restored back and held for the use of the settlers.

These are some of the measures indicating the policy and the purpose of the Democratic party to subserve the interests of the people and to resist the power of classes and corporations to absorb the money and property of this country and to oppress the masses of the people. Every great step that has been taken has been in this line and in accord with the traditional policy and principles of the Democratic party.

So, though the Democratic party has not been in possession at the same time of the executive department of the Government and of both branches of the legislative department, still it had manifested a policy and a purpose to carry on the Government in the interest of the people as contradistinguished from a policy to carry it on in the interest of classes and of corporations; in other words, as contradistinguished from the policy of running this Government in the interest of protected manufacturers, in the interest of great corporations, and in the interest of other combined and favored classes. While I can not affirm that the Democratic party has been able to carry through many great measures, I do affirm that these measures to which I have referred, beneficial to the best interests of the country, have been mainly carried through by Democratic policy and Democratic influence, and mainly resisted by Republican policy and Republican influence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the question of reference on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the Chair understands that other Senators have notified the Senate that they desire to speak. The motion will therefore remain on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] desires the floor on the education bill.

Mr. CALL. I will yield to the Senator from Maine, if he desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. CALL. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. COCKRELL. May I be allowed to introduce a bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1849) to confirm New Madrid location survey, No. 2889, and to provide for issue of patent therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 1850) to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill and Kill Von Kull, and to establish the same as post-roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRYE. The Senate having agreed to adjourn over, and a subcommittee having the matter under consideration, I desire to introduce a bill and ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, together with certain memorials bearing on the subject.

The bill (S. 1851) to provide for an international marine conference for securing greater safety for life and property at sea was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE VIRGINIUS FUND.

Mr. FRYE. I ask leave to present a resolution, and request immediate action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read, unless objection be made.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to report to the Senate, for its information, the present condition of the so-called Virginius fund, the amount undistributed, the interest received, and from what sources received.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. CALL. Being entitled to the floor, I yield to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who desires to be heard.

Mr. STEWART. Inasmuch as I have no set speech to deliver, but feel inclined to make a few remarks in regard to the educational bill, I may as well do it now.

As to the constitutional question which has been suggested, it has failed to embarrass me in the least. The bill is so absolutely in accord with the practice of the Government for a great many years, dating as far back as 1802, that I hardly think its constitutionality open to discussion.

On the admission of the State of Ohio, in 1802, the sixteenth section in each township was granted to the new State in aid of common schools. Subsequently the grant was extended so as to include the thirty-sixth section, and these two sections in each township were granted to all the new States for common-school purposes. The aggregate of these grants amounts to about 68,000,000 acres.

In 1862 an act was passed granting land-scrip to the several States according to their representation in Congress, the aggregate amounting to about 10,000,000 acres, which was distributed among the several States for the purpose of establishing agricultural colleges.

There have been numerous other grants for educational purposes. The legislation of Congress from 1802 until now has been consistent in aid of education, and the power of Congress to make these donations to the States has never been questioned by either party. Congress has passed bill after bill without objection, and it is impossible for me to distinguish between the constitutional power to donate land to be sold and converted into money in aid of common schools and the donation of money directly for that purpose.

The practice of the Government in aiding common schools is so well established, and all parties are so thoroughly committed to this policy by repeated acts of Congress for more than half a century, that the question involved in this bill is a question of expediency, not of power.

The only portion of the bill which has attracted my attention as being unfair is that which gives to the several States sums of money in proportion to illiteracy of the people without confining it to the illiteracy of children of the common-school age. It is not proposed to educate adults in the common schools, and their illiteracy, it seems to me, ought not to be made a basis for the distribution of money appropriated by Congress. I shall not, however, offer any amendment to the bill, as it has been considered so often. I merely make the suggestion that it occurs to me that the basis of apportionment is not exactly fair; but I shall make no objection on that ground.

The donations of land heretofore made exceed in value the amount to be expended under this bill, although it has been often stated that this was the most enormous appropriation ever made by Congress for the benefit of education. Some of the former donations were made in the shape of land scrip, which fell into the hands of speculators. The donation, however, of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections was not in the shape of floating scrip, but was confined to two sections located in each township. This grant has been most beneficial throughout the new States. The good that it has accomplished is beyond computation. It has been the basis of a splendid system of common schools throughout the West. The generations that have been born and grown up since this policy was inaugurated bear testimony to the efficacy of the aid Congress extended to common schools.

There is another reason why I have no constitutional scruples with regard to the proposed legislation. I believe that this Government has a right to take measures for the well-being of the people—such measures as are necessary to maintain free institutions.

Education is essential to the existence of freedom. The duties of a citizen are becoming more and more complicated and difficult day by day. The questions discussed here have to be ultimately decided by the people, and they must be able to understand them. The capacity to vote for the vast number of elective officers in the several States of the Union requires an unusual amount of intelligence.

For example, take the city of New York, where the citizen is called upon to designate by his ballot persons to fill one hundred and eight offices in the city and county alone in addition to State and Federal offices.

In the city of San Francisco the voter is required to select eighty-two persons to fill eighty-two offices at a single election, and by law the names of all these persons are placed upon a single ticket. If the voter is uneducated, his right to vote under such circumstances is worthless. When we reflect that the great questions upon which the prosperity of the country depend, such as currency, banking, the single or double standard of metallic money, the tariff, and all other questions involving the rights and interests of the people, must finally be submitted to their votes to decide which policy is best for the country, it can not be denied that education is necessary to enable the voter to decide between the great contending parties struggling for supremacy.

If this Government is to be safely conducted by the people they must be educated. The preservation of the Government requires it. Why maintain an army and a navy? Why educate young men for the military and naval service? The only reason which can be given is a supposed necessity to defend the nation. We have no enemy as strong as ignorance. Ignorance is our only formidable foe. Republics have never perished by the sword. They have always bred a race of warriors, willing and capable of vanquishing every foe, except ignorance among the masses. By that fatal enemy all the republics of ancient times were destroyed. The masses became incapable of conducting the complicated machinery of government necessary in a republic, and the people lost their liberty.

Ignorance is the only enemy now threatening the institutions of the United States. If this Government perishes, it will not fall before a foreign foe; it will go down because the people are incompetent to understand the wants and the complicated machinery of this great Government.

My position is that notwithstanding this bill may not be in the best possible form, I ought not vote against a proposition to extend aid for the education of the people. I regard money expended for such a purpose as a contribution for the preservation of our free institutions.

I have introduced a bill to which I desire in this connection to call the attention of the Senate. It is a proposition for the establishment of a national university in this city for the education of teachers. I think much good might be derived from it. In the first place it would elevate the profession of teaching. It would place it on a rank with the profession of arms, and would give a character, a standing, a respectability to teachers. Not only that, but we should have a central point from which to disseminate throughout the country the wisdom that might be collected from its various parts.

And that is not all. It is very important that the people of this country should know something of each other, something of their institutions. We have only one national assembly in which the people meet, and that is the Congress of the United States. The social and political effect of meeting at the capital for the purpose of legislation and business operates beneficially in every respect throughout the country. It is the strongest bond of union that exists between the sections. It is even more beneficial than the intercourse of trade, travel, and commerce between the States. It is in fact the principal means by which the people of the different sections of the Union learn to know and respect each other. The friendship formed at the capital, the knowledge obtained here of the character of the people from the North and the South, the East and the West, cement the bonds of union and remove jealousy, prejudice, and ill-will, the natural products of non-intercourse and isolation. A national university, where thousands of young men and women would be educated, would operate on a larger scale and with far more reaching effect in cementing the bonds of union between the States than the assembling of Congress for legislative purposes. Their numbers would be greater, their purposes more harmonious, their youthful attachments stronger, than a body of mature men assembled on official business.

The youth of each section would learn something of the youth of all other sections. They would realize that this is one country, and that the institutions of each State form part of the institutions of our common country. They would learn to respect each other for those qualities of head and heart that make men and women useful members of society, rather than on account of the accident of birth or the locality of residence. A corps of teachers thus equipped would be effective missionaries in the cause of education; they would elevate our common schools and teach the youth of the land not only the elements of a common-school education, but also the essential principles of freedom and union among all the people, upon which the permanency of our Government depends.

A university for the education of teachers must be considered and will eventually be established.

The bill now under consideration furnishes an opportunity for an expression of opinion in favor of the education of the masses. I shall avail myself of that opportunity and cheerfully vote for the bill, hoping that the action of Congress will not end with it, but that ample provisions may be made at an early day for educating teachers, elevating the standard of education generally, to the end that our Government may not perish as other republics which have preceded us—for want of knowledge.

SAND BARS NEAR LITTLE MANGROVE POINT.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. PASCO. If my colleague will yield to me, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CALL. I will do so, but before I do so I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution, calling for information, which I desire acted on at once.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate of the probable cost of making a channel 200 feet wide through the two sand bars near Little Mangrove Point, so as to allow vessels drawing 20 feet of water to enter Old Tampa Bay, Florida, and how much of this amount can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year.

IMPROVEMENT OF NORTHWEST CHANNEL NEAR KEY WEST.

Mr. CALL. I offer another resolution of similar character, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what amount of money can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year in improving the northwest channel near Key West, Fla., according to the plan submitted in compliance with the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pending which I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro temopre. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 6, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MARY H. NEWMAN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of findings of fact of said court in the case of Mary H. Newman against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, laid before the House bills of the following titles; which were read a first and second time, and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 1022) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands in Kansas—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 425) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 23) to authorize Dalles City to construct a bridge across the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 388) for the relief of L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovel, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Omaha, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 217) to change the limit of appropriation for a public building at Jacksonville, Fla.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The joint resolution (S. R. 13) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCCOMAS, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HIESTAND, for eight days, on account of important business.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE MUSKINGUM RIVER.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4327) regulating the construction of bridges over the Muskingum River, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SPRINGER. Before unanimous consent is granted I wish to know whether this is reported from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does any gentleman desire the reading of the report?

Mr. WILKINS. I do not care for the report, but I would like to have the bill read. I want to know what it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state to my colleague that this relates to the construction of bridges in the future; not to bridges built heretofore. It has no effect upon present structures, and was prepared by the Engineer Bureau of the War Department.

Mr. WILKINS. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person or corporation having lawful authority to erect a bridge or bridges across the Muskingum River, Ohio, may hereafter erect bridges across said river for railroad or other uses upon compliance with the provisions and requirements of this act, but no bridge shall be erected across said river which does not comply therewith.

SEC. 2. That every bridge hereafter erected across the Muskingum River, Ohio, shall have its axis at right angles to the current at medium and high stages, and its piers shall be parallel to this current. No riprap or other outside protection for insufficient foundations will be permitted around the channel piers, and all coffer-dams, piling, and other temporary works must be removed by the owners of the bridge before it is opened to traffic. Every such bridge may be built either as a draw-bridge or as a continuous bridge; if built as a draw-bridge, the draw span shall give two clear openings, measured on the low-water line, of 80 feet, and smooth crib work or masonry shall be built at right angles to the bridge extending up stream from the pivot pier, a distance of at least 100 feet, and down stream the same distance, and the height of this protection pier shall not be less than 4 feet above highest locking stage. The channel sides of the channel piers shall be smoothly cut; the corners of the draw piers shall be rounded to a radius of not less than 6 inches; there shall be no projecting cornices on the piers, nor projecting footway on the draw span; the apparatus for swinging the draw shall be sufficient to open it in not more than 5 minutes; and the draw shall be promptly opened on signal. The location of the draw span shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That if the bridge be built as a continuous bridge it shall have at least one channel-span, the center of which shall be in the middle of the channel usually run in high stages by steam-boats descending the river with barges or rafts in tow; said channel-span to have a clear opening of 250 feet, measured at the low-water line, and the lowest part of the span to be 40 feet above highest navigable water, as determined by a straight line connecting the tops of the lower lock-gates at the head and foot of the pool in which the bridge is to be built. The other spans may have such grades as may be desired.

SEC. 4. That whenever any duly authorized persons or corporations shall determine to apply to the Secretary of War for permission to build a bridge across the Muskingum River, they shall first give public notice of said intention by publication for one week in newspapers having a wide circulation, in not less than two newspapers published in towns on the Muskingum River below Dresden, and in not less than two newspapers published in Pittsburgh. They shall also submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge and piers, and a map of the locality, on the scale of 1 inch to 100 feet, giving for the space of one-quarter of a mile above and one-quarter of a mile below the site of the proposed bridge the topography of the banks of the river, the line of low and highest navigable water, an accurate representation of the bed of the river by contour lines, 2 feet apart, determined by accurate soundings; and shall also show over the whole width of this part of the river the force and direction of the currents at low water, and at high navigable stages, by triangulated observations on suitable floats. The map shall also show the location of all bridges, locks, and dams, coal tipples, breakwaters, and other structures within the high-water lines in the designated area. Said maps and drawings shall be referred to a board of engineer officers or to the engineer officer in charge of the Muskingum River for examination and report; and said board, or officer, shall visit the site of the proposed bridge and shall hold a public session at some convenient point, of which public session due notice and invitation to be present shall be given to all interested parties; and if said board, or officer, shall report the site as unfavorable, the Secretary of War is authorized to require that such changes be made in the proposed bridge, by lengthening the spans, or by the addition of guiding-dikes or other auxiliary works, or by both, or by increasing the height, or by such other modifications as will make the bridge as safe for navigation as if built in a favorable part of the river; and no bridge shall be begun until the plans have been approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That in case the location of the proposed bridge crosses the river at the site of one of the lateral canals, and the main bridge is over a part of the river that is not navigable, the provisions of the foregoing sections are so far modified that the protection piers above and below the pivot pier of the draw may be replaced by piling, or similar approved construction; and in case of a continuous bridge, the span over the canal need not exceed the width of the canal measured between the tops of its banks. The current observations may also be omitted.

SEC. 6. That all parties owning, occupying, or operating bridges over the Muskingum River shall maintain, for the security of navigation, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, throughout the year, such lights on their bridges as may be required by the Light-House Board, or the United States engineer officer in charge of said river; and during the construction of any bridge under this act such lights and buoys shall be kept on coffer-dams, cribs, piling, floating crafts, rafts, etc., used in the construction of the bridge as may be necessary for the security of navigation.

SEC. 7. That the officers and crews of all vessels, boats, or rafts, navigating the Muskingum River shall be required to regulate the use of said vessels and of any pipes or chimneys belonging thereto, so as not to interfere with the construction of any of the bridges authorized by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That any bridge constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridges; and the United States shall have the right of way for telegraph or telephone purposes across any such bridge; and in case of any litigation arising from any alleged obstruction to the navigation of said Muskingum River created by the construction of any bridge under this act the cause or question arising may be tried before the circuit or district court of the United States for the southern district of Ohio.

SEC. 9. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the future construction of bridges is hereby expressly reserved, without any liability of the Government for damages on account of the alterations or amendment of this act, or on account of the prevention or requiring the removal of any such obstructions; and any change in the construction or any alteration of any such bridge that may be directed at any time by Congress, shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners thereof.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Strike out in line 5, of section 4, the words "for one week," and substitute therefor the words "once a week for four weeks."

Mr. WILKINS. Before action is taken upon this bill I wish to ask my colleague whether this affects, in any manner, any of the bridges in the city of Zanesville that are constructed or may hereafter be constructed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can answer my colleague by saying that, in the first place, it affects no bridge already constructed upon any portion of the river, and in the second place it affects no bridge in Zanesville now constructed or hereafter to be constructed, unless it is constructed below the present canal in which the steam-boats land.

Mr. WILKINS. Let me ask another question. Is this in accord with the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the engineer in charge?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill was drawn in the office of the Secretary of War and sent to me, to be introduced, from there.

I desire unanimous consent to make a single amendment to the bill as it stands, by putting into the fourteenth line of the eighth section, before the word "southern," the words "eastern division of the;" so that it will read:

Questions arising may be tried before the circuit or district court of the United States for the eastern division of the southern district of Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRACT OF LAND IN AUSTIN, TEX.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 2993) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Austin, Tex., a tract of land in said city for educational purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Let the bill and report be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to the city of Austin, in the State of Texas, for educational purposes, a certain tract or parcel of land known as the "Arsenal Block," and lying in the southeast portion of the said city of Austin, and bounded on the east by East avenue, on the south by Third street, on the north by Waller Creek, and on the west by Red River street.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like the gentleman from Texas to make some explanation of this bill. What is the property worth to the Government?

Mr. SAYERS. The ownership of this property became vested in the Federal Government by virtue of the annexation of Texas in 1845. It has not been used by the Federal Government since 1876. The ground is worth about $3,000. The three houses upon it are worth about $100 apiece, and the Government has been paying $75 a month for the custody of the property. The lot is in the city limits, and the city desires to use it for the purpose of a graded school.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LAIRD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2993) respectfully report:

It appears f om the subjoined letters of the Secretary of War that the block of land in question came to the United States by operation of the treaty of annexation with Texas; that it is no longer of use to the Government for military purposes, having been abandoned since 1875, and is now only a bill of expense. The value of the realty is estimated at $3,000, and of the fixtures at $300. The fixtures are described as three dilapidated frame buildings. The donation of the property is asked by the city of Austin to the end that they use it as a site for a public school. In view of the fact that the land is no longer required for military purposes, your committee are in favor of the donation, and recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: Add after the word "street," in line 9 of the bill as printed, the following: "Provided, That any conveyance made by the Secretary of War pursuant to this act shall contain a condition that the title to the property in question shall revert to the United States whenever the city of Austin shall cease to use the same for educational purposes."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I take it that this is a case where the property of the United States is not necessary for public purposes and should be sold. If the War Department, or any other Department of the Government, desires to dispose of useless public property, the consent of Congress will be given at any time. But I understand, from the reading of the bill and report, that this is one of a large class of bills now being introduced and under consideration by the Committee on Education. I therefore object to the consideration of this bill, because it will affect the action of the House on that large class of bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to object to the consideration of the bill, because it is now under consideration and an amendment has been adopted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education on the distinct ground that it should be considered among the numerous other bills before that committee involving the same question.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this property has been practically abandoned by the Government. The city of Austin has appropriatee $8,000 or $10,000 for a building for a graded school. It is of no use to the Government, which is paying $75 a month to take care of three buildings not worth $100 apiece.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a graded school on the property?

Mr. SAYERS. The city has appropriated money to erect it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think the general rule should be adopted here that the property should be sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education.

Mr. STEELE. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is; the previous question not having been ordered.

Mr. STEELE. Can the gentleman move to commit before the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He can.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 47.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to refer the bill was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAILABLE MATTER.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is a general law, and one the importance of which I think will be admitted by every gentleman on the floor. There will probably be little difference of opinion about it. It is certainly of great importance to the service.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4910) to amend section 14 of the act approved March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," and relating to second-class mail matter.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the fourteenth section of the act approved March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to the proviso thereof, and at the end of said section, the following words, namely:

"And that no publications, that are but books or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts, bound or unbound, or in series, or whether sold by subscription or otherwise, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter."

Mr. ROGERS. I reserve the point of order until I hear a statement by the gentleman from Georgia. I do not understand the object of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will send to the Clerk's desk the report; but perhaps I can state the object of the bill more succinctly than it is stated in the report.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite well known to my distinguished friend from Arkansas, as well as to other gentlemen, that mail matter has been divided into four classes—first, second, third, and fourth. As regards this bill, it is only necessary to state the law as to second and third class matter. The description of mailable matter of the second class is as follows:

Mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year and are within the conditions named in sections 12 and 14.

The third class is defined thus:

That mailable matter of the third class shall embrace books, transient newspapers, periodicals, circulars, and other matter wholly in print not included in section 12, proof-sheets, corrected proof-sheets and manuscript copy accompanying the same; and postage shall be paid at the rate of 1 cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof.

That is to say, 8 cents a pound.

Second-class matter pays 1 cent a pound. Now, sir, it appears that under a construction of the statute in reference to second-class matter books are passing through the mails as second-class matter simply because they have paper covers upon them. It is singular that such a construction should have been placed upon the statute in the light of the express declaration that books are to go at third-class rates. To illustrate this abuse I will read from the report of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. He says:

Under the law, the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class of mail matter are as follows: It must be regularly issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively; it must be issued from a known office of publication; it must be formed of printed sheets without board, cloth, or other substantial binding such as distinguishes printed books for preservation from periodical publications. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and must have a legitimate list of subscribers; provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes or for free circulation at nominal rates.

Under these conditions, which were intended to distinguish what are generally known as newspapers and periodicals from books, it may be demonstrated that almost anything in the nature of a book, provided it be without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, may be brought within the privilege of the second-class rate of postage, and the object of the law accordingly defeated.

I read from this report, sir, because it comes from an officer connected with the administration of the Post-Office Department, and shows how this law works in practical operation. This report continues:

Let it be supposed, for example, that a publisher wishes to issue the works of Shakespeare in such a way as to secure the privilege of the pound rate of postage when the book is sent by mail. Every one knows that such a publication is a book, no matter how it may be published. It is certainly not a newspaper or a periodical in the universally accepted sense of these words. The publisher, however, means to have it admitted as such, so he arranges to issue it monthly, giving each part a number and a date, places upon the title-page a statement of the place of publication, and binds the parts in paper covers. He thus complies with three of the above-mentioned conditions. Next he publishes a prospectus, in which the publication is claimed to be devoted to literature, and he secures through his agents subscribers to the work, in this way complying with the fourth condition of the law.

It must not be supposed that this is merely a hypothetical case. Instances of this exact character have occurred. The postmaster at New York has called attention to the fact that a dictionary, nothing more nor less, issued in this way, was passed through the mails at the pound rate of postage. Not only this, but tons on tons of books called "libraries" or "series," being purely and simply paper-covered books, or reprints of books, having probably no lists of subscribers other than the booksellers who buy them just as they buy other books, are every day going through the mails as second-class matter, and the number is constantly on the increase. Unless a check is put upon this abuse there is no telling to what extent it will go. Already the mailing of matter of this character together with pretended "sample copies" of publications (reference to which is made hereafter) has become so great that the intelligent and careful handling of it at many offices is simply impossible.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I simply want to say that so far as I am concerned I am satisfied.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. About the propriety of taking this bill up for consideration?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No, sir. I wish to ask the gentleman how much the passage of this bill would increase the postage upon the class of material which it affects?

Mr. BLOUNT. It would require it to pay the third-class rate, which is 8 cents a pound.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of course there would be an increase, would there not?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. How much would it be in the aggregate?

Mr. BLOUNT. It would be an increase—exactly the amount of the increase I can not tell; so far as I know, no estimate of that has been made. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General, as will be seen by the statement to which I have referred, says that tons and tons of matter which ought to pay 8 cents a pound pay now only 1 cent a pound. What may be the resulting loss to the revenues of the Department I can not tell, nor do I know that any estimate of it has been made at the Department. Suffice it to say, that this method of evading the law began in a small way, has continued to grow as one publisher after another has discovered it, and it is now becoming very extensive.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, the only object of this bill, as I understand, is to prevent evasions of the existing law.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is it exactly.

Mr. DINGLEY. The law as it now stands was intended to put upon books the third-class rate, but certain publishers have succeeded in evading the law by omitting to put covers on particular classes of books and by sending them out as parts of an educational series.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman states the matter accurately. The purpose of the bill is to discontinue the abuse which the gentleman describes.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me a moment, according to my recollection (which is pretty clear) this question was considered fully by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads prior to 1879, and legislation was had which is now sought to be amended. According to my recollection Congress deliberately placed books of this description in the second class of mail matter, so that they might pass through the mails at the rate of 2 cents a pound.

Mr. BLOUNT. Why, Mr. Speaker, this practice has rested simply on an opinion of an Attorney-General, which I can have read, if gentlemen wish it. There never was any statute which, properly construed, authorized the usage. I have read the statute.

Mr. CANNON. But my recollection is that there was a reclassification.

Mr. BLOUNT. The classification is just the same; there has been no change as to this class of matter. By virtue merely of an opinion of an Attorney-General, this practice has become permissible.

Mr. LONG (to Mr. BLOUNT). You want to correct that opinion?

Mr. BLOUNT. We want to correct that opinion. We do not believe that the plain provision of a statute ought to be nullified by the opinion of an Attorney-General.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether under the law as now construed by the Postmaster-General the Bible or any book of similar character may not be issued in serial form and pass through the mails as second-class matter?

Mr. BLOUNT. Perhaps that might be the case if the Bible were circulated in that manner; but according to the way in which we find the business of the country actually done, the Bible and all the school-books of the country are circulated through the mails at 8 cents a pound, while frivolous literature, yellow-backed novels, are passing through the mails at 1 cent a pound. That is the whole question. In my judgment the moral sense of the country and the sound judgment of this House, whatever may have been the legislation in the past, if it were different from that now proposed, would not deliberately consent to such discrimination. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to oppose this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I would like a little time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to giving the gentlemen time, especially as the House has been so courteous to me.

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to speak against the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. How much time do gentlemen want?

Mr. CANNON. Ten minutes will be enough for me.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like two minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will first yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois and afterward two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the attention of the House for a few minutes while I state what I understand to be the present law, and what, as I conceive, this proposed legislation will accomplish. Before speaking on the merits of the bill I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia that according to my recollection, by legislation advisedly had prior to 1879, while I was a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, this class of literature was allowed to pass through the mails at 2 cents a pound, the policy of that legislation being to encourage the dissemination of sound and desirable reading matter among the masses of the people of the country at cheap rates both as to the cost of the books themselves and as to the postage. The question was discussed, unless my memory greatly misleads me, and the legislation was advisedly had. Under this legislation the best classes of literature, for instance, the Waverly novels, Dickens's works, and the new translation of the Bible, have been sent by publishing houses through the mails, unbound, stitched, at the rate of 2 cents a pound, so that they could be sold to the people at 10 cents a volume. In this way during the last ten or twelve years the best classes of literature, where there is no copyright, and sometimes where there is copyright, have been circulated through the country by our great publishing houses and sold, postage paid, at 10 cents a volume. Publications of this kind have come from the Harpers, from Munro, and nearly all the great publishing houses of the country.

As a consequence of this, you may now find in the homes of our farmers and laboring men throughout the length and breadth of the country, in this cheap form, issued at 10 cents per volume, a class of literature to which, prior to the adoption of this policy, some people in very good circumstances could scarcely have access. In my own case—and perhaps I am somewhat more able to buy such books as would be useful to me than many others—I know that I avail myself frequently of these cheap publications, because I do not feel that I could afford to buy the same works in their higher-priced forms.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Emerson's works, for instance, are sent out in that way.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; Emerson's works. The Bible has been sent out that way. Anything that is merely printed, stitched, and not bound, and that is not otherwise prohibited from our mails, goes through the mail at 2 cents a pound.

Now, the newspapers of the country, daily and weekly, everywhere go at 2 cents a pound. They constitute, as I recollect, over three-quarters of all the mails. They go at this low rate, having substantially the franking privilege because it is believed to be in the interest of the people for the dissemination of intelligence. For one I will be slow myself, and will ask the House to be slow, before we cut off the privilege of the workingman and the farmer, the million, to get this literature at this low rate.

Mr. Speaker, what does the proposed legislation do? It charges postage at the rate of a cent an ounce, or at the rate of 16 cents a pound.

Mr. RYAN. Eight cents a pound.

Mr. CANNON. Which now goes at 2 cents.

A MEMBER. At 1 cent.

Mr. CANNON. It was 2 and was reduced to 1. Certainly the principle is the same, so far as that is concerned. I do not believe it is good policy to do so. The business of the country is adapted to it.

That boy who attends the common school and has great difficulty in getting his text-books—and there are thousands of such boys in the country, who are to take our places, and to thousands of us it would have been better if we could have had the privilege of the remission of 10 cents in the way of postage on books, which, costing in my boyhood from two to three dollars, were absolutely unattainable to very many of us. I say everybody in the country understands the remitting of 10 cents in the way of postage will give you almost any choice literary works if you will address any of these great publishing houses.

For one I am not willing to increase the price and cut off this privilege from those who have been so much benefited by it. And for whose benefit, Mr. Speaker? I do not think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] means to benefit those who are the real beneficiaries of this legislation. But I will tell him that there has been a constant warfare from the time this legislation was entered upon, some twelve or fifteen years ago, between the express companies throughout the length and breadth of the country and the people who use the post-office and are interested in cheap mail transportation.

Now, suppose you put this up to 8 cents a pound, the rate now being 1 cent, what do you do? Why, you will drive a large part of this work into the hands of the express companies and take it out of the mails of the country, for the reason that the express companies will carry for a fraction under 8 cents a pound.

Sir, it is not necessary that this legislation should be had for the purposes of revenue. We already have more revenue than we want.

The postal service reaches every part of the country. In many places it is almost the only way the people realize there is a United States, so far as the exercise of the functions of the Federal Government is concerned; and the cheap postage and the carriage of parcels in the mails are very popular with the people, a valuable service to the citizen directly, and also valuable as it tends by competition to reduce and keep down the charges of express companies. I am not willing to enter upon this legislation, which I think would be worth many hundreds of thousands of dollars to the express companies annually at the expense of the poor people of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My friend from Illinois has intelligent views on this subject, and I want to know how far this proposed legislation reaches. Is he willing that all books shall go through the mails at the same rate as newspapers and magazines?

Mr. CANNON. I am content that they should, so far as that is concerned; although, let me say to the gentleman from Iowa, that with reference to the bound book, if you please, the man who ordinarily buys it is able to supply himself with that kind of literature bound, while the man or the boy in humbler circumstances is forced to content himself with the 10-cent publication, the same matter in cheap form.

I thank the gentleman from Georgia for his courtesy in yielding me time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] two minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. I hardly think it worth while to take up the time of the House any longer, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has so fully covered every point; and I shall only add this: that, outside of the fact that, in my judgment, this bill is in the interest of the express companies, and probably other traffic companies, and outside of the fact that I am in favor of good books being just as cheap as possible, yet as a matter of business calculation the book that is bound in stiff binding takes up more room in the mail, and ought to pay more because of additional space and weight.

Take an ordinary pamphlet and fold it in the usual way, and of course it will not occupy so much space or weight as the same pamphlet when bound, and ought not to pay as much postage. Again, the man who buys a fine morocco-covered book gets the same material but pays a different price, and that difference is in the cover. It may amount to a difference of from one to three, or even five dollars. Let the man, therefore, who wants to pay that difference for the cover alone, for the shadow, be permitted to pay it, while the poor man who wants the substance ought to be allowed to have it just as cheaply as the Government can enable him to get it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR].

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I want to read for the information of this House an extract from a letter addressed to me by an association that has uniformly paid on their publications 8 cents a pound postage. I refer to a Christian association that circulates tons of Christian literature, and this letter is written to me by its chief secretary:

> As is probably known to you, under the rulings of the Post-Office Department, nearly all paper-covered novels are now classed as second-class mail matter, and carried at 1 cent per pound if sent by the publishers. At the same time religious books, school-books, law and medical books, Bibles, prayer-books, histories, and scientific books can only be sent through the mails at 8 cents a pound.

Whatever may be the experience of members upon the floor, whatever expressions may enter into this debate as to the propriety of such legislation, that is a positive statement from a party who pays this postage. Now, while I may disagree with that feature which would drive all paper-covered publications into the 8-cent schedule, yet I think this Congress ought to legislate in all fairness that the trashy novels, and the cheap and dirty reprints, and the dirtier medical treatises can not, and shall not, go through the United States mails at 1 cent a pound, when God's Word is compelled to pay 8 cents a pound postage. That is my position.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the commencement of this debate, but I presume the chairman of the committee has signified to the House that this was the unanimous report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, after a thorough investigation of the general propositions involved, and after hearing a report from the officials of the Post-Office Department.

I was a member of the Congress that reduced newspapers and periodical publications through the mails from a rate of postage fixed at 2 cents to 1 cent a pound. When that law was enacted it reduced the postage on newspapers and periodicals to the amount of $1,000,000 annually. The reduction to-day is about $1,500,000 as compared with the operations of the law in existence three or four years ago.

The question of the Adams Express Company or any other transportation company being benefited by the enactment of such a law, has to my mind no standing whatever in this debate. The construction of the law, which I have never approved, by the Post-Office Department has allowed a class of matter to go through the mails at a lower rate of postage than was allowed several years ago.

The purpose of reducing the postage to 1 cent a pound on newspapers and periodicals was that intelligence might be disseminated through the mails cheaply, and the purpose of the law was to provide that only newspapers and periodicals published at fixed and stated intervals should go through the mails at that cheaper rate. All other books or publications went at third-class rates, being 8 cents a pound. By a decision of the Department the circulation of such literature as the gentleman from New York calls attention to, covering, for instance, the Seaside Library, and publications of that class, go through the mails at a fixed price, being classed as periodical publications, and obtain the benefit of the cheaper rate. Consequently, from the great bulk of matter of this class which is transported through the mails, it is the only one in which there is a deficiency in the receipts of the Department or in which money is lost. First-class matter, third-class matter, and fourth-class, all yield a revenue to the Government, and the only loss is on the second-class matter at 1 cent a pound. The only great loss and deficiency that comes to the Department is in what is called second-class matter at 1 cent a pound.

To show you the contradiction that is involved I can take a publication in Maine and send it to San Francisco at 1 cent a pound. I may deposit it in a box on a street in any city in Maine and it will be delivered at your door in San Francisco or Oregon at that cost for postage. But in my own city I can not take that publication and mail it for delivery two squares off at less than 8 cents a pound. That is a contradiction which Congress should correct.

I am in favor of the most liberal legislation in postal matters; I do not want to have transmitted through the mails at 1 cent a pound matter which the law did not contemplate should be transmitted at that rate. The reduction of postage from 2 cents to 1 cent a pound under the ruling that now governs makes a difference of $2,500,000. So it is stated by the Department. I think that amount could be far better expended in broadening the service than by carrying through the mails by a forced construction a class of matter never intended to go through at the penny-a-pound rate.

I believe in cheap postage, but I want the reduction to be made in that class of matter that returns a profit or surplus to the Department rather than in the class that results in the loss of millions. Let us make the service more efficient, meeting the exactions and demands of the great commercial centers, and when we reduce postage let it be made in that class that will benefit the great communities and the body of the people.

The proposition is simple—all favor a reduction of postage. We want to reach that condition. We will never reach it if we reduce postage on that class of mail matter that to-day brings the postal service in deficiency.

Millions of dollars are made on first, third, and fourth class matter. Millions are lost on second-class matter. Why add the third-class matter and add additional millions of loss? Reduce where you make surplus or profit; let stand still the class where you lose. One-cent postage will come to the people before long if we are wise in our legislation; this bill is in that direction, and I hope it will pass as it came from the committee, matured and adjusted in the interest of a low rate of postage that in the near future Congress can wisely formulate and consummate.

Mr. BLOUNT. There has been a suggestion thrown out that this legislation would help the express companies. I do not think, as my friend from Pennsylvania has stated, that that suggestion has any place here. The Congress of the United States has provided for the carrying of its mails and has made the classification of first, second, third, and fourth class matter.

The complaint here is that the opinion of the Attorney-General has improperly transferred from the third-class rates to the second class certain matter, and that that ought to be corrected. I think, sir, that the statute is quite clear.

The gentleman from Illinois seems to admit this. He claims that prior to 1879 the statute was different; but he thinks—he does not assert it, he seems to be uncertain in his own mind—but he thinks that this class of books should pass as second-class matter.

I think I can satisfy my friend from Illinois that he is mistaken.

I hold in my hand an opinion of the Attorney-General, of July 28, 1877, discussing this very question and construing it. The provision of law is just the same as that of 1879. So far as this matter went it was a mere codification and nothing more; so that I think we may assume that the Attorney-General would not in 1877 give an opinion on a statute that was not passed until 1879. I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read the opinion of the postmaster of New York, which is so clear and practical that I trust the House will give it attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE, NEW YORK, N. Y., OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER.
February 17, 1886.

SIR: * * * The law enumerates "books" as embraced among "mail matter of the third class," and it would not seem to have been the intention of Congress to admit books in any form to the second class. In the section (14) setting forth the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class the third condition is that "it must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguishes printed books for preservation from periodical publications."

The use of this language does not involve the conclusion that books not "for preservation" (as shown by the absence of substantial binding) are to be considered as "periodical publications," and only periodical publications are entitled to second-class privileges. The fact that such a binding usually distinguishes books from periodicals is well known; but it does not follow that all publications consisting of unbound sheets are "periodicals." A "book" can not be changed into a "periodical" simply by numbering and dating it as one of a series of publications. That it forms "number 1" of a series issued under the general title of a "library," and bears the date of "January 1," does not alter its character nor detract from its value for reading purposes as a "book." It is the custom in some countries to issue nearly all books in pamphlet form, with paper covers, leaving the purchaser free to consult his own wishes or taste as to binding, and it has never been claimed that a "transient" book in paper covers, without number or date, was admissible to the mails at other than third-class rates. Did Congress intend that the book "Don Quixote," or the book "Waverly," should be converted into a periodical by omitting substantial binding, giving it a number and date, and printing above its proper title the name of this or that "library?"

Second-class matter, according to the fourth condition in the last-quoted section, "must be originated and published, first, for the dissemination of information of a public character; or, second, devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers." Books may be so originated and published, and also may be devoted to any of the subjects named; but these facts alone do not properly bring them within the definition of periodical publications. A history is essentially composed of information of a public character; so is a geography or arithmetic. A treatise on astronomy, on sculpture or painting, on ship or house building, is "devoted to" the subject of which it treats; but a book, complete in itself, can not be considered as being "devoted to" literature (which word, as used in the statute, I take as intended to convey the meaning attaching to "belles-lettres," for which there is no exact English equivalent) unless it shall treat of that subject in general. It is literature, but it is not periodical literature, and no addition or omission of binding, or insertion of date or number, can make it so. To take a recent instance, Stormonth's English Dictionary was issued in twenty-six parts, each printed on superior paper, with a cover (of inferior paper) bearing the title of a "library," with date and number in due form, and was mailed as second-class matter. Collated and bound, these parts, printed from the same plates, are advertised and sold as a "book" by the publishers. Is it any more or less a book now than it was when deposited, a certain number of pages at a time, in the post-office under covers, with the name of a "library," and dates and numbers printed thereon?

* * * * * * *

Very respectfully,

H. G. PEARSON,
Postmaster.

Hon. WILLIAM F. VILAS,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think this matter is sufficiently understood, and I ask the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 71.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CANNON. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with instructions to report a bill fixing the postage on all books, bound or unbound, of the weight now allowed by law, at the rate of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the present deficiency?

Mr. BLOUNT. About $2,000,000. But if you reduce the rate from 8 cents to 1 I do not know what it will be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the motion to recommit be read.

The motion was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 151, not voting 55; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CANNON was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. KEAN.

Mr. SPINOLA with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BROWER.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. BACON with Mr. WOODBURN.

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. GEST.

Mr. STOCKDALE with Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio.

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. HIESTAND were announced as paired on all political questions until February 8; and

Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. MOFFITT until February 7.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. If I were not paired, I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with instructions to report a bill fixing the postage on books, bound or unbound, newspapers, periodicals, pamphlets, and magazines of the weight now fixed by law at the rate of 2 cents per pound, provided that as to newspapers the rate now fixed for publishers shall not be changed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point that that motion is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Rule XVII, clause 1, provides that it shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question has been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to submit or entertain a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to have that rule read. The motion of the gentleman from Kansas is not in order.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I move simply to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 90.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 145, nays 116, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—145.

So the bill was passed.

After the conclusion of the roll-call, but before the announcement of the result, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in his seat when his name was called?

Mr. BREWER. I was not here when my name was called, but——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that if the gentleman was in the bar of the House during the roll-call he can vote.

Mr. BREWER. I was here during the roll-call, but not present when my name was called, because it is very near the beginning of the list.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's request can not be entertained.

Mr. BREWER. Then I raise the question against the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. YARDLEY], who is in the same position.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not yet asked to have his vote recorded.

Mr. YARDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote. I stood right here when my name was called on the second call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will record the gentleman's vote.

Mr. YARDLEY. I vote "nay."

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The rule, I believe, prescribes that a member to be entitled to vote shall be within the Hall during the roll-call. I desire to know whether it is necessary that he be in the Hall at the time his name is called. Is not the rule complied with if he be present during any portion of the roll-call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read as follows from Rule XV, clause 1:

1. Upon every roll-call, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, then the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the gentleman will perceive, the rule is more strict than the custom, and would even prevent any request whatever to record a vote after the conclusion of the roll-call.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote. I was present during the second roll-call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts states that he was present during the roll-call, and asks leave to vote.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I vote "yea."

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to object to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL] having his vote recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan, as the Chair understands, raises a point of order. He will state it.

Mr. BREWER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who cast his vote a few moments ago, was not, I believe, in the Hall at the time his name was called.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I stated when I asked to have my vote recorded that I was present during the second roll-call. The gentleman evidently did not hear my statement.

Mr. BREWER. No; I did not.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill and a resolution of the following titles, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 1213) to punish robbery, burglary, and larceny in the Indian Territory; and

A House concurrent resolution to provide for printing the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1886–'87.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following:

House concurrent resolution providing for printing 2,500 copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; and

House concurrent resolution providing for printing 17,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the contested-election case of Lowry vs. White, from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana.

Mr. WEAVER. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] rises to a question of privilege, and will state it.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have corrected the reference of a bill which was reported to the House from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I refer to bill No. 2012, which has been referred to the House Calendar, when it ought to have gone to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the bill require an appropriation?

Mr. DINGLEY. It does not.

Mr. WEAVER. I will answer the question. I think it does. It provides for the appropriation of $80,000,000 of money, now in the hands of the Government as a trust fund. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to invest 80 per cent. of the money deposited to retire national-bank circulation. It further provides for the disposition of public property. The latter part of the bill provides for the sale of Government bonds under contingencies specified. The bill, therefore, ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill simply authorizes the investment of lawful money deposited in the Treasury by the national banks for the redemption of their notes. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds with this lawful money, and to hold those bonds in the same manner as the lawful money is now held. No appropriation is required.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman, does not the bill also authorize the sale of bonds?

Mr. DINGLEY. It authorizes the purchase of bonds for lawful money.

Mr. CRISP. I rise to a question of order. Must not this be decided without debate? If so, I object to debate.

Mr. WEAVER. It is a question of change of reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that it is a question of privilege, and is debatable. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia, when he rose, that he rose to a question of privilege, and he then yielded to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman so stated.

Mr. CRISP. I understand this matter of the gentleman from Iowa is merely a change of reference of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. That is what it is.

Mr. CRISP. I did not understand that that was a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Georgia insists on his question of privilege, the Chair will sustain it.

Mr. WEAVER. There will be no debate should the Chair decide the question.

Mr. CRISP. I insist on my motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Georgia can make the point when this again comes up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia is on the floor.

Mr. WEAVER. I understand the gentleman has no objection to the Chair deciding the question.

Mr. CRISP. I must insist on going on with the privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can be considered hereafter.

Mr. CRISP. I should like to have an understanding or arrangement with the gentlemen on the other side as to the time to be occupied by the discussion of this report and resolution.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask the gentleman to allow me to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. CRISP. I dislike to object.

Mr. BRUMM sent his bill up to the Clerk's desk to be read by its title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a private bill and will be filed under the rule through the box.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to present, by unanimous consent, the petition of more than six thousand adult male residents of the District of Columbia protesting against prohibitory laws for the District of Columbia. I claim it is a question of the highest privilege because it pertains to the sacred right of petition.

A MEMBER. File it in the box.

Mr. GUENTHER. It is too bulky to be put in the box.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman state what time will suit them on the other side?

Mr. ROWELL. It has been said that four hours on a side will be satisfactory.

Mr. CRISP. If that can be agreed upon, we will accept that proposition. I would like, by unanimous consent, to have it understood that at the expiration of eight hours' debate the previous question should be considered as ordered.

Mr. ROWELL. I would not agree to that; but we do agree that the debate shall terminate in eight hours.

Mr. CRISP. Then I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois shall control the four hours of debate on that side, and myself that on this side.

Mr. LANHAM. I hope that to-morrow, which is private-bill day, will not be taken up with this matter, but that it will be allowed to go over until Saturday.

Mr. CRISP. Of course we have conflicting interests in this House, but there can be no higher question than the right of a member to his seat. Some gentlemen must get out of the way when this question is raised.

Mr. REED. We can raise the question of consideration to-morrow.

Mr. CRISP. The question of the right of way is of no value if we do not exercise it. That is the proposition always, that we shall not exercise it.

Mr. RYAN. It is in the hands of the House, anyhow.

INDIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. CRISP. I yield for one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARRY].

Several MEMBERS. We have not had the time fixed yet.

Mr. CRISP. Yes, I thought it was arranged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it is agreed between gentlemen on both sides that the debate shall continue for eight hours, four hours to be allowed to each side.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues on the Committee on Elections did me the honor to select me to prepare and present to the House the report of the majority of the committee in this case, and it seems to be in the order of things that I should, from my place on this floor, give the reasons of the majority of the committee for the conclusions at which they have arrived, and also show the cause, if I can, why the House should ratify the findings of that committee.

Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of this case there are two grave questions involved, questions that are profound, that are far-reaching, and that are rooted in the very foundations of our political system. I allude to the questions of citizenship and of suffrage.

In the discussion of questions of such magnitude, Mr. Speaker, it requires no effort of modesty upon the part of a man of my mold to say that I recognize the fact that I am deficient in that research, that learning, that ability necessary and adequate to the treatment of such commanding questions. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I am right, and I am satisfied that I can adduce authorities to sustain my position, and I do not believe an adjudicated case can be found to the contrary.

I would state at the outset that in the consideration of this cause I have not been influenced by partisan prejudices. So far as in me lay I have endeavored to dismiss from my mind all political sympathies or prejudices. To say that I have entirely succeeded may perhaps be going too far.

Something may be pardoned to our common nature; and if I have based my conclusions on considerations of that kind, I can say and say truly that I am not conscious of such a fact. I am but human and a Democrat. To be more than human, a man is too good for this earth; to be less than that, he is unworthy the name of a man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the questions presented in this case are twofold, and before presenting them I will state to the House the admitted facts that lead up to a common ground upon which we can all meet, and where the committee, the majority and minority, diverge. It is admitted that an election was held in the Twelfth Congressional district of the State of Indiana at the last Congressional election. It is admitted that the contestee, Mr. White, received about 2,500 majority over the contestant, Mr. Lowry. That far is admitted on all hands. It is also in evidence by a certified transcript from the record of the circuit court of Allen County, Indiana, that contestee filed his declaration of intention to become naturalized on July 24, 1858.

It is also admitted that Mr. White is a native of Scotland, and that he emigrated to the United States in the year 1854. Then the question presents itself whether or not he, having received the highest number of votes, is a citizen under the Constitution of the United States, and entitled to hold the office. Or I will present the question in this way: First, is Mr. White a naturalized citizen of the United States, and can he prove that fact by parol evidence? I anwer that he can not. Second, if he has been admitted to citizenship, do the facts in this case, as disclosed by the oral proof, establish that fact? In my judgment, the fact is not established, even by oral proof. And, third, the contestant, having received a minority of the votes cast, but having received the next highest number of votes cast at that election, is he, if the contestee is ineligible, entitled to the seat? The majority of the committee answer that he is not.

The doctrine that when the candidate receiving the maiority of votes is ineligible, the candidate receiving the next highest vote can not take the office, and the election fails, is too well established in the United States and in both branches of Congress to require discussion. Perhaps Indiana is the only State in the Union where this rule is adhered to.

First and foremost, then, the question presented here is this: Can naturalization be proved by parol evidence? The contention as formulated in the brief and argument of the very able counsel of the contestee states it in this way: Can naturalization be proven by parol? And furthermore, then, he asserts that citizenship is conferred solely by the oath of the applicant. I respectfully dissent from that, and say it can not be proven by parol, and that it is not the oath of the applicant by itself, in the absence of the record, that would confer citizenship, but the oath, the evidence, which find a judicial determination in the judgment of the court; and that it is the judicial action of the court which confers citizenship.

That, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, is a statement of the case. Hence it follows, if we are correct upon the legal point alone, that he can not prove naturalization by parol, then the contestee is not entitled to a seat upon this floor.

Now I will state in that connection what it is also admitted, nay, more than that, it is proven by the contestee himself, that there is no record in this case of his naturalization and that there is no trace of such a record. Furthermore, it is proven that there never had been a record in this case nor even an effort made to make a record, but he claims that he had a certificate of citizenship and that is lost. He also endeavors to prove that certificate by showing cotemporaneous transcripts of the record from Allen County, Indiana, which he assumes is in duplicate of the certificate issued to him and that that certificate is lost. It is not claimed here that there was a record lost and destroyed and an attempt made to prove its contents. The attempt to prove the contents of the alleged certificate in that manner is a species of evidence too remote, too speculative and inferential to be worthy of consideration as authority.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BARRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to ask this question: whether, under the law of Indiana, this contestee, being a citizen of the State, could he have voted if his vote had been challenged in that election if he had not his naturalization papers to present?

Mr. BARRY. Oh, yes; he can vote there on a declaration of intention.

Mr. SCOTT. He could not do that in our State.

Mr. BARRY. It is so in Indiana; and I will state again to the House that it is in proof and is admitted that in July, 1858, the contestee, Mr. White, filed his declaration of intention in the circuit court of Allen County, Indiana. That is admitted. Now, first I lay down this proposition, that exclusive power is conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution to regulate the question of naturalization. That is exclusive. In pursuance of that Congress has enacted laws. The existing law is familiar to the members of this House. It is found in section 2165 and the sections which follow of the Revised Statutes. Section 2165 reads thus:

An alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States in the following manner, and not otherwise:

First. He shall declare on oath, before a circuit or district court of the United States, or a district or supreme court of the Territories, or a court of record of any of the States having common-law jurisdiction and a seal and clerk, two years at least prior to his admission, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and particularly, by name, to the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty of which the alien may be at the time a citizen or subject.

Second. He shall, at the time of his application to be admitted, declare, on oath, before some one of the courts above specified, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he absolutely and entirely renounces and abjures all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and, particularly, by name, to the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty of which he was before a citizen or subject; which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court.

Then what shall the court do?

Third. It shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court admitting such alien that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the State or Territory where such court is at the time held one year at least, and that during that time he has behaved as a man of a good moral character attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same; but the oath of the applicant shall in no case be allowed to prove his residence.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the law. It will be observed that the statute says that an alien may be admitted to be a citizen of the United States "in the following manner and not otherwise;" and furthermore it says the proceedings shall be recorded. Congress was especially careful to guard this by providing that the proceedings should be recorded in a court of record having common-law jurisdiction and a clerk and a seal.

Then the question arises, what confers naturalization? In my judgment it is the record of the court which confers naturalization on the foreigner admitted to citizenship, the proceedings required by the statute culminating in a judgment of the court. An alien admitted to citizenship in the United States is a creature of the law, a mere product of the statute; different from the native, for the native is born, not made; and the naturalized alien is made, not born, and has to bring himself strictly, in my judgment, within the essential provisions of the statute.

There is a case remarkably similar to this, the case of Dryden vs. Swinburne, in 20 West Virginia Reports. Swinburne in that case had filed his declaration of intention in 1856, and claimed that he was naturalized in 1858. The record, which was inspected, discloses that he was not naturalized at all, exactly as in this case. The record showed, said the judge, no proceedings of that kind. Then Swinburne said, "I can establish it by parol;" and the court held as I shall now read from page 121:

If the record of this court at the time when it is claimed that an alien was thus admitted to citizenship is produced, and shows that he was not only not so admitted but not admitted at all, how can any parol evidence on any conceivable legal principle be admitted to prove a fact which it is conclusively shown can not possibly exist? The defendant's counsel refer to the following authorities to show that in this case such parol evidence was admissible.

Which authorities—no matter.

This judge then takes up and discusses the authorities so referred to. And the court further says, on page 127:

Our conclusion is that when the record-book of a court before which it is claimed a foreigner was naturalized is produced, and on its examination it appears that he was not naturalized, no parol proof can be received that he was naturalized before this court, nor can any facts, such as his voting or holding office, in such a case be introduced as the foundation for the presumption that he has been naturalized, there being in such case no room for any such presumption.

But the present case is still stronger against the defendant, for in this case the record-book of the circuit court of Kanawha was produced, and it appeared thereby that on the 15th day of June, 1866, Ralph Swinburne was an alien, owing allegiance to Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and as such alien he,

on that day, appeared before said court and asked to be admitted as a citizen of the United States, and having complied with the law and taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, etc.

Then the court says:

And now it is gravely insisted——

Mr. REED. Give us the rest of that record. So far as you have read he appeared and took the oath.

Mr. BARRY. I left out some of the formal verbiage. I will read the rest of the sentence:

And to renounce his allegiance to Queen Victoria, he was admitted as a citizen of the United States. And now it is gravely insisted that in contradiction of this record it may be proven by parol that he had not owed allegiance to Queen Victoria for years prior to this time, and that he was not at that time, and had not been for years an alien, and that he was not admitted at that time, as the record says, to citizenship, but had been a citizen for years prior to that time.

Mr. REED. Then that was a case where it was proposed to contradict a record?

Mr. BARRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Just what the contestee proposes to do in this case.

Mr. BARRY. But wait.

Mr. REED. I am going to wait.

Mr. BARRY. The Monday before the election in 1886 the contestee went to Warsaw, Kosciusko County, and took out naturalization papers renouncing all allegiance to Queen Victoria and other foreign governments, and taking the oath of allegiance to the United States; yet now he comes up and says he proposes to contradict that record and to show that he was naturalized on or about the 25th day of February, 1865. That is what he attempts to establish by parol. Now, I will read from a case in 2 Abbott's U. S. Reports:

The proceeding to obtain naturalization is clearly a judicial one. A hearing is required to be had in open court, and the right can be conferred only by the judgment of the court on satisfactory proof.

This case is also relied upon by the contestee. I invite the attention of the House now to read a very well-considered case, that of Charles Green's Sons against Salas, reported in the Federal Law Reporter. In that case there was a certificate of naturalization in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Georgia. That certificate was presented; but what did the court say? I read:

In other words, was there a judgment admitting Raymond Salas to American citizenship? In the absence of proof of the loss or destruction of a record (and there is no pertinent proof of that here) the method of proving the record is by the record itself or an extract from it. The certificate of the clerk in itself is neither such evidence nor such extract; it is a recital of what he thinks he has done.

And the court held that naturalization could not be proved in that way.

I refer the House also to the case of Miller vs. Reinhart, 18 Georgia, where the identical question here came up. In that case the party presented his certificate of final admission to citizenship, and the court held that—

Proceedings of naturalization have to be recorded—"which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court," is the language of the act of Congress on the subject. The certificate does not give the words of any part of the record. The certificate seems to be a statement of what, in the clerk's opinion, is the legal import or effect of the different particulars of which the record may consist.

In this case there was presented a certificate signed by the clerk of a court of record, but the court held that it was not evidence to prove naturalization. In the case now under discussion no certificate has been exhibited to the committee or submitted in testimony.

I read here from Hill's New York Reports, volume 7, page 138:

There must be an application for admission to the right of citizenship, made in due form to one of the courts indicated in the acts of Congress on the subject. The application must be supported by legal proof of the facts on which it rests. The proceedings are strictly judicial. * * * The right of citizenship is finally conferred by the judgment of the court. This judgment can only be rendered when the court has become satisfied that all the conditions of naturalization have been complied with. By the first section of the act of April 14, 1802, aliens are to be admitted as citizens on the conditions specified, "and not otherwise." The court, therefore, must, in the language of the act, be "satisfied" that all these conditions have been complied with; that the residence of the applicant and his behavior have been such as the law requires, and that his attachment to our form of government is firm and sincere. These are imperative duties resting upon the court, which can not be evaded or overlooked. Judgment can not in these cases pass by default or as a matter of course.

I read now from the case of Rutherford against Crawford, in 53 Georgia, 143. In that case the court say:

We know of no way to prove the proceedings of a court of record but by its records. It appears from an inspection of the record that there was no jury at the term this judgment was had. If so, there was no authority to have a judgment upon. It is a gross and palpable irregularity. Not a mere defect in pleading, but, as appears from the record, an exercise of authority not authorized by law. Without a jury there could be no verdict, and without a verdict the attorney of the plaintiff had no right to enter up a judgment.

In that case the court distinctly decided that the proceedings of a court of record could be proved only by the record itself, or, of course, by an exemplification of the record.

It is claimed here that contestee had a certificate; but even if a certificate is introduced, if it be shown that there is no record to support it, the certificate of itself does not prove naturalization. This brings me back to the point which I asserted at the outset, that it is the judgment of the court which confers naturalization, and that at most the certificate can only be evidence of that judgment.

I read now from a high authority—McCrary, section 56. McCrary says:

Application for naturalization must be made in open court, and evidence of residence, etc., must be taken by the oral examination of witnesses and not by previously prepared affidavits. Certificates of naturalization issued by the clerk of a court, without any hearing in open court, are void and confer no right of citizenship.

In Taylor vs. Henry, 2 Pick., 397, where the record of a town meeting failed to show an adjournment, the court held that parol evidence of the adjournment was not admissible. The court say:

It would be dangerous to admit such proof. If a fact of this kind can be proved by parol evidence, it is difficult to see why the election of officers may not be proved in the same manner.

And if (I will say) their election could be so proved it follows hard upon that citizenship may as easily be established and the law stands for naught. And I will add also, if the great fact of naturalization, whereby a man is recreated, is clothed with the sovereign powers and prerogatives of American citizenship, can be proved by parol, then it is difficult to see why any judgment of any court can not be established by parol testimony and thus obliterate the most ancient and wisest principles of jurisprudence. In the case which I hold in my hand (Andrews vs. Boylston, 110 Mass., page 214) the circumstances were these: The records of the town failed to show that upon a vote to re-establish the school-district system therein there was a two-thirds vote. The court held parol evidence inadmissible in such a case. The record showed that there was a vote upon establishing the school-district system, and the attempt was made to prove by parol that there was a two-thirds vote, as it seems the law required. In this case of Andrews vs. Boylston the court held that this could not be shown by parol evidence, that the record must disclose the fact. I esteem this a strong case in point.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to a decision affirming this identical point—that naturalization can not be proven by parol. It is the case of Richard Slade vs. Daniel Minor, 2 Cranch Circuit Court Reports for the District of Columbia, page 139. This was a case against the deputy marshal of the District for levying distress for a militia fine imposed by a battalion court of inquiry under acts of Congress of March 3, 1803, and July 1, 1812 (2 Statutes, 215, 769), more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia. The court (Thurston, judge, absent) was of the opinion that it was only necessary for the defendant in his justification to prove those facts which gave the battalion court of inquiry jurisdiction and which showed that the tribunal was regularly constituted, and that having shown this, the acts of that court were to be presumed to be correct, and that it was not competent for the plaintiff to show their irregularity. The court also decided that an alien was not liable to militia duty, and that the naturalization of Charles Slade, the plaintiff's father, could not be proved by parol.

Mr. Speaker, many other familiar authorities could be cited from the text-books and decided cases to establish the proposition that you can not prove a record by parol. But I feel that I trespass upon the attention of the House and fatigue its kindly consideration by advancing propositions which are elementary, recognized as familiar by every student of the law and every layman who ever gave a thought to this subject.

If we are correct in the position that Mr. White can not prove his naturalization by parol, then in legal contemplation he has not been naturalized. Under the Constitution of the United States, before a man can represent a constituency in this body three great co-ordinate qualifications must be combined: first, he must be an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen; second, he must be twenty-five years old; and third, he must have been seven years a citizen of the United States. As to the vital requirement of citizenship the contestant, in the opinion of the majority of the committee, is signally deficient.

I now invite the attention of the House to a brief examination of the question whether (if it be assumed that it is permissible for the contestee to prove his citizenship by oral evidence) satisfactory evidence to that effect has been presented. Who are the important witnesses on this point? In this respect the record is brief. The only witnesses who claim to have been present, besides the contestee, at the time when he claims to have been naturalized are Isaac Jenkinson and William Pratt. In my judgment, the memory of Mr. Jenkinson is so defective that it can not safely be trusted. What does he say? He says, "I think Captain White was naturalized within one or two years after his return from the war, at Fort Wayne." He says, "I might have been there as Captain White's friend. My impression is that I was there as a witness; but I am not positive." He also says that he was not sure whether Judge Borden was on the bench or not. He says, "I am not sure who was judge at the time, but it was the judge of the circuit court that was presiding, whoever he was." He also says, "I have no recollection now of who were present, except that it was in the court at the time;" and he says he can not remember who was the clerk or who was the sheriff at that time. He says he does not know whether there was in existence at that time a common pleas court in Allen County; and then he makes this vitally important statement. He says, "There were present Captain White, John Brown, and E. L. Chittenden." Mr. Pratt does not say whether Mr. Chittenden was present or not.

Now, turn to Mr. White's testimony, on page 230 of the printed record. He is detailing his interview with Bell and Moynihan.

In his interview with Moynihan and Bell, on the Friday prior to the election, he stated that he was an earnest worker for Frémont in his candidacy for President; that he believed the salvation of the country depended on his election; that he was enthusiastic and voted for him; that "I remembered very well of taking out my first papers in the little brick on the corner of Maine and Calhoun streets, then the clerk's office, and that Chittenden was then in the office; and the next time, I said, when I took out my second papers, Jenkinson was one of my witnesses." That is Mr. White's admission. That Mr. Chittenden was in the office with him at the time he took out his first papers.

Now Mr. Moynihan, on page 400 of the record, says this: That in that interview which he and Ben had with him on Friday just before the election, Mr. White stated he believed Mr. Nelson was clerk, and Mr. Chittenden was in the office.

A. He said that in company with Isaac Jenkinson he went to the court-house and complied with, as he supposed, the forms of naturalization. He believed that Mr. Nelson was clerk and that Mr. Chittenden was in the office; he added that he was a young man then, and didn't bear in mind all the facts concerned in his action on that occasion.

The witness is here discussing what he claims the contestee stated to him as to his then alleged naturalization in 1857 or 1858; or, in point of fact, when he filed his declaration of intention.

But Mr. Purman swears, on page 219 of the record, that Mr. White (the contestee) stated to him Jenkinson and Chittenden were present when he took out his second papers.

Mr. Purman says:

In this same conversation with Captain White he told me that he had said to Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan, and he repeated the statement to me as a fact, that Isaac Jenkinson and Mr. Chittenden were present when he took out his second papers.

Now, it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Chittenden was not there when those papers were taken out, as is claimed now, "the second time"—in 1865—and to be charitable, I think the contestee, when he alluded to taking out his second papers, referred to the time when he filed the declaration of intention to become a citizen, in 1858. He says himself that he voted for Frémont. It is a historical fact that it was in 1856 that Frémont was a candidate for the Presidency. No doubt he did this, thinking it was all right, and that when he filed his declaration of intention he supposed that completed his citizenship.

The record further discloses the fact that he made diligent search for the papers when his attention was called to it previous to the election, when Mr. Moynihan and Mr. Bell went to him on the Friday prior to the election and told him they had come to see him in regard to that one especial fact, whether or not he had taken out his second papers and was naturalized. Mr. White stated that he had no recollection where the papers were, but that he thought he had been naturalized. But I call the attention of the House to the fact that it is nowhere shown in this record, not one single witness hints at such a thing, that when this question was up for discussion, when the public prints teemed with it, when the public mind was excited over the question of Mr. White's citizenship—whether or not he was naturalized—when that one pregnant fact presented itself to his mind, he never did say that he was naturalized in 1865, nor does any person say pending that hot discussion that he was present when he was naturalized, as he now asserts, in 1865.

It is passing strange to me, with everything to arouse his recollection at this crisis, when he conferred with Messrs. Purman & Colerick, his lawyers, and other advisers as to what he should do in regard to that matter, that he was silent as to his naturalization in 1865. And they concluded the best thing he could do under the circumstances was to go to Warsaw on Monday and take out naturalization papers there. I believe it hardly possible under the known laws of the operations of the human mind at such a crisis as that, at that supreme hour, no matter how dormant a man's memory might be, that he could not recollect that single supreme fact in his life's history. I think it is impossible he should forget it then and only remember it after this controversy came up.

Now turn to the testimony of Mr. Fleming, on page 381. What does he say? He says that he was clerk of the Allen circuit court from November, 1862, to November, 1870. Mark that! He further stated that he was also ex officio clerk of the court of common pleas and criminal court. He fails to testify that he recollects the contestee coming before him or the court when he was clerk, and becoming naturalized in 1865, when he was clerk. He would be a vital witness on that point. He is silent as to that. Why did not contestee place him on the stand? He also stated that he examined the record of contestee's declaration of intention to become a citizen on the 24th of July, 1858, as it appears on the record in the office of the clerk of the Allen circuit court; and that he found the declaration partly in writing and partly in print; the written portion in the handwriting of Erastus L. Chittenden.

That was in July, 1858, when the contestee, Mr. White, as shown by the record, filed his declaration of intention, and that was the time when Mr. Chittenden and Mr. Pratt were there, and when Isaac Jenkinson was there, for Jenkinson states in his own testimony that if there was only one time when he was with Chittenden and that was in 1858, that was the time, showing clearly that his memory is not clear and that he did not confidently rely upon it himself. It is also shown that Chittenden has been dead for some time.

Now I want to call attention to another thing. This witness further testifies that up to 1862 Mr. Chittenden was there as deputy clerk under Mr. J. D. G. Nelson, and after 1862, in 1863 and a long period thereafter, he was city clerk of the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., showing that his official connection was entirely severed from the office of the circuit clerk, and that he was there in 1858 when he was deputy under Mr. Nelson, and only up to 1862, when the witness, Mr. Fleming, came in as circuit clerk.

Now, William Pratt was another man the contestee said was there, but he seems from his general examination to remember very little about it also. He was asked this question, which he answers quite promptly:

Who was acting as clerk of the court of common pleas at the time of which you speak?

That was the time when contestee claims he was naturalized, and of which witness is speaking. He replied:

It was either Bill Nelson, or Sharp Wisner; I don't know which it was.

This, in connection with Fleming's testimony, discloses the fact that Bill Nelson was a deputy under his father, and that while he was deputy this naturalization took place. His father's term of office had expired in 1862; and Pratt locates Nelson in the office at the time of this alleged naturalization, another circumstance going to show, to my mind at least, that the time of what was called the naturalization was in point of fact the time he filed his declaration of intention in 1858.

Now I invite attention to this significant fact in the contestee's testimony, to be found on page 229. The contestee had testified that he took out his first papers at the clerk's office, and that Mr. Chittenden was then present. But in answer to a question he says:

I went with Mr. John Brown, accompanied with Mr. Alexander Muirhead, for that purpose. I told them to go to the court-house, and I would get Hon. Isaac Jenkinson as my other witness. I went there with Mr. Jenkinson, and Mr. Chittenden was there in the court-house, and Mr. David H. Colerick was there. Judge Boyden was in the court, on the bench, and I told him I wanted to get my second papers.

So there is the testimony of White himself, the contestee, that in the first instance, 1858, Chittenden was with him, and then he contradicts himself and places him there in 1865, when he says he was naturalized by the court of common pleas of Allen County.

Mr. BLAND. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to inquire in what year the declaration was made and before what court?

Mr. BARRY. I am not quite sure whether it was the circuit court or the court of common pleas, but the declaration was filed in July, 1858, and in the circuit court, as I now remember.

Mr. BLAND. Is there any record of that?

Mr. BARRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAND. In what court does he claim to have applied for citizenship?

Mr. BARRY. Well, it is not clear, but either the circuit or common pleas court. As I say, there is no witness of that fact but Jenkinson (except contestee), whose memory appears to be very treacherous upon that point; also Mr. Pratt, and I think he locates it in the common pleas court.

Mr. BLAND. But the court did make a record in the first place?

Mr. BARRY. Certainly; but Jenkinson testifies as to the supposed naturalization that he did not know the day of the year or what term of the court it was, or what time of the year the court was held, showing a remarkably deficient memory of the whole affair, and indicating obviously that the time he was present was in 1858, as the handwriting of Chittenden there shows and the circumstances tend to prove.

Now, I invite your attention to another very significant fact disclosed in the testimony of White. In the redirect examination by Colerick, his attorney, this question was asked, and will be found on page 243:

123. Q. In answer to question 108, propounded to you by the contestant, you alluded to the presence of E. L. Chittenden as a clerk in the clerk's office at the time you were first naturalized. To what naturalization did and do you mean to refer?—A. I refer to the taking out of my first papers, which was July, 1858, declaring my intention to become a citizen of the United States.

Thus contradicting himself, as I have endeavored to show. He was there either one time or the other, and there is no proof that he was there both times, nor is there an effort so to prove; but the presumption from the testimony is overwhelming that he was there only in 1858.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is there a proper record of his declaration?

Mr. BARRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is all correct, then?

Mr. BARRY. Yes, sir; there is a record of his declaration of intention filed in 1858 in the circuit court of Allen County, Indiana. That is admitted and is in proof.

The only question is, was he naturalized in 1865? The committee find he was not. He asserts that he was, but the facts and the testimony do not sustain him in the assertion.

I have not time to go over the testimony fully, but will only invite your attention to an interview with White, the contestee, which took place on the Friday before election between Mr. Bell, who I understand to be a reputable gentleman of Fort Wayne, and Mr. Moynihan, the city editor of the Fort Wayne Sentinel. These gentlemen invited an interview with contestee, and served him with notice that the question was mooted that he was not a naturalized citizen, and if it was true, they wanted to be able to publish the facts, because if the assertion was incorrect, that he was not naturalized, and such a statement were published, it would only recoil on the Democratic party and would be a great injustice to contestee; that they wanted only the truth and to do him justice; that if he were not naturalized they wanted the Democratic party to have the advantage of that fact.

He said, "I do not know where my naturalization papers are; I know I have been naturalized;" although, according to their statements, he said first he had been naturalized and voted for Frémont, and then that he took out his final naturalization papers in 1858. That is about the substance of their testimony. But neither Bell nor Moynihan heard him say he was naturalized in 1865. They swear he never even alluded to that. Mr. Colerick, his attorney, never intimates that he had said any such thing, and he tells of his consultations with contestee. Mr. Purman, another of his attorneys, does not say that Mr. White ever told him so; he never hints to Purman he was naturalized in 1865, and all through the testimony the fact is disclosed that notices and hand-bills were sent out throughout the district asserting that the contestee was not naturalized, and that the contestee, through the public prints and by placards and printed notices scattered broadcast throughout the district, said, "I am a citizen, and have been naturalized," without saying he was naturalized in 1865, or even alluding to such a time.

It is also in proof that at the Academy of Music on the Saturday night prior to the election held on Tuesday the contestee placed his hand on his pocket saying, "I have my first, second, and third papers; if you put your votes in the ballot-boxes I will produce them."

Mr. WICKHAM. On what page of the record does it appear that he said he had the first, second, and third papers?

Mr. BARRY. I may possibly be in error about the third papers. I will read that to the House.

Mr. WICKHAM. I ask the gentleman furthermore, did not Mr. White then have his third papers from Kosciusko County?

Mr. BARRY. The point is that he was not in possession of any papers at all on Saturday evening, while he told the people that he had his papers. Andrew A. Purman, a lawyer in Fort Wayne, testifies:

On the Monday evening preceding the election Captain White said, as nearly as I can recollect, "I have my papers here," striking his pocket with his right hand, "and if you will put the little papers in the boxes for me to-morrow, after the election I will show my papers, and my third papers, too, if they want them."

That is as I quoted it——

Mr. WICKHAM. He did not say anything about his first and second papers.

Mr. BARRY. I was mistaken as to that. Mr. Purman proceeds:

He made no declaration at that or any other meeting on my advice, nor by the advice of my associate counsel, so far as I am informed.

Mr. Spencer, an attorney at law at Fort Wayne, testifies:

I know nothing about when the notice of contest was served. I did have a conversation with James B. White on the evening of last Thanksgiving day, at the residence of William Martin, on South Broadway, in this city, where we were both attending the silver wedding of said Martin and wife, and while in conversation with him Mr. White said to me that he had his second papers, and they were more than seven years old, and if I wanted to see them I could do so.

The time alluded to was on the 26th of November, 1886. George K. Torrence testifies:

I am acquainted with Capt. James B. White. He did address the meeting on that evening, and during that address he stated that if his fellow-citizens would elect him on the 2d day of November he would produce all the papers that would be required. That is, as near as I recollect, the 3d day of November; he would produce the papers on the 3d day of November.

Alluding to Saturday evening before the election. He would produce the papers on the 3d day of November; but he never did, save those taken out on Monday, the day before the election.

Then Joseph J. Edgarson testifies:

The meeting was held at the time and place appointed. Mr. White was present and addressed the meeting. In the course of his remarks or address he stated that he was a citizen and eligible to a seat in Congress, and that he had the papers to prove it. He further stated that if his fellow-citizens would give him their votes on the 2d day of November, on the 3d day of November he would produce his papers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is something here which to my mind is passing strange, and which I can not reconcile with the fact that Mr. White was naturalized in 1865. When addressing a multitude of people when this was the sole question agitating the public mind, and he stated to those people he had those papers then, why is it he never once alluded in any of those public addresses to the fact that he was naturalized in 1865?

Now, what was to be done in that crisis? It was concluded in consultation with able counsel that he should take out papers in Warsaw; and then on the Monday prior to the election of Tuesday he went to Warsaw, Kosciusko County, and took out naturalization papers there.

A great many of his friends assumed, and the testimony discloses that fact, that he became a citizen from having been a discharged Federal soldier, under the doctrine announced in the letter called the McKeever letter, written by the Assistant Adjutant-General of the United States, in 1882, to General John A. Logan, in response to a letter written by a Mr. Harper, which General Logan had referred to the War Department, that where a soldier honorably discharged was an alien without declaration of intention, and having had only one year's residence in the United States instead of five, he could be admitted to citizenship. The testimony discloses the fact that Mr. White's friends relied upon that. One witness, an editor of a newspaper, whose name escapes me, stated that was the theory which was maintained by the public prints in behalf of the contestee, and that they were relying upon what is called the McKeever letter to claim that he was admitted to citizenship under the act passed by Congress in 1862.

That being the fact, it is marvelous to me that the contestee did not say, "The McKeever letter aside, my declaration of intention in 1858 aside, and all to the contrary notwithstanding, I was naturalized in 1865; and William Pratt and Isaac Jenkinson are my witnesses. Go and ask them." "Fleming was clerk then. Call him as a witness." Nay, more, "Go and search the records of Allen County. They will tell I was admitted to citizenship in 1865." But not a word of that kind fell from his lips.

Never an utterance of that kind, or even a hint, came from any source during that campaign, and it was not until long afterwards, when this contest arose, that the contestee said he relied upon the fact that he was naturalized in 1865, although he had lost his naturalization papers. It is furthermore in proof, Mr. Speaker, that when this trouble was at its highest, just before the election, his friends, Mr. Purman and Mr. Oppenheim, went to him and told him that this was a crisis in his affairs and said to him, "Look for your papers. A publication of a damaging character will be made denying your citizenship; look for your papers and find them. Is it a fact that you are naturalized?" Read their testimony carefully, gentlemen, and you will see that he never intimated to those gentlemen, his confidential friends and advisers, that he had been naturalized in 1865.

What he said was, "I have my papers or I did have them; they may be lost like my discharge or my marriage certificate; I may not be able to produce them now." Then, after he had made search for them and they could not be found, when he had exhausted every means of finding his alleged papers, he appears before the people of Fort Wayne and says, "I have my naturalization papers; I have them here in my pocket." Mr. Speaker, I feel an extreme delicacy in pressing my conviction upon this point, because it conflicts with the statement of the contestee himself, a gentleman for whom I have none but the kindliest feeling; I say, sir, I feel great reluctance and delicacy in pressing my conviction upon this point, but I do feel assured that, if we are to rely upon mortal testimony, he was not naturalized in 1865.

And outside of that fact I feel assured—for I have found no authority to the contrary, though I have made diligent search—I feel certain, I say, that a person can not prove his naturalization by parol proof in the absence of all record. I have not found any case, in any authority, where the oath of itself confers naturalization. On the other hand, the authorities are numerous to the effect that it is the judgment of the court that confers naturalization. I will go further, and say that if the contestee could produce a certificate of naturalization, while it is not a record and does not confer naturalization—the judgment of the court being the only thing that does that—if he could produce a certificate, I say, I would receive it as evidence of naturalization; not as conclusive, but as prima facie evidence.

Mr. ROWELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if the contestee produced a certificate of naturalization and no record, the gentleman would receive that certificate as evidence of naturalization?

Mr. BARRY. I said that if he produced the certificate I would receive it as prima facie evidence, and if there was a record to back it, it would be conclusive; but, in the absence of a record where none existed, I could not accept the certificate as proof.

Mr. ROWELL. Then you would reject the naturalization?

Mr. BARRY. To accept the certificate as conclusive proof of naturalization would be to reject the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States and of every other court that has ever passed upon the question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Would my friend advise his party to adopt his rule in the city of New York? We would be very glad to have that rule obtain there.

Mr. BARRY. I do not profess, Mr. Speaker, to be the adviser of the party in New York. I am only trying to announce the law as I have found it, divested of all political partisanship or political feeling. If I know my heart, I have no such feeling in this matter.

Mr. WARNER. I understood the gentleman to say to his colleague on the committee [Mr. ROWELL] that if the contestee had presented a certificate he would have received that as prima facie evidence of his right to the seat.

Mr. BARRY. I said that.

Mr. WARNER. Would not that close the matter as far as the contestee in this case is concerned?

Mr. BARRY. No, sir. I say that if the certificate were presented I would treat it as secondary proof.

Mr. WARNER. As prima facie evidence?

Mr. BARRY. Yes; as prima facie evidence. Then, if the record was exhibited and it was shown, as in the West Virginia case, that there was no judgment of naturalization or record of proceedings I would not accept the certificate as proof.

Mr. WARNER. I am not asking about a case where there is evidence to show that there was no record. I am speaking simply of the absence of a record.

Mr. BARRY. If the certificate referred to a record, and if, upon examination, it was found that there was no such record, then I think the prima facie case would be rebutted, and he could not claim to be a citizen upon the mere certificate.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman permit another question? I do not wish to obtrude myself upon him.

Mr. BARRY. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. Supposing further, it should appear that the certificate was issued and the contestee presented the certificate; suppose, too, the fact appeared that no record was made at the time of the granting of the naturalization, but the contestee should bring in witnesses to show that the oath was administered to him and that all the prerequisites and conditions prescribed by the statute had been complied with and that the judge ordered the certificate to be issued, would the contestee then be entitled to his seat?

Mr. BARRY. He could go into that forum and by nunc pro tunc proceedings——

Mr. WARNER. That is not the question. Would he be entitled to his seat in this Congress?

Mr. BARRY. No.

Mr. WARNER. No?

Mr. BARRY. No.

Mr. WARNER. That is all.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What does my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BARRY] mean by a prima facie case?

Mr. BARRY. I mean this: Where the party exhibits a certificate purporting to recite a judgment of a court conferring citizenship upon him, that is a prima facie case of naturalization; but if, upon reference to the record which the certificate purports to recite, it appears in fact that no such record was made, then he can not claim to be a citizen simply on the certificate. In such a case there is no foundation for the certificate, and if he wants to make the record conclusive he can go into court and by nunc pro tunc proceedings establish the record, if it can be found.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I always supposed that a prima facie case was good until it was rebutted.

Mr. ROWELL. If there is no memorandum in the court of the judgment, can he have a nunc pro tunc order for record?

Mr. BARRY. I think not, if there is no record whatever.

Mr. MACDONALD. The gentleman [Mr. BARRY] has spoken of the record. I wish to ask him whether we are to understand the committee to report from the evidence that the books of record of the court at the time the contestee claims to have been naturalized were in such a condition that if the naturalization really took place it would almost certainly have been recorded?

Mr. BARRY. The records prove themselves. No such record was ever made. That is proved by the records and by witnesses.

Mr. STEELE. Do they not also prove that two hundred people there received certificates of naturalization of which no record was made in court?

Mr. BARRY. Well, that does not naturalize this contestee.

Mr. STEELE. As I understand, the evidence shows that there were issued over two hundred certificates of naturalization, no record of which appears in that court.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. There is record of every one of them.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARRY] a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. ROWELL. If any gentleman on the other side desires to go on now, I will reserve my time.

Mr. CRISP. I yielded only one hour, which the gentleman from Mississippi has exhausted. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] now use an hour.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope some one will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARRY] enough time to answer the question which the gentleman from Minnesota desires to put.

Mr. CRISP. I yielded only one hour. If any further time is to be given to the gentleman from Mississippi I hope it will be done by unanimous consent, because the time on this side has been parceled out to other gentlemen.

Several MEMBERS. All right.

Mr. BARRY. What is the question?

Mr. MACDONALD. I wish to know whether the condition of the record at the time when it is alleged the contestee was naturalized is shown to be such that there is a record of naturalizations which took place immediately before and immediately after the time of the alleged naturalization of the contestee?

Mr. BARRY. Oh, yes; the record discloses entries of that kind—naturalizations about that time.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there proof of the loss or destruction of those records?

Mr. BARRY. There is no proof and no contention—even the contestee does not claim—that the records were lost. The contestee takes the ground that through neglect or omission there never was any record.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is it a fact that the condition of the record is such that there could have been several persons naturalized at that time and no record as to any of them?

Mr. BARRY. I do not suppose anybody can be naturalized without a record.

Mr. ROWELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, as I desire that what I have to say on this case shall be spoken connectedly, I hope that my friends here will not consider me discourteous or uncivil if I request them to abstain from propounding questions to me until I have finished, when I shall be glad to answer any inquiry that I can.

Mr. Speaker, the disputed facts in this case are very few. It is conceded that Mr. White, the contestee, was born in a foreign land; that coming here something more than thirty-three years ago he settled in the State of Indiana, and has, with slight interruptions, resided there continuously ever since; that in 1858 he appeared in the proper court and in due form declared his intention to abjure allegiance to all foreign powers and become a citizen of our country; that afterward, in the dark days of the country's supreme peril, early in 1861, in response to the call of that country, he abandoned business, home, and family, and faithfully and bravely followed the country's flag through weary marchings and bloody battle until upon the memorable field of Shiloh he received serious wounds, the honorable scars of which he bears upon his body to-day.

Involved in a controversy of a personal character with his colonel, he resigned and returned to the avocations of peace, which he has so conducted and in which he has so lived that by the common consent of the community he has been placed in the front rank of his fellow-citizens. He has held the honorable position of alderman of the city of Fort Wayne. He has been the candidate of his party for county clerk, State senator, and Congressman; and in 1886, after a most excited and thorough campaign, at an election where more than 34,000 votes were cast, at an election the fairness and honesty of which in all its details are admitted, he, a Republican, running in a district which ordinarily gives 2,500 Democratic majority, received nearly 2,500 majority over his Democratic opponent, and more than 1,200 majority over all the candidates of all the parties.

I submit it is doubtful whether there be in this honorable body a member who comes here with so magnificent an indorsement from his immediate neighbors and fellow-citizens [applause]; and this will not be forgotten, I trust, when we come to consider the weight to be attached to the testimony of this man.

But notwithstanding the conceded fairness of this election, his opponent comes here and asks this House to set aside the verdict of the people at the polls, clearly and forcibly expressed, to deprive Captain White of the seat he so gallantly won, and, in spite of the verdict of the people, put him, the contestant, in. There was but one member of the committee that could swallow this proposition. I shall not disturb him in the painful process of digestion [laughter], but will pass to consider the proposition of the majority of the committee, which is that Mr. White was not naturalized for seven years prior to March 4, 1887, and that on this ground his seat should be declared vacant and this great constituency left without a Representative on this floor. I submit that this House will not be swift to grant this request, that it will respect the voice of the majority of that district, and will retain the sitting member, unless the House, having due regard to its own honor and the law of the case, should find it impossible to do so.

Now, this proposition that Mr. White was not naturalized for seven years prior to March 4, 1887, he disputes. He alleges that he was naturalized more than twenty years prior to that time.

I will briefly glance at the testimony. I insist that Mr. White has thoroughly established the proof of his claim, and I hope the House in investigating this case will honestly and fairly endeavor to ascertain whether Mr. White was really naturalized, not whether he can prove that fact in the technical form or in accordance with the narrow rule which some other tribunal may have laid down for the introduction of testimony before it. This House is a law unto itself, it is clothed with plenary power, and not bound by the precedents of other tribunals. I think it proper to make this remark, although I believe and hope every fair-minded man will finally agree that Mr. White has been able to make, and has made, his proof in accordance with the strictest rules of law.

What are the facts? It is admitted that in 1858 Captain White appeared in the proper court of Allen County and there made solemn declaration of his intention to abjure all foreign allegiance and become a citizen of this country. Now, when that is admitted, it is only reasonable and natural to expect that after he had made that solemn declaration he would follow it up and carry out that intention by becoming naturalized.

A MEMBER. That is admitted.

Mr. COOPER. That is admitted. That is the record; no one disputes that, that he took out his first papers, and especially when we find he continues to live in the country, identifies himself with the country, fights the battles of the country, makes his home here, and raises his children here. When all these facts are admitted to be true, what is more reasonable, what is more natural, than that at the proper time he did take the proper steps to become a citizen of the land which he loved and for which he had fought?

We find him, therefore, making a reasonable and natural statement when we find him swearing, as he does on page 229 of the record, to the following statement. I will read his terse, clear statement of facts as conclusive upon this matter. In answer to the question as to his admission as a citizen of the United States, and in answer to the other question to state all the attending circumstances and facts which enabled him to remember the fact of his naturalization, he states:

A. Yes, sir; I did. In the year 1865, in the latter part of February, about the 28th day of that month, I had determined to make a trip to Europe, and had talked with some of my friends in relation to it, amongst them Mr. John Brown, who advised me before doing so to take out my second papers in order to get a passport. I went with Mr. John Brown, accompanied with Mr. Alexander Muirhead, for that purpose. I told them to go to the court-house and I would get the Hon. Isaac Jenkinson as my other witness. I went there with Mr. Jenkinson, and Mr. Chittenden was there in the court-house—

Mark you, he does not say that Mr. Chittenden was clerk, as the gentleman claims who has just taken his seat. Mr. White from the first claimed that Mr. Nelson was clerk—and Mr. David H. Colerick was there. Judge Borden was in the court, on the bench, and I told him I wanted to get my second papers. He asked who my witnesses were. I said they were here. Mr. John Brown and Mr. Jenkinson were then sworn as my witnesses. I then took the oath, so prescribed for that purpose, to become a citizen of the United States. It was in the court of common pleas. The oath of allegiance was administered to me in open court by Judge Borden, the then presiding judge of the court of common pleas. The principal fact in connection therewith was the fact that I was going to Europe.

Q. Did you get your final certificate; and, if so, what did you do with it?

(Objected to by contestant, as being irrelevant and immaterial.)

A. Yes, sir; I got my final certificate, but, like my first certificate, it has been lost or mislaid, for I have searched for it; also the first one, and have been unable up to this time to find either of them.

Q. How soon, if at all, after you obtained your final certificate did you start for Europe?

Now, sir, that statement is true, or Mr. White has come here and manufactured a willful and deliberate lie. In 1858 he needed no witnesses and it was not necessary he should have proof. In 1858 he did not intend to make a trip to Europe, and there was therefore no necessity for him in 1858 to obtain a passport. Such was the case in 1865. On application for final papers he must have two witnesses. It is not denied that in 1865 he contemplated making a trip to Europe and had gone as far as the city of New York, when he received a telegram of the serious illness of his wife, which compelled him to return.

But, I repeat, it is impossible to say that this man has honestly confused these two dates. It is either true that in contemplation of a trip to Europe he took out his second naturalization papers, the necessary papers to become a citizen, or else this man, who comes here with such a splendid indorsement from his fellow-citizens, has committed the grossest outrage by a perjured misrepresentation of the facts.

Mr. BLAND. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I wish to ask a question.

Mr. COOPER. It will interrupt me very seriously.

Mr. BLAND. Upon this very question of the certificate.

Mr. COOPER. I will answer the gentleman when I get through, not now.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman will yield for a question before he finishes his argument, because this is the essential point.

Mr. COOPER. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have the testimony of Isaac Jenkinson, a man all concede to be one of the most honorable men in the State of Indiana, a prominent citizen; and all parties, even the majority of the committee, admit him to be of the most respectable character, and whose word would be taken anywhere upon any question. It is said that his testimony is vague and shadowy upon this proposition with reference to the naturalization of the contestee, because of an indistinctness of memory as to the occurrence. Mr. Jenkinson is the only one of the witnesses now alive. The testimony shows that there were but few men present in court at the time, for it is proven here that it was at a time when there was no trial going on, and none were present except those who were called to participate in the naturalization of the contestee. Is it strange, let me ask before I proceed, that of the number then present there should be few remaining, after the lapse of twenty-three years, who have not been garnered in by the grim reaper?

Twenty-three years from now how many of us will be alive to tell of the transactions of this day? But to Jenkinson's testimony, found on page 188 of the record; and I insist here that his testimony taken all together must satisfy the mind of any reasonable man as to the final naturalization of Captain White, or else the witness, who is of good repute, as all admit, is testifying to that which is false.

Now I admit, as a matter of course, that in the twenty-two years that have intervened between this transaction in court and the time when Mr. Jenkinson was called to testify, the details had passed out of his mind, and he admits it like the honest, honorable, and truthful man that he is, but he says:

I think Captain White was naturalized within one or two years after his return from the war, at Fort Wayne, and that I was present as a witness or a spectator. I am not sure which; I think I was a witness, however.

Then, in response to a rigid cross-examination, he is asked this question:

If the contestee was naturalized at the time you say he was, please say who were the witnesses.

Answer. My impression is that a gentleman named Brown and myself—

Thus corroborating the testimony of White himself—

My impression is that a gentleman named John Brown and myself were the witnesses. Now, that is my impression, but it is a very strong impression—

Says the witness.

He uses the word "impression," because this truthful witness, like a prudent man that he was, testifies only carefully and according to his recollection of the facts. Again he was asked this question:

Please state—

Says this pertinacious cross-examiner—

all who were present at the time you claim that the contestee was naturalized.

The witness answers:

Well, besides the judge and officers of the court, whom I am confident were present, there were present Captain White, John Brown, E. L. Chittenden, and myself.

Again the question was asked:

Were you there as a witness, or in any other capacity?
I was there—

He answers—

as a witness to testify in the case, or I was there as a friend of Captain White, to manage the proceedings for him; one or the other, or possibly both.

Then he was asked a question as to when his attention was first called to the question of the citizenship of Captain White. His answers is: On the Friday or Saturday before the election he was in his office, and while reading a newspaper he saw that the question of the naturalization of White was raised, and, upon reading it, he immediately exclaimed that could not be true, that he was certainly present when Mr. White was naturalized.

But it is said that Jenkinson must be confused about this, for he has testified that Chittenden was present; and my friend upon the other side made a very extraordinary statement, namely, that if Chittenden was present with him only at one time, and that was in 1858, that it must have been in 1858 that he was there with Chittenden! I suppose that is true. [Laughter.] He is welcome to that admission; but Chittenden was present in 1865. The testimony of this witness fixes conclusively the fact beyond all possibility of doubt that it was not in 1858, but must have been in 1865, or after 1861, because this question is propounded him after he had answered in the cross-examination that there was an incident that satisfied him it could not have been at the time of the declaration of intention. He is asked:

On your cross-examination in your answer to question 41 you speak of some incident in these words: "There is one incident connected with the occasion which satisfies me that the purpose was not a mere declaration of intention." Please state what that incident was.

I ask gentlemen now to listen to the answer in these words:

It was a remark as to the strangeness of a Union soldier having to renounce his allegiance to Queen Victoria and to swear allegiance to the United States.

Could that be in 1858? If that remark was then made, if that incident then occurred as testified by Jenkinson, it could not have taken place in 1858, for Mr. White was not then a Union soldier and there had been no military struggle between the sections of the country at that time.

Again, we have the testimony of William T. Pratt. He is certainly entitled to credit, for he seems to have been honored by our Democratic friends in Indiana, for he held successively the offices of justice of the peace, member of the city council, sheriff of Allen County, including the populous city of Fort Wayne, United States marshal, and finally director of the Indiana penitentiary. He says that he was sheriff from 1862 to 1866, and that while acting as sheriff at a time when there was no trial going on in the court, no cases proceeding requiring the attendance of witnesses, Mr. Brown, Mr. White, and Mr. Jenkinson, if I remember, appeared before the court and were sworn, and he believes that the contestee, Captain White was then duly naturalized.

Now, in the face of this testimony, standing unimpeached and uncontradicted, I inquire if there can be any doubt that Captain White did appear in 1865 in the proper court in Allen County and then and there produce the required witnesses, make the required proof, and take the required oath, receiving his certificate of naturalization, and go forth from that court invested with American citizenship?

But it is objected that this testimony is weakened, first because it is alleged that Mr. White, when challenged in regard to this fact of his naturalization, made mistaken statements as to date, claiming that it took place in 1856 or 1857; that he voted for Frémont. Now, the witnesses differ in their recollection as to what was actually said, and we will do well to follow the rule laid down by an eminent judge, that when a witness gives a conversation which he alleges occurred with another party at a time prior, his testimony must be received with the greatest caution, because the addition or omission of a word or even a syllable might make the greatest difference in the meaning.

But let us see by what circumstances Captain White was environed when he made this alleged statement and make the allowance the circumstances require. Now these Allen County records, of which we hear so much, were, as is proven and conceded, but a wretched burlesque on the name record; they were full of faults of omission and faults of commission. In numerous cases there was no mark of pen or pencil on these so-called records of decisions and judgments which had been in fact rendered, and that in numerous instances the clerk or somebody had gone into the court-house and put into the records what purported to be decisions in cases which never had been there, never had been tried or even pending in the court, in regard to which there was no mark on any docket that they ever had been there—in other words, mere forgeries. Especially were these records defective in cases of naturalization.

The contestant knew all about this. He had been keeping track of it. It is in evidence that on another occasion when Hon. John D. Sardinghausen, a prominent Democrat and editor of a Democratic newspaper at Fort Wayne, had been elected to the State senate, having been naturalized prior to that time before the contestant himself, as he was then judge of the court, a difference arising between them as to the propriety of the contestant being elected to Congress, the contestant went to Sardinghausen and hissed in his ear, "You had better be still, for I can put you out of the senate quicker than you got in." "How so?" said Sardinghausen. "Are you an American citizen?" inquires Mr. Lowry. Sardinghausen replies, "You know you administered the oath to me yourself, and I have my certificate of naturalization at home." "That may be so, but it is not on the record, and the record has got to show it," replies Lowry.

This wretched record of Allen County seems to have been the armory of this contestant. When pressed to the wall or in dire necessity, he rushes into the court-house, seizes the so-called record, and brandishes it as his sword of offense and defense.

The contestant knew just what the condition of the records was. He ascertained at an early date that there was no record of Mr. White's naturalization, and knew quite well that there were many instances just like Mr. White's where parties were naturalized and were unable to find any record of the fact. It is in testimony and undisputed that there were 150 cases of naturalization in that court of which there was no record of naturalization.

We have here the testimony of the present clerk of that court that among other cases there were numerous instances where naturalized citizens who had gone West and were desirous to prove citizenship in order to avail themselves of the privilege of the homestead and preemption acts wrote back, and some came back, to get the record of naturalization, and not a mark of any kind could be found to show that they had been naturalized.

The contestant, knowing the state of these records and suspecting that there might be an omission in the case of Mr. White, went to them and found there was no record; but he waited artfully until the Thursday night before election, when Captain White, who had been out through the district marshaling his forces for the grand battle on the coming Tuesday, preparing to advance upon the demoralized cohorts of the enemy, receives a telegram calling him home, where a couple of sleek emissaries of the contestant sought an interview with him.

Now, sir, on that night Mr. White's whole heart and soul were absorbed absolutely and completely in the great approaching battle at the polls, and when they pressed upon him the question, "Are you naturalized?" he was bewildered and astounded, but he answered promptly, "I have been naturalized." They asked him where. He replied in Allen County. They artfully asked him if it was not in Kosciusko County, stating that it appeared there was a James B. White who had been naturalized there. Whether this was suggested for the purpose of getting the contestee into a trap I know not. But I do know that like an honest man he repudiated the invitation to make that claim and said, "I know nothing of that omission; I was naturalized here." He was asked if he could find his naturalization papers. He said he did not know, but that he would look for them. Of course this was to frighten him, to distract and divert the attention of his friends from the election and permit his defeat; and what if, with all these things resting upon him to divert his attention and the attention of his friends from preparing for the election and to set them about hunting up records and preparing affidavits of loss of papers, etc.—I say what if, with all this conspiracy and confusion pressed upon him, he did, in his bewilderment, make mistaken statements as to the date of his naturalization? I submit that no fair-minded man can draw from that any inference against his honesty or against the truth of his statement as to the fact of his naturalization.

But it is said that he did not go into an explanation afterwards; that he simply said, "I am a citizen; elect me and I will show you that I am." Well, what better thing could he say under the circumstances? It was on the very eve of the election, and I appeal to each one of the three hundred experienced campaigners in this House to say whether he would have done otherwise than Captain White did under the circumstances. It was no time then to tell his friends that he had been naturalized but could not find his papers, or that the record was lost. If he had done that he would have been at once met by his opponent going around denying the fact of his naturalization, and saying, as he did to Sardinghausen, "The record does not show it; you must prove it by the record;" and the result would have been to disorganize and dishearten his forces, and he would have been defeated at the polls and his case ruined.

But it is insisted here that the records do not show Captain White's naturalization, and that it must be proven by the record. I have already called attention to the character of those records. To hold, as seems to be implied in this West Virginia case, that the record is conclusive, or rather the absence of record conclusive—now, sir, whatever might be the justice of applying that rule to a court in which perfect and complete records were kept, a court whose records were unchallenged as to correctness and completeness, would it not be a monstrous outrage to apply such a rule against any man, divesting him of valuable rights or property, simply because of the absence of records in such as are kept in Allen County, records that are but a pretense and a fraud; records that are but a delusion and a snare; records that are simply a pitfall to the unwary suitors?

But it is said further that Captain White did take out his second or his third papers on the eve of the election, and from that the inference is drawn that he had not been naturalized before. I know he did that. It was certainly an unnecessary thing and it may have been a foolish one, but I ask this House to remember the circumstances under which it was done. He was all the time saying and repeating that he had taken out his second papers, and that he had them and hoped to find them. He said that over and over again. In explanation of his conduct I can not do better at this point than to cite the testimony of Henry Colerick as to how these last papers came to be taken out—Henry Colerick, an honored name among the Democracy of Indiana, familiar as a household word, a man honored in his ancestry and family, and who wears worthily these honors, himself one of the most brilliant, influential, potential Democrats in Northern Indiana, although in the last election he was in favor of his neighbor, Captain White.

What does he say on this subject? He says:

I was present at a conversation, a general consultation that took place between Captain White and a number of his friends, among whom were six lawyers, two of whom had been on the supreme court commission.

A multitude of counsel! verifying the saying of Sir Walter Raleigh, who when the text, "In a multitude of counselors there is safety," was quoted in his presence, said it meant safety for the counselors, because it enabled them to divide the responsibility, but ruin for the poor client. [Laughter.] Mr. Colerick proceeds:

In this conversation Captain White stated and reiterated many times that he had taken out his second papers as well as his first. It was suggested by some of the older counsel, and indorsed by all the younger counsel, that it would probably be the easiest way of settling the question by again making application for final papers, on the ground that the doctrine of relation might apply, and that if he did apply, it would be unnecessary to show the neglect of the clerk in making the entry of his second application and the issuing of his papers. Captain White stated that he would make further search for his second paper; that he knew he had taken it out in Allen County. I then advised Captain White to take out his second paper the second time, under the belief that it would relate back to either the time that he had appeared in open court or it might apply in reference to the McKeever letter. No Allen County courts were then in session, and I advised Captain White to go to Columbia City or Huntington and again apply for his second papers. He said he would take my advice.

Here was a man advising with his friends, six lawyers, two of them ex-members of the supreme court of the State, who advised him to do this thing, and I say that if he had disregarded their advice and refused to follow it he would have been showing unreasonable obstinacy.

Again, Mr. Oppenheim, a prominent Democrat, says (page 217) that he went down on the Friday night before that election and found Captain White there with great piles of papers before him, which he was sorting out. Mr. Oppenheim asked him what he was doing, and he replied that he was trying to find his second papers; that he had taken them out but could not find them; that he could not find his first papers, could not find his marriage certificate, could not find his commission in the Army, and other papers. Then, Mr. Oppenheim says, Captain White told him that he had been advised by his lawyers to go and take out his second papers again, and then, says Mr. Oppenheim, "I stated to him that I thought it could do no possible harm to again take out his second naturalization papers." White did so, calling them his third papers. I submit, therefore, that no fair-minded man can draw any inference to the injury of Captain White from the action which he then took under the circumstances of the case.

But it is claimed that, no matter what may be the facts, Captain White must prove his naturalization by the record, and that as no record can be found, he can not be permitted to prove the fact at all. Certainly this House would be loth to adopt such a rule.

Mr. LONG. Does not the gentleman desire before he sits down to touch upon the statements made by Captain White at public meetings?

Mr. COOPER. I fear that I have not time to go into that. It will be sufficiently discussed by other gentlemen. It is enough for me to say that in that respect he did just as any other gentleman here would do; he went out among the people, he went to public meetings, and everywhere, and wherever he went he said substantially, "I have been naturalized, fully naturalized; you elect me and I will show it." That is all he said about it; that is all there is of that matter. He did not go into details; for what prudent man would? It was too late for explanations, too late to meet charges which might be made upon them. But I insist that you may take this record from beginning to end and you will find that all the statements proved by anybody at any time to have been made anywhere by Captain White are perfectly consistent with the truth of his statement here. There is not any doubt about it.

Now, as a legal proposition (and I can only give a hurried glance at the law of this case) I insist that if Captain White appeared in the court of Allen County and did there produce the required testimony, having prior to that time made the declaration of his intention, did produce the required number of witnesses and the required proof, did have administered to him the required oath, take that oath, and did procure his certificate of naturalization and citizenship, he was a citizen; and when his citizenship was challenged it would be sufficient proof for him to produce in answer that certificate, the ordinary and proper method of proving naturalization. That being true, if the certificate be now lost and no record of it can be discovered, it is competent for him to show, as he has done, its loss and the contents of the certificate. That the contents of a lost or destroyed record may be proved by parol is a proposition which I presume will not be gainsaid. It is supported by a long and unbroken line of authorities emanating from the most respectable courts, and I know of no contrary authority.

Why should not this principle and rule apply to adjudications of naturalization? I see no reason. Therefore, if the certificate, which in the first instance would be the proper proof, be lost, and no other record be discovered, the contestee has the right to prove the loss of the certificate, as he has done, and to prove its contents. On this question I will cite a passage from Morse on Citizenship, which is quoted in the minority report, and which I think directly in point. This author, on page 128, section 92, says:

In the case of an individual claiming to be a citizen by naturalization, the certificate or letter of naturalization is the usual and orderly proof which is offered, but it is not exclusive.

He does not say it is not conclusive; he says it is not exclusive. Then he adds:

If the letter or certificate is lost, and the record can not be discovered, secondary evidence to establish citizenship would be admissible.

It seems to me no doctrine could be more clearly in point than this; and therefore Captain White having proved the issue of the certificate and its loss, has a right to prove, as he has done, the contents of that certificate by parol.

But it is claimed by the majority of the committee that the record is essential to a judgment; that there can be no judgment without the record made by the clerk. I do not so understand the law. I understand that judgments are pronounced and rendered by the judges of the courts, and not by the clerks. It is not the duty of the clerk, nor is it within his power, to render a judgment; he is the mere historian of the acts of the judges or the court. It is simply his duty to put in shape and preserve evidence of the judgments that the court may have already pronounced. In other words, if Captain White made proper proof and received his certificate of naturalization, the judgment admitting him to citizenship was then complete, and the willful or careless omission of the clerk to record that judgment could not destroy that which was complete without his act. In support of this proposition I call attention to an extract from Freeman on Judgments, section 38:

Expressions occasionally find their way into reports and text-books, indicating that the entry is essential to the existence and force of the judgment.

There have been some expressions of that kind here to-day.

These expressions have escaped from their authors when writing of matters of evidence—

That is, when treating of the evidence required, when proposing to show in one court the judgment of another court—and applying the general rule that in each case the best testimony which is capable of being produced must be received, to the exclusion of every means of proof less satisfactory and less authentic.

Now, I call attention to this language:

The rendition of a judgment is a judicial act; its entry upon the record is merely ministerial. A judgment is not what is entered, but what is ordered and considered. The entry may express more or less than was directed by the court, or it may be neglected altogether; yet in neither of these cases is the judgment of the court any less its judgment than though it was accurately entered. In the very nature of things, the act must be perfect before its history can be so; and the imperfection or neglect of its history fails to modify or obliterate the act. That which the court performs judicially, or orders to be performed, is not to be avoided by the action or want of action of the judges or other officers of the court in their ministerial capacity. In the case of judgments, they must first be entered upon the record before they are admissible as evidence in other courts. For this purpose they are not otherwise perfect. The record, if not made up, or if lost or destroyed, should be perfected or replaced by appropriate proceedings in the court where the judgment was pronounced.

I will now call attention briefly to a decision in 6 Cranch, 179, the case of Campbell vs. Gurden. I do not know that I shall have time even to read all the syllabus of this case. It was there held that—

If the oath be administered and nothing appears to the contrary, it must be pronounced that the court before whom the oath was taken was satisfied as to the character of the applicant.

The oath, when taken, confers upon him the rights of a citizen, and amounts to a judgment of the court of his admission to those rights.

I wish to cite also a decision in 15 Blatchford—a case which I trust our friends on the other side will appreciate and follow, for there was a time when it was regarded as most savory "sauce" for the Democratic "goose;" and I hope they will neither fail to remember or apply the proverb as to sauce for the other party.

Gentlemen on the other side could well afford to indorse this decision, for it was at one time the sole barrier between thousands and thousands of their voters in the State of New York and the open doors of the penitentiary, into which John Davenport was attempting to thrust them, and would have thrust them but for this decision. Justice Blatchford says:

The act of 1802 provides that the alien may be admitted to become a citizen "on the following conditions, and not otherwise:" 1. He must have declared his intention. 2. He must take an oath to support the Constitution, and renouncing his former allegiance. The statute then says, "which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court."

* * * It is hardly to be supposed that Congress intended to make the applicant for citizenship responsible for a non-compliance with any other conditions than such as he had the power to comply with. The applicant can declare his intention, and can take the prescribed oath and make the renunciation. But he can not see to it that the proceedings and renunciation are recorded. He can produce a witness as to his residence and character, and can appear in person in the proper court with his witness as to matters prescribed in the statute. When this is done he can do nothing more except to receive such a complete certificate from the court—a certificate which sets forth that it is given "by the court," under its seal; that Coleman appeared in the court on a day named and applied to become a citizen and produced to it such evidence and made such declaration and renunciation, and took such oaths as are required by the acts of Congress on the subject; and that thereupon the court ordered that he be admitted, and he was accordingly admitted by the court to be a citizen of the United States. When he has done what the certificate says he has done, and when he leaves with the clerk of the court such papers as he has signed, and when the court tells him, as it does by the certificate, that he having done all that the court had thereon ordered, that he be admitted to be a citizen, and when the court gives the certificate into his keeping he has done all that he can to comply with the statute.

It can not be held that the word "conditions" applies to anything further. There must undoubtedly be an act of admission, but what shall be the evidence, directed by the court, of such act of admission, is another question. The provision for recording "proceedings" at the close of the second condition, and the provision for recording the renunciation mentioned in the fourth condition, are introduced in such form that they may very well be regarded as merely directory, and as no part of the "conditions." The conditions are well satisfied by limiting them to what the applicant is required to do in the first, second, and fourth paragraphs, and to what the court is required to do in the third paragraph. The admission to citizenship is to follow the observance of those conditions. The recording—

Is what? A part of the conditions essential to citizenship? Not so—

The recording is to follow admission, and not precede it. The admission separates the conditions from the recording.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I insist that when Mr. White made this proof, and received this certificate of final citizenship in Allen County, he went forth an American citizen; that he went forth invested and clothed with the high rights and great honor and privilege of an American citizen, a most valuable right, of which he could not be divested by the act of any other person than himself.

Sir, two thousand years ago there was a Republic which dominated the earth, whose conquering legions had placed its eagles in triumph on the ruins of every kingdom in the then known world. All roads led to its capital, and over every road were conveyed the tributes which the earth's conquered nations paid to it. Captive kings and queens walked barefoot in chains behind the triumphal cars of its warriors. But amid all its pomp and power and glory, the value of her citizenship was her especial boast and chief glory. When one of her humblest citizens was threatened with violence, or mortified by insult, whether he stood upon the banks of the Thames, the Rhine, the Danube, or the Euphrates, he had but to repeat the talismanic words, "I am a Roman citizen," and every hand was stayed and every insult obliterated by abundant apology, for all the earth knew that the great Republic would permit neither insult nor injury to its humblest citizen to pass unpunished; a most valuable citizenship. Well might the chief captain purchase it with a great sum and the great apostle boast of it as his birthright. But this citizenship pales besides the citizenship with which Captain White was invested on that February day in 1865, for he then became joint owner of all the traditions and glories of our country, and part of the fathomless and boundless hopes of its future. He became the joint owner of this mighty and progressive, glorious and peerless Republic, the foundations of which were laid in the red blood of the Revolution and cemented by that of Gettysburg. He became the peer of the proudest sovereign of the earth. He became in a word an American citizen. [Applause.]

And can it be that this valuable, honorable, and glorious right can be forfeited and lost by him because of the neglect of some hireling clerk? I believe every impulse of manhood, every feeling of justice and right which dominates the American heart, will answer, no. I believe that even the stern, cold, and rigid law answers no. And I hope that this House, which, as I have already said, is a law unto itself, which is clothed with plenary power, which is the supreme arbiter without the right of appeal, and which will in the ascertainment of the truth, the securing of justice and the right, and enforcing the will of the people, break every odious cord of precedent and spurn every interfering obstacle, will answer no. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman from

Ohio a question of fact. I understand that the certificate books, out of which these naturalization certificates were issued, show the names of the parties to whom they were issued, that they appear upon the stubs which remain, with the exception of this one case of Mr. White's.

Mr. COOPER. Oh, no, sir; there are plenty of cases where there is not the scratch of a pen to show to whom they were issued.

Mr. BLAND. Do the books show to whom any of these naturalization certificates were issued from that book? Is there any record showing that fact?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; in some cases it does appear to whom the certificates were issued, but in a great many of the cases there is not a scratch of a pen to show to whom they were issued. Nor is this peculiar in that regard, for in another contested-election case it appears that ten voters in Peoria County, in the State of Illinois, produced their certificates of naturalization, which on examination of the record showed there was not the scratch of a pen to show the fact of naturalization.

Mr. BLAND. My inquiry went to this, and that is all. I understood this was the only case where the book did not show to whom the certificate of naturalization was issued.

Mr. COOPER. Oh, by no means; there are a hundred and fifty of them at least.

Mr. BLAND. I mean, is this the only case where the record does not show the issuance of the certificate?

Mr. COOPER. No, not by any means. There are a number of such cases in this county.

Mr. LONG. Is not a list given in the testimony?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, sir; the record shows it. It will not be disputed by the other side that there are abundant cases where these proceedings in naturalization cases in that county between the years 1856 and 1867 and 1868 were not on record.

Mr. ROWELL. I reserve the remainder of the time not occupied by the gentleman from Ohio.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CRAIN. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to submit a report.

Mr. CRISP. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

CHANGE OF TIME FOR SESSIONS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. CRAIN, from the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, reported back the joint resolution (H. Res. 33) proposing an amendment to the Constitution substituting the 31st of December for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of members of the House of Representatives, and providing that Congress shall hold its annual meetings on the first Monday in January; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1000) to increase the pensions of certain soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the service of the United States.

MINORITY REPORT.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit the views of the minority on a bill heretofore reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report from the Committee on the Public Lands—views of the minority; to accompany House bill 1235.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The views of the minority will be printed and take the same course as the report of the committee.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6553) to declare the law in regard to the date of the commencement of widows' pensions; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FROM CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. BOUTELLE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

Mr. BELMONT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6554) providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety at sea; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

Mr. FORD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6555) for the organization of the Territory of Alaska, and to provide for the establishment of a civil government therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

MUSTER AND PAY OF CERTAIN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6556) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 3, 1884, and further amended February 3, 1887; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 191) to make additional appropriations for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the late John A. Logan; and

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BRUMM, until Wednesday, February 8, on account of sickness in his family.

And then, on motion of Mr. CRISP (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

By Mr. STONE, of Missouri: Of 91 citizens of the Twelfth district of Missouri.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a statement of expenditures on account of the contingent expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PROPERTY IN CHARGE OF DOORKEEPER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Doorkeeper of the House, transmitting an inventory of the furniture and other property in the rooms under his charge at the commencement of the first session of the Fiftieth Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

ROBBERY, ETC., IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1213) to punish robbery, burglary, and larceny in the Indian Territory, with amendments by the Senate.

Mr. ROGERS. The Senate have amended this bill in two immaterial particulars, and they have also stricken out what were known as the domestic-animal clauses of the bill. In its present form, with the amendments, I am authorized to say it is entirely acceptable to the members of the Judiciary Committee, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate be now agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to considering at this time the amendments of the Senate?

There was no objection.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 3, after the word "ass," insert "or;" on page 1, line 3, strike out "or other domestic animals;" on page 1, line 20, strike out "but said act" and insert "Provided, however, That all such acts or parts of acts."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 1000) to increase the pensions of certain soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON WOOL AND WOOLEN MANUFACTURES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following concurrent Senate resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 17,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, upon wool and the manufactures of wool, as follows: 10,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, 5,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the House with Senate amendments; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1886–'87 there be printed 6,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 12,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

IN THE SENATE, February 2, 1888.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolution pass with the following amendments: In line 5 strike out "6" and insert "4;" in line 6 strike out "12" and insert "8;" in line 8 strike out "25" and insert "20."

The resolution, with the amendments of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HEIRS OF FIDUS LIVERMORE.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3758) for the relief of the legal heirs of Fidus Livermore, deceased.

Mr. LANHAM. I demand the regular order.

Mr. FORD. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill called up by my colleague.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sarah Livermore, widow and administratrix of the late Fidus Livermore, of Jackson, Mich., the sum of $766.50, the said amount being due to said Fidus Livermore for services performed in his lifetime as commandant of camp of the Twentieth Regiment of Michigan Infantry ($210), and services as commandant of camp of the Twenty-sixth Michigan Infantry ($515), and for money expended ($41.50) for necessary expenses while discharging the duties of commandant of camp during the organization of said Twentieth and Twenty-sixth Michigan Regiments of Infantry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3758) for the relief of the legal heirs of Fidus Livermore, deceased, report as follows:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report No. 4151 of the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

"[House Report No. 4151, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

"This is a claim for payment of services rendered by Fidus Livermore as commandant of camps of the Twentieth and Twenty-sixth Regiments of Michigan Infantry, and amounts paid out for necessary supplies. The said Livermore served as commandant of camp of the Twentieth Michigan Infantry from July 1, 1862, to September 1, 1862, forty-two days. He rendered service as commandant of the camp of the Twenty-sixth Michigan Infantry from September 1, 1862, to December 13, 1862, one hundred and three days. He was appointed to the positions by the governor of Michigan, and the record of the appointments is to be found in the War Office at Washington and in the adjutant-general's office at Lansing, Mich. Said Livermore took the oath of office and discharged the duties as commandant of camp for the regiments above named. For the service rendered he would be entitled to pay at the rate of $5 per day. While acting in the capacity above, to which he was appointed, he expended the sum of $41.50 for necessary supplies.

"After the death of said Livermore a statement of his services and expenditures in organizing the two regiments was found among his papers, the said statement being in the handwriting of the deceased, which handwriting has been proven by the person who was the governor of the State at the time said Livermore was appointed and who selected him for the positions, and also the bill is further identified to be genuine by the present circuit judge in the county where said Livermore resided. Both witnesses knew deceased intimately for over twenty-five years in his lifetime. The fact that the deceased was never paid for his services nor reimbursed for his expenditures is attested by the reports from the Treasury Department, to which Department the legal heirs of deceased presented the bill for payment. That Department was estopped from paying the claim by the statute of limitations.

"As the proof is ample that the service was rendered, and conclusive that the Government of the United States and the State of Michigan have never compensated the said Livermore or his representative, your committee are of opinion that as an act of justice the heirs of said Fidus Livermore should be reimbursed for said services and expenditures, and accordingly respectfully recommend that the bill do pass."

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'DONNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6439) authorizing the appointment of eleven division superintendents of railway mail service; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES ALBERT BONSACK.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 593) for the relief of James Albert Bonsack. I ask that the amendment reported by the Committee on Patents be adopted, and that the bill as amended be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That letters patent No. 238540 and letters patent No. 247795, issued to James Albert Bonsack, of the State of Virginia, on the 8th day of March, 1881, and the 4th day of October, 1881, respectively, be, and the same are hereby, declared subsisting and continuing grants of all the rights, privileges, and franchises which were thereby conveyed to the said Bonsack, his heirs, assigns, and representatives, for the full and uninterrupted term of seventeen years from their respective dates of issue, and that the term of said grants shall not expire before the time for which said patents were issued, notwithstanding the issuing of certain letters patent for substantially the same subject-matter by the Canadian and other foreign governments to the aforesaid Bonsack prior to the issuing of his United States patents herein specifically referred to, which would be otherwise limited by operation of law to the shortest period of time for which any of his aforesaid foreign patents were granted but for and by virtue of this act.

SEC. 2. That the aforesaid United States patents herein specifically referred to by number and date shall remain in as full force and effect as if no foreign patents had been issued prior thereto, notwithstanding such foreign patents may have issued and been forfeited or may hereafter be forfeited.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Patents was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "that" in section 1 to the word "that" in section 2, as follows:

"The term of said grants shall not expire before the time for which said patents were issued, notwithstanding the issuing of certain letters patent for substantially the same subject-matter by the Canadian and other foreign governments to the aforesaid Bonsack prior to the issuing of his United States patents herein specifically referred to, which would be otherwise limited by operation of law to the shortest period of time for which any of his aforesaid foreign patents were granted but for and by virtue of this act.

"SEC. 2. That."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I understand this bill to provide for the extension of a patent, and therefore I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. O'FERRALL. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement, I am sure he will not object. The bill does not provide for the extension of a patent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have the report read.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If it is a bill for the extension of a patent, I shall object to unanimous consent.

Mr. O'FERRALL. But it is not. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state in a few words the whole object and effect of the bill. A few years ago, in the State of Virginia, a boy, seventeen years of age, invented a machine for which he sought the protection of a patent.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What was the machine for?

Mr. O'FERRALL. For making cigarettes. He applied for his patent in 1880. At the same time that he made application for a patent here he applied also for patents in several foreign countries. The office here was tardy in issuing the patent, and the consequence was that the patents in the foreign countries were issued before the issue of the American patent, so that they antedated it. By reason of the provisions of our patent laws this young man is compelled to keep alive every one of his patents in these foreign countries in order to keep his American patent in force.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Wherein he occupies precisely the same position as every other patentee. Every other American patentee is under the same disability, is he not?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Well, the restriction ought to be removed. It is a great hardship.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Will the gentleman allow me to go one step further?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not object to your making your statement.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I say that this provision of our law operates as a very great hardship upon this patentee, because in foreign countries where he has patents very heavy levies are made upon him in order to keep alive those patents, yet if a single solitary one of them lapses or becomes void by reason of any law existing there, his American patent will cease to exist. As I said before, this is not a bill for the extension of a patent. It only provides that the American patent shall run for the regular term notwithstanding any lapse of a foreign patent which may occur. I can see no injustice in it to anybody. It is simply an act of justice to this young man. I appeal to this House to consider the bill, and I appeal to my friend on my right [Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas] to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Wait a moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes; but I want first to say a word. This case, as I understand it, is nowise different from other cases which may occur and do occur under the law, and if there is to be a remedy it ought to come in the form of a general law. For the reason that I am opposed on principle to the extension of patents I would prefer that this case, if it is to come up at all, should come up in the ordinary way, so that the question can be fully discussed. I never heard of the case before and do not know anything about it. I would like to have an opportunity to look into it, and therefore I object to unanimous consent.

Mr. O'FERRALL. But you do not object to a vote being taken on it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes; I object.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. I am sure that if he understood the hardship and injustice done to this young man he would not insist on his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kansas insist on his objection?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am willing that the bill shall come before the House and be debated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to its present consideration?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. VANCE) was read, as follows:

This bill was fully considered by the Committee on Patents in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, and your committee adopts the report made by the committee in the Forty-ninth Congress, as follows:

"James A. Bonsack, of the State of Virginia, obtained two patents from the United States on his cigarette machine, numbered 238640 and 247795, and dated on the 8th day of March, 1881, and the 4th day of October, 1881, and very soon after applying for the said patents he applied for similar patents in Canada, England, Germany, France, Belgium, Austria and Hungary, Spain, Italy, and Russia.

"It appears that although he applied for his said American patents on the 4th day of September, 1880, and on the 21st day of June, 1881, yet the said patents were not issued until the 8th day of March, 1881, and the 4th day of October, 1881. On account of these great delays all of the said foreign patents, though subsequently applied for, were issued before his American patents. The American laws provide, in substance, that when any foreign patent antedates an American patent for the same invention the American patent shall expire with any such foreign patent, and under this provision the United States courts have uniformly decided that if any such foreign patents be forfeited the United States patent shall be null and void. Mr. Bonsack, the patentee, was therefore met with the fact that to maintain his home patents the maintenance of all his foreign patents was necessary.

"It appears, also, that the maintenance of the foreign patents is very difficult and burdensome. In Canada, for example, the patentee is required to construct machines within two years from the date of his patents—and the government has extended that time to him as long as the law allows—and he has been forced to begin to build his machines in Canada, although there is not a cigarette factory in Canada that makes five thousand cigarettes per day. Three times, as stated to your committee, Mr. Bonsack sent parties to Canada to make some arrangement for the use of his machines, but no arrangement could be made. Still, he is compelled to build machines in Canada to prevent the forfeit of his United States patents; and petitioner avers that he can not construct a single machine in Canada for less than $4,000.

"In every foreign country in which he has patents, except England, the same has to be done, except that in some of them a nominal building is sufficient.

"In addition to this, in every foreign country, except Russia, taxes have to be paid on the patents, which constitute a great outlay, and the failure to build machines or pay the taxes forfeits the patents irrevocably.

"In France, Austria and Hungary, Spain, and Italy the Governments alone manufacture tobacco in all its forms, and in some of these it is found, after two years of constant effort, impossible to place the machines of the patentee on any terms; and yet by reason of the delay by the United States to issue the said patents until after the foreign patents were issued, he is subjected to the greatest trouble and immense outlays in countries where he can not reap one cent of benefit, solely for the purpose of preventing his United States patents from becoming void. The committee is of opinion that the law was intended to affect foreigners who patented their inventions in their own countries and then in America, and not to subject our own citizens to such loss and hardships.

"The patentee states that he invented his cigarette machine (which makes 220 cigarettes per minute) when he was but seventeen years old, and that he and his friends who are associated with him have up to this time expended in the perfection, construction, and introduction of his machines, including the outlays in maintaining his foreign patents, the sum of $151,000.

"The bill for the relief of your petitioner was unanimously reported by the Committee on Patents of the Forty-eighth Congress, but was not reached by the House.

"Your committee respectfully recommend that House bill 2950, for the relief of James Albert Bonsack, be passed as a just measure of relief."

Your committee respectfully recommend that House bill 593, for the relief of James Albert Bonsack, be amended by striking out all after the word "that," in line 14, down to and including the words "Sec. 2. That" of said bill, so that said bill shall consist of but one section, and, as thus amended, that the bill be passed as a just measure of relief.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I withdrew my objection to the consideration of this bill because of the statement of my friend from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] that it did not propose to extend the patent. I wish he would state when these letters patent were taken out and when the patent will expire if this bill passes.

Mr. O'FERRALL. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Kansas, I will state that there is no extension of the patent provided for in this bill, and for the information of the House I will again state the facts in connection with this case.

Mr. WEAVER. Will you answer the question of the gentleman from Kansas and tell us when the patent will expire if this bill passes?

Mr. O'FERRALL. In 1880 this young man applied for a patent in the United States. For some reason or other, however, the matter was suspended in the Patent Office here until his patents in foreign countries were issued. He is now required to keep up all those foreign patents in order to keep alive his patent in this country. If his patent had been issued promptly by the Patent Office here there would have been no trouble in this respect, because his American patent would have antedated any foreign patent. The object of this bill is to give the patentee a term of only seventeen years from the original issue of his American patent, which I believe was in 1881.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is what I wanted to get at. Then this patent will run from that date?

Mr. O'FERRALL. It will run seventeen years from 1881.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, the whole ground on which this bill is placed, as I gather from the remarks of the gentleman, is to relieve this patentee from the expense of maintaining his patents in foreign countries.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The object is to relieve him from an injustice which was done him by the Patent Office in this country in holding back his application for a patent and not acting upon it promptly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. How long was it withheld?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I do not remember.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. More than the ordinary time?

Mr. WEAVER. I will answer the gentleman. The patent was first applied for in the United States——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. In what month?

Mr. WEAVER. I do not know. The patent was applied for first in the United States and afterward in foreign countries.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. How long afterward?

Mr. WEAVER. Several months; but owing to the tardiness of the Patent Office here the patents were granted in foreign countries first. This was no fault of the patentee; but in consequence he is compelled to maintain those patents in foreign countries or allow his patent in this country to lapse.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the patent worth a year?

Mr. WEAVER. I do not know how much it is worth. He has expended $150,000 upon it—he and his friends.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. In foreign countries?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Altogether.

Mr. WEAVER. This bill does not propose to extend the patent, but simply to give the patentee the benefit of the full term for which the patent was granted.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will ask my friend from Iowa whether he thinks a gentleman who engages in or promotes the manufacture of cigarettes ought to receive any favor from this House.

Mr. WEAVER. I am not called upon to pass on that question. I do not smoke cigarettes, cigars, or anything of the kind; but at the same time I do not feel authorized to enter the arena as the antagonist of every man who manufactures or uses such articles.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If this invention were a machine for making cigars I might feel some sympathy for the man; but when it comes to making cigarettes, that is fearful. I will content myself, however, with voting against the bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'FERRALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORPORATIONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6557) changing the names of certain corporations in the District of Columbia, incorporating the Washington Safe Deposit and Trust Company, the American Trust Company, the Atlantic Trust Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

GROVENOR A. CURTICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of House bill No. 439, and consider it now.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Grovenor A. Curtice.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Grovenor A. Curtice, late a captain in the Seventh Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of a captain of infantry from the 3d day of January, 1865, the date at which he was assigned to duty under his commission as such, to the 1st day of May, 1865, the date of his muster as a captain, deducting therefrom the pay received by him as a first sergeant during said period.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the record of the said Grovenor A. Curtice, and to muster him as a captain of infantry, to date January 3, 1865, the date at which he entered upon duty under the commission issued him by the governor of New Hampshire as of that rank, and dated December 22, 1864.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 439) for the relief of Grovenor A. Curtice, respectfully report as follows:

This is a claim for pay for services rendered as captain prior to muster as such, though holding a commission to that grade, by Grovenor A. Curtice, late captain of Company D, Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers.

The case was considered in the War Department under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1884, and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 3, 1887, and was rejected, though the Adjutant-General stated in a letter to the claimant (filed in the case) that "the equities in the case are all in your favor."

While the decision of the War Department may be technically in accordance with the law, the fact that Curtice commanded Company D, Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers, from January 3, 1865, to May 1, 1865, is evident, and that his services as such were not only accepted but required by the Government.

Having obtained the benefit of Curtice's services, the Government ought not to set up a technical plea in bar of its obligation to make compensation therefor; and your committee are of opinion that payment should be made Captain Curtice, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] what is the effect of antedating this man's commission as a captain, which is proposed to be done by the second section of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. It will simply give him pay from the time he was commissioned by the governor of New Hampshire until the time he was mustered in.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the only effect?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

Mr. SPRINGER. What amount is involved?

Mr. GALLINGER. Three or four hundred dollars; perhaps less. I will state, for the information of the gentleman and the House, that the technical difficulty in this case arose from the fact that the lieutenant of the company, on account of sickness, was present only one-half day in the month, and therefore was not in attendance to sign certain rolls.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY EVERINGHAM BROWN.

Mr. FORD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 880) granting a pension to Mary Everingham Brown, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Everingham Brown, a volunteer nurse during the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $30 a month.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "thirty," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF TIME FOR SESSIONS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. CRAIN. Yesterday, from the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, I reported back a joint resolution (H. Res. 33) proposing an amendment to the Constitution substituting the 31st of December for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of members of the House of Representatives, and providing that Congress shall hold its annual meetings on the first Monday in January, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and that it be referred to the House Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORROW. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. LANHAM. I insist on my demand for the regular order of business, and shall protest against any more bills being called up and passed by unanimous consent. I do not object to some gentlemen who desire to submit reports.

Mr. MORROW. I think we should have one unanimous consent on this side.

EMOLUMENT RETURNS OF CIVIL OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROGERS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. 4921) regulating the emolument returns of civil officers of the United States; which was laid on the table.

Mr. ROGERS also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. 6558) regulating the emolument returns of civil officers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1675) to provide for the relief of claimants whose claims were rejected by the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims on the ground that either the petition or the proofs had been received too late; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AID TO COMMON-SCHOOL SYSTEM.

Mr. COLLINS also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 63) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to grant aid to the common-school systems of the several States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SPEEDY TRIAL OF CUSTOMS-REVENUE CASES.

Mr. COLLINS also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1531) to create a court of customs and provide for the speedy trial of customs-revenue cases; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. COLLINS also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3263) to amend section 5365 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask, by unanimous consent, to submit a resolution.

Mr. LANHAM. I object.

CALL OF COMMITTEES FOR REPORTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committees will now be called for reports of a private nature.

ANDREW J. LINDSAY.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 455) for the relief of Andrew J. Lindsay; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY BAILEY.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2617) granting a pension to Mary Bailey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM L. VANCE & CO.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a resolution in reference to the claim of William L. Vance & Co.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR STORES AND SUPPLIES TAKEN BY THE ARMY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES G. FIELDS, ADMINISTRATOR OF EDMUND BICKER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 6559) for the relief of James G. Fields, administrator of Edmund Bicker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TRUSTEES CATHOLIC CHURCH, DALTON, GA.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 6560) for the relief of the trustees of the Catholic Church at Dalton, Ga.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER SWIFT & CO.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3956) for the relief of Alexander Swift & Co., partners, and Alexander Swift & Co. and the Niles Works; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. M'CLURG.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2611) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT S. M'DONALD.

Mr. CROUSE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, recommending reference to the Court of Claims, the bill (H. R. 827) for the relief of Robert S. McDonald; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK FORD.

Mr. CROUSE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 6561) for the relief of Frederick Ford; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RICHARD H. PARHAM, ADMINISTRATOR.

Mr. CROUSE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, recommending reference to the Court of Claims, the bill (H. R. 830) for the relief of Richard H. Parham, administrator of George Gorman, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SURVIVORS OF WRECK OF STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 438) for the relief of the survivors of the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. FRANCES MARSHALL.

Mr. PENINGTON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 326) for the relief of Mrs. Frances Marshall; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REANEY, SON & ARCHBOLD.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5285) for the relief of Reaney, Son & Archbold; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, when the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to-day for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, we proceed to the consideration of such bills upon that Calendar as have been introduced and reported upon at this session of Congress.

There is a proposition pending before the Committee on Rules involving the reference of those bills brought over from the Forty-ninth Congress on cases reported from the Court of Claims. If we can have unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of new business to-day, it may be done without any prejudice whatever to the position of those reports from the Court of Claims upon the Calendar one way or the other.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will consent to the request of the gentleman from Texas, if it shall be distinctly understood that the bills now on the Calendar reported from the Court of Claims, shall not lose their places on the Calendar, and that this consent shall not extend beyond this day. I am able to show a precedent for these reports of the Court of Claims occupying the position they do on the Calendar, and in justice to the people to whom the money to be appropriated by these bills is due, I am opposed to any action that will result in such delay as will prevent their final passage.

Mr. LANHAM. It is understood that the order applies only to this day, and it will not prejudice the other bills in any way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. CRISP. I want to announce to the House, with the consent of the gentleman from Texas, that we shall ask that the contested-election case of Lowry vs. White be proceeded with to-morrow, and shall not to-day seek to interfere with the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can call up the contested-election case at any time.

The motion of Mr. LANHAM was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the order just made. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar reported to this session of Congress.

ABRAM C. MYERS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. 6) for the removal of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon Abram C. Myers.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all the political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States upon Abram C. Myers, be and the same are hereby removed.

Mr. CULBERSON. This is a Senate resolution passed by that body on a petition presented in proper form. I move that it be laid aside for favorable consideration.

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM W. MACKALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3) to remove the political disabilities of William W. Mackall, of Virginia.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all the political disabilities imposed upon William W. Mackall, of Virginia, by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by reason of his participation in the rebellion, are hereby removed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state that this bill is based upon a petition presented in due form, and I move that it be laid aside for favorable action.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT JOHNSTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4811) for the relief of Robert Johnston, of the State of New York.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That Robert Johnston, of the State of New York, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. That bill is also based upon a petition duly presented, and I move that it be laid aside for favorable action.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

L. A. MORRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 76) for the relief of L. A. Morris, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remit a judgment obtained in the Federal court at Fort Smith, Ark., against L. A. Morris, upon his bond as an Indian trader, for the sum of $5,000, in favor of the United States, upon the payment of all the costs accrued in the prosecution of the cause.

Mr. ROGERS. I assume the report will present this case fairly to the House, and ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. ROGERS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 76) for the relief of L. A. Morris, have considered the same, and make the following report:

On the 25th day of September, 1875, suit was instituted in the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, at Fort Smith, in behalf of the United States, against T. T. Maxwell and L. A. Morris, under the name and style of Maxwell & Morris, partners in trade, John A. Fitch, and John Dorchester, to recover the penalty of a bond executed by the said Maxwell & Morris, as traders in the Choctaw Nation. The breach alleged in the complaint consisted in a violation of that provision of the bond which obligated the said Maxwell & Morris to obtain a license from the local authorities of the Choctaw Nation before offering or exposing their goods for sale.

On the 11th day of November, 1878, the suit was dismissed as to all the defendants except L. A. Morris, and judgment was recovered against him for the sum of $5,000, the penalty of the bond.

The facts in the case appear to be as follows: In 1875 Maxwell & Morris, having been appointed Indian traders, executed the bond declared upon, and the same was presented to and approved by E. P. Smith, Indian Commissioner. Upon the execution and approval of the bond, license was duly issued to said Maxwell & Morris to trade in the Choctaw Nation.

L. A. Morris applied to George W. Ingalls, agent for the five civilized tribes of Indians, to ascertain if it was necessary to obtain a permit to trade from the local authorities of the Choctaw Nation, and was informed by him that it was not necessary. He was advised by Ingalls, the Indian agent, to get up a petition signed by a number of leading or prominent men, asking for the privilege of trading with the Indians. The petition was prepared and the signatures of several persons obtained, but was never presented, as under the advice of the Indian agent a permit was not believed to be necessary. One condition of the bond recites that "the principal shall faithfully conform to and observe all the laws and regulations made, or which shall be made, for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes." By reference to the treaty existing between the United States and the Choctaw Nation it will be seen that, in addition to the license granted by the Government, permission must be obtained from the local authorities of the nation before it shall be lawful to sell or expose for sale goods in the Territory.

It was also in proof before the court that shortly after Maxwell & Morris commenced selling the goods their store was closed by order of the authorities of the nation, and considerable damage resulted to the stock of goods on account of the seizure.

Upon this statement of facts the court gave judgment against L. A. Morris for the sum of $5,000, the penalty of the bond.

In view of the facts in the case, the committee believe that Morris did not intend to violate the law, and if such violation was established before the court it was merely technical.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I only make this observation: that this bill has met with a favorable report from the committees of both Houses whenever presented, and has once or twice, I believe, passed the Senate. Unless there is some question asked which would require further explanation, I move that the bill be laid aside and reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN M. SIMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 48) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip numbered 7269, for 80 acres, founded on Virginia military warrant, the property of Benjamin M. Simpson, is alleged to have been lost or mislaid by an officer of the General Land Office while said scrip was in the custody of the General Land Office: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, on satisfactory proof of ownership and the loss of said scrip, and that said scrip was lost or mislaid by an officer of the General Land Office, or by an employé of said office, be hereby authorized and directed to reissue and deliver to Benjamin M. Simpson a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip for 80 acres of land.

Mr. WHEELER. The report in this case fully explains it. It is very brief. I ask that it may be read.

The report (by Mr. WHEELER) was read as follows;

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 48) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reissue and deliver to Benjamin M. Simpson a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip for 80 acres of land, have had the same under consideration, and report that said bill ought to pass.

The committee find it is alleged that Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER deposited a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip, the property of Benjamin F. Simpson, for 80 acres of land, in the Land Office of the Department of the Interior, and that said scrip was lost or mislaid while in possession of the officers of said Land Office.

The following letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office shows that Congressional action is necessary to authorize the Department to reissue the said scrip to Benjamin F. Simpson, the owner thereof:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., August 22, 1885.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of an affidavit by B. M. Simpson, and a letter from this office to your address, dated the 5th of June last, in the matter of Revolutionary bounty-land scrip founded on Virginia military warrant 6542, which scrip was some months since lost or mislaid in this office. The affidavit referred to specifies the lost scrip as No. 7269, and is filed for the purpose of procuring a reissue or certified copy thereof.

"Having been identified in this manner by number, a careful search reveals the fact that said scrip when issued, July 29, 1836, was not recorded.

"At that time the practice of the office was to record the first or lowest numbered piece issued on any given warrant, and the following pages of the record-book were only given the succeeding numbers, with the money value of each, to the full satisfaction of the warrant or the full issue of scrip at the time. I know of no law authorizing a reissue of this class of Government obligations.

"Greatly regretting the accident which has caused this trouble, I am compelled to suggest Congressional action as the only relief to be found.

"Very respectfully,

"WM. A. J. SPARKS,
"Commissioner.

"Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER,
"Wheeler, Ala."

Your committee therefore report back the bill (H. R. 48) and recommend its passage.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, this bill passed the House and Senate last session, but owing to an amendment being made concurrence was not obtained in the House until it was too late for final action.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLOTTE CAROLINE HACKLEMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 120) for the relief of Charlotte Caroline Hackleman, reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Charlotte Caroline Hackleman, the invalid daughter of Pleasant A. Hackleman, late a brigadier-general of United States Volunteers, and who was killed in battle at Corinth, Miss., in October, 1862, and pay said daughter a pension of $18 per month for and during her natural life.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. LANHAM. Are not these bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to be considered on Friday nights?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there has been no order made by the House for a Friday-night session.

Mr. LANHAM. And they are here for consideration at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. They are.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 120) for the relief of Charlotte Caroline Hackleman, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

The beneficiary is the daughter of Brig. Gen. Pleasant A. Hackleman, who was killed at the battle of Corinth, Miss., in October, 1862. His widow was pensioned until about six months since, when she died. There is now no pension being paid on account of the death of General Hackleman. His daughter, Charlotte Caroline, is now, and has been nearly all her life, a helpless invalid, owing to spinal disease. This fact is established by the testimony of reputable persons who have long known the family. She is also shown to be without property or other means of support, and is a charge upon her friends.

There are several precedents for this kind of legislation in cases where no pension is being paid on account of the death of the soldier, and this committee therefore reports the bill favorably, and asks that the House pass it.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY C. KNIGHT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 440) granting a pension to Mary C. Knight, reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary C. Knight, dependent daughter of Luther M. Knight, medical doctor, of Franklin, N. H., late surgeon of the Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, and chief medical officer of the First Division Artillery Corps, at the rate of $30 per month.

The committee recommended the following amendments:

Strike out the words "thirty dollars" and insert instead thereof "eighteen dollars;" and also add after the word "month," in the last line, the words "payable to her legally constituted guardian."

Mr. GALLINGER. It occurs to me that a very brief statement will obviate the necessity of reading the report in this case. This is the daughter of a distinguished medical officer, now dead, who was receiving a pension of $30 a month. The daughter is destitute, blind, and incurably insane, and is now incarcerated in an asylum apparently without any possibility of an improvement in her health. The bill calls for a pension of $30 a month. The committee recommend $18, and with this amendment I think the House will be disposed to pass the bill. After the amendments of the committee are disposed of I desire to offer two verbal amendments.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend by striking out the words "medical doctor," and also by substituting the word "Army" for the word "Artillery."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 440) granting a pension to Mary C. Knight, having considered the same, report as follows:

Mary C. Knight is the daughter of Dr. Luther M. Knight, deceased, late surgeon of the Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers. Dr. Knight was distinguished in his profession, at one time serving in the Army as chief medical officer of a division. He was pensioned at the rate of $30 per month, and died from diseases contracted in the service. Very little property was left by Dr. Knight, and his daughter, whom he supported, asks for special legislation continuing to her the rate of pension her father received at the time of his death, namely, $30 per month. Mary C. Knight, as appears from the appended affidavits and statements, is both blind and insane, and hence utterly incapable of doing anything for her own support. The income from the small property left by her father is only partially sufficient to maintain her, and consequently she is, to a considerable extent, cared for by the charity of others. In view of the eminent services rendered the Government by her father, and the sad physical and mental condition of the daughter, it seems but just that she should receive from the Government some degree of relief.

Your committee, however, are of opinion that the bill should be amended as follows: Strike out the words "thirty dollars," and insert instead thereof the words "eighteen dollars;" and also add, after the word "month," in the last line, the words "payable to her legally constituted guardian." With these amendments we recommend its passage.

We, the undersigned, executors of the estate of the late Luther M. Knight, M. D., of Franklin, N. H., hereby certify that Mary C. Knight, daughter of the above-mentioned Luther M. Knight, was totally dependent upon her father for support. From infancy she has been entirely blind, and for the past fifteen years partially insane, and at different times an inmate of the New Hampshire Asylum for the Insane, at Concord, N. H. She is now at a private retreat at South Boston, Mass., and is totally dependent for support upon the income of her late father's real estate at Franklin, N. H., and which is inadequate for her maintenance. The rental of the above-mentioned real estate is her only source of income, as the property can not be disposed of in her interest except at a sacrifice.

We, the executors of the above-mentioned estate, therefore most respectfully petition Congress that the pension of the late Luther M. Knight, M. D., of the Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers and chief medical officer of the First Division, Second Army Corps (certificate No. 111488), be continued to his blind and insane daughter, Mary C. Knight.

NEW HAMPSHIRE ASYLUM, Concord, N. H., November 18, 1887.

Mary Knight was admitted to this asylum the 18th of December, 1874; she was discharged the 6th of August, 1875; readmitted the 29th of November, 1884, and discharged the 19th of May, 1886; again readmitted the 2d of February, 1887, and discharged October 15, 1887.

Miss Knight's condition when admitted to the asylum the last two times was one of subacute mania; she was quite confused and incoherent, and at times was much excited. Her physical health was at first very poor, but under treatment it gradually improved. Her mental condition did not show any corresponding improvement beyond a certain point. For the last year she has been quieter and a little more coherent, but she has always manifested a great degree of excitability, often losing self-control. The prospect at present is that she will always remain in a more or less scattered state of mind, and this fact, taken in connection with her total blindness, will render her utterly incapable of taking care of herself.

C. P. BANCROFT, M. D.,
Superintendent.

To whom it may concern:

I hereby certify that I was well acquainted with Luther M. Knight, M. D., late surgeon Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, for about thirteen years prior to his death; that during that time I lived within 1 mile of his residence, and saw him often, and very much of the time daily; that I knew of his suffering from chronic hepatitis and a large portion of the time diarrhea, and that I frequently advised with him on account of his diseased condition; that I was called to visit him quite often during the last year or two of his life, the dates of which for the most part I can not give; that I was called to visit him December 14, 1886, on account of chronic hepatitis; that I found him suffering intensely from pain in the epigastrium, accompanied with great soreness over the region of the liver; that he was very much jaundiced and was much debilitated; that I visited him two or three times a day for a week or ten days; that I was called to see him January 27, 1887, and found him suffering in the same way; that he continued to fail in strength and continued to suffer from great pain until his death, which took place February 3, 1887; that in my opinion the disease from which he suffered and from which he died had its origin from malarial poison and the exposure incident to camp-life while in the service; and I also state that a daughter survives him, who has for many years been totally blind, and is now insane, and is an inmate of the New Hampshire Asylum for the Insane; and I also state that I have no interest, directly or indirectly, in this claim.

Dated at Franklin, N. H., this 16th day of February, 1887.

JOHN H. SANBORN,
Late Assistant Surgeon Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, Merrimac, ss:

Then personally appeared the above-named John H. Sanborn and made oath that the foregoing affidavit by him signed is true to the best of his knowledge and belief; that he is known to me to be a physician and surgeon of reputable standing; and I also certify that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the prosecution of this claim.

PORT OF BOSTON, MASS., NAVAL OFFICE, November 22, 1887.

To whom it may concern:

I was for more than thirty years personally acquainted with the late Luther M. Knight, M. D., of Franklin, N. H. He was a physician and surgeon of eminence, and served with distinction as surgeon of the Fifth New Hampshire Infantry and chief medical officer of the First Division of the Second Army Corps.

I am also familiar with the history of his daughter, Mary C. Knight, who from childhood has been totally blind, and for many years insane, and who is now in a private retreat at South Boston, Mass., entirely incapable of taking care of herself, and partially dependent upon the bounty of relatives for maintenance.

It seems to me that a special act may fittingly be passed, continuing the pension of the deceased father, for the support of this unfortunate child.

FRANKLIN, N. H., November 22, 1887.

I hereby certify that I was well acquainted with the late Luther M. Knight, M. D., of this town, and knew that he served with distinction in the war of the rebellion as surgeon of the Fifth Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers, and later as chief medical officer of the First Division, Second Army Corps.

I am also familiar with the history of his daughter, Mary C. Knight, who from childhood has been totally blind, and for many years insane and entirely incapable of taking care of herself. She is now in a private retreat at South Boston, Mass., and nearly dependent upon the bounty of relatives for maintenance.

A. W. SULLOWAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. P. L. WARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 611) for the relief of Mrs. P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to pay to P. L. Ward, executrix of William Ward, deceased, of Norfolk, Va., the sum of $2,075.13, in full satisfaction of all claim for beef and vegetables furnished by the said William Ward to the United States Navy, and in full satisfaction for hay sold to the quartermaster of the United States Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. GAINES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 611) for the relief of Mrs. P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, have given careful consideration to the same, and ask to report:

That this claim was presented to the Forty-ninth Congress, and a report was made in regard to it by the Committee on War Claims on the 17th day of July, 1886. As the examination by your committee has led them to the same results with those arrived at by the committee of the Forty-ninth Congress, they do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but refer to that report, and herewith annex a copy for information.

Your committee recommend that the bill referred to them do pass.

[House Report No. 3337, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The committee find the facts to be as stated in Senate Report No. 215, first session Forty-ninth Congress, which is hereto annexed and made a part of this report and is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 215, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1150) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, beg leave to offer the following report:

Bills for the same claim as the present one passed the Senate at the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, but each time failed of consideration in the House.

At the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress Senator HARRIS, for the Committee on Claims, made a report on this claim which embodied clearly and fully all the facts in the case.

The Committee on Claims of the Forty-seventh Congress, and again of the Forty-eighth Congress, adopted that report.

Your committee adopt the same report, annexing hereto a copy, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 428, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 879) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, have examined the same, and report thereon as follows:

The claim was presented to the Senate during the Forty-sixth Congress by the petition of said executrix, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and assigned to Mr. HARRIS, a member of the committee, for examination and report.

On the 11th day of February, 1880, the claim was favorably reported to the Senate by Mr. HARRIS. The following is a copy of the report:

The petition states that petitioner is the widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased. That in June, 1860, William Ward entered into a written contract with the United States for supplying fresh beef and vegetables to the Navy, at the Norfolk, Va., station, and that under said contract her late husband and testator, on or about the 21st of January, 1861, supplied the United States ship Plymouth with the articles named to the amount of $275.13, for which no payment was ever made, and she refers to the records of the Navy Department for the proof. The committee sent the petition to the Navy Department with a request for such information in respect to this claim as the records of that Department could furnish, and received from the Secretary the following reply:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 5, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the petition of Mrs. P. L. Ward, asking for payment of $275.13, on account of fresh beef and vegetables supplied by her late husband, William Ward, of Norfolk, Va., for the use of the United States Navy, which petition was referred to this Department by the honorable Secretary of War, in compliance with your request of the 15th ultimo.

The account of the late Mr. Ward is correct, as shown by the records of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing in this Department, with the exception that the fresh beef and vegetables referred to were delivered to the United States steamer Brooklyn, instead of the United States steamer Plymouth, as stated in the petition.

Very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. I. G. HARRIS,
United States Senate.

From which the committee is satisfied that the articles were furnished under contract as stated in the petition, and have never been paid for, and that the amount, $275.13, is justly due the claimant and should be paid.

The petitioner also states that in the month of August, 1863, her testator entered into a verbal contract with Capt. Edwin Ludlow, of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, in the presence of the Hon. L. H. Chandler, United States attorney for that district, and one other witness, for the purchase of 60 tons of hay at $30 per ton, which was delivered by her said testator to the said Ludlow and used by the Army of the United States. That shortly after the delivery said Ludlow left that locality without paying for the hay, though often having promised so to do.

On the 12th December, 1866, her late husband and testator addressed a letter to the Quartermaster-General asking payment for this hay so furnished, reciting the facts of the contract and delivery of the hay, and the fact that no voucher was given, because Captain Ludlow said it was not necessary to give a voucher, as he would pay for the hay as soon as he received funds, which he was daily expecting; but he left there without paying, and without giving any voucher for the 60 tons of hay, and that upon diligent inquiry he had never been able to ascertain the residence of Captain Ludlow since that time.

This letter is indorsed on the back as follows:

"I most unhesitatingly indorse the within statement.

"L. H. CHANDLER,
"United States District Attorney for Virginia.
"J. T. DANIELS."

On the 16th of January, 1867, this account was made out upon the regular printed form furnished by the Department, upon which the sale, delivery, and value of the hay, amounting to $1,800, and the loyalty of the claimant are proved by the affidavits of the then claimants, William Ward, L. H. Chandler, and J. R. Hunter; and the respectability and loyalty of the said Ward, Chandler, and Hunter are respectively certified to by John E. Doyle, justice of the peace; and the respectability and loyalty of William Ward is also certified to by William W. Wing, postmaster.

The oath of allegiance to the United States of William Ward is also exhibited, and Henry M. Bowden, clerk of the corporation court, certifies to the citizenship, respectability, and loyalty of William Ward, and to the official character of John E. Doyle as a justice of the peace for said county.

The letter above referred to, addressed by William Ward to the Quartermaster-General, and the proof above referred to, were sent to the committee by the War Department in answer to a letter from the committee asking for such information as the records of that Department could furnish as to the justice of this claim. The following is the letter from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 30, 1880.

SIR: Acknowleding the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, referring for information memorial of Mrs. P. L. Ward for pay for certain quartermaster stores and beef delivered by her deceased husband, William Ward, in 1860 and 1863 to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army and the naval station at Norfolk, Va., respectively, I have the honor in reply to inclose herewith a letter from Mr. Ward, dated December 12, 1867, submitting his claim to the Quartermaster-General, a paper which contains all the information on the subject the records of this Department afford.

No action was taken upon the claim by the Quartermaster-General for the reason that it originated in Virginia, a State declared to be in insurrection during the rebellion.

Your letter and the memorial have been referred, as desired, to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, for information from his Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEX. RAMSEY, Secretary of War.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

The Quartermaster-General takes no action upon this claim upon no other than the cold, technical ground that the claimant was a resident of a State declared to be in rebellion.

The proof is clear and conclusive that Quartermaster Ludlow contracted for this hay, equally clear as to the contract price amounting to $1,800, equally clear as to the loyalty to the United States of William Ward, who furnished the hay and who was the husband and is the testator of the petitioner, and equally clear that the hay has never been paid for.

It does not clearly appear when William Ward died. It is certain that it was subsequent to 1867 and before 1878, when this petition was presented by P. L. Ward, widow and executrix. She states that neither her late husband nor herself were ever informed nor did they know of the establishment of what is called the Southern Claims Commission, nor the necessity of presenting this claim to that tribunal, until after the expiration of the time within which it could have been presented; nor did petitioner know of the status of the claim until a few months before the presentation of this petition.

The committee are satisfied that the vegetables and beef, amountiug to $275.13, were delivered under contract to the United States Navy; and that 60 tons of hay were sold and delivered to Quartermaster Ludlow, at $30, amounting to $1,800, making an aggregate of $2,075.13; that the same were never paid for, and that the claimant was loyal to the United States, and that this sum is justly due to the claimant and should be paid; and therefore the committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend that it pass.

Your committee therefore adopt said Senate report as the report of this committee, and recommend that the Senate bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FOURTH IOWA INFANTRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1387) for the relief of the volunteers of the Fourth Regiment of Iowa Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every volunteer non-commissioned officer, musician, and private who enlisted into the military service of the United States prior to July 22, 1861, under the proclamation of the President of the United States of May 3, 1861, and the orders of the War Department issued in pursuance thereof, and who was actually awaiting muster under such enlistment before August 6, 1861, and was after that date actually mustered into the service under such enlistment as a member of the Fourth Iowa Infantry, and was thereafter honorably discharged, and has not heretofore received the bounty offered under said proclamation and orders, shall be entitled to and shall be paid the full bounty of $100 as provided for soldiers so enlisted and mustered in before August 6, 1861, by the act entitled "An act in relation to bounties," approved April 22, 1872.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me from the reading of the bill that it is not a private bill, but a general law.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I can explain the facts in relation to this bill in a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] makes the point of order that the bill, not being of a private character, is improperly upon this Calendar.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. The gentleman is mistaken. The bill relates only to the Fourth Iowa Infantry. The facts are these: On May 3, 1861, President Lincoln called for forty regiments of volunteers. The War Department by an order promised each of those volunteers $100 bounty when honorably discharged at the end of the term of enlistment. The trouble was, however, that eighty-two regiments were accepted under that call instead of forty, so that the Second Auditor could not tell whom to pay, and an act of Congress was asked giving to all the volunteers under the call $100 bounty. That act was passed in 1872, but it fixed the time of the muster prior to the 6th day of August, 1861. Now, the Fourth Iowa Regiment was in fact enlisted a long time before that, and the men were at that time at Jefferson Barracks ready to be mustered in, but, by the fault of the mustering officer of the United States, they were not mustered in until a few days after the date fixed in the law. Only a small number of the men are now living, and the committee report unanimously in favor of the passage of this bill, because those men were just as much entitled to the bounty as the others were who got it, having been included in the eighty-two regiments provided for by the law of 1872.

Mr. CONGER. There are less than one hundred of the men remaining now.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I understand the number of men to be benefited by this bill to be less that one hundred. It is certainly a private bill; it applies to the surviving private soldiers of the Fourth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and to no others. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SHAW. Will the gentleman from Iowa tell the House how many of the soldiers are likely to be benefited by this bill?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. About one hundred.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Eighty-two is the exact number.

Mr. CONGER. There is only one man that has actually applied for this relief, and the Second Auditor reports that there can not possibly be one hundred who will be entitled to it, and that there may be only ten.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] an opportunity to be heard upon his point of order, but he seems to have temporarily left the Hall.

Mr. HOLMAN. While we are waiting for the gentleman I ask that the report upon this bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The report was read.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STEPHEN M. HONEYCUTT.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 481) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Paymaster-General of the Army of the United States, out of any money in his hands for the payment of the Army, is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Stephen M. Honeycutt an amount equal to the pay and allowances of a private soldier from the 25th day of March, 1864, until the 8th day of August, 1865.

The report (by Mr. BROWER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 481) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt, respectfully report as follows:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on Military Affairs (No. 688), first session Forty-eighth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 688, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4200) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt, submit the following report:

This claim was reported favorably to the Forty-seventh Congress, and your committee adopt that report, which is as follows, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill (H. R. 4200):

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen M. Honeycutt, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following, it being the same report which was adopted by the House Military Committee in the Forty-third Congress:

"It appears from the evidence submitted to the committee that petitioner enlisted in Company E, Third Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry, as a private, on the 25th day of March, 1864, but was not mustered into the service, owing to there being no mustering officer present, and that on the 20th of September, 1864, he was detailed on recruiting service; that he went into Western North Carolina and recruited a large number of troops for the United States Army, and that while so engaged in recruiting under the orders of a United States officer he was captured by the enemy.

"The committee, being satisfied that the petitioner rendered valuable service, and the fact of his not being mustered into the service being no fault of his, believe that he should not be refused his compensation as a private soldier. They therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEVI JONES.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 482) for the relief of Levi Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Paymaster-General is hereby directed to pay Levi Jones, late first lieutenant of Company B, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry from the 1st day of October, 1863, to the 1st day of May, 1864.

The report (by Mr. BROWER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 482) for the relief of Levi Jones, have given careful consideration to the same, and ask to report:

That this claim was presented to the Forty-ninth Congress, and a report was made in regard to it by the Committee on War Claims on the 16th of April, 1886. As the examination by your committee has led them to the same results with those arrived at by the committee of 1886, they do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but refer to that report, and herewith annex a copy for information.

Your committee recommend that the bill referred to them do pass.

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4629) for the relief of Levi Jones, submit the following report:

The claimant, Levi Jones, organized Company B, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, and was appointed first lieutenant thereof by General Burnside on the 7th day of October, 1863, and took charge of said company at once, received and receipted for all the necessary stores and equipages for said company as its commandant. He was kept on the front, and participated in the fights at Warm Springs and at Watkins Ford in the months of October and November, 1863, in command of said company. During the siege of Knoxville he was on outpost duty all the while, and did not go into winter quarters. There was no mustering officer present on the front, and he was not mustered as first lieutenant. On the 1st of May, 1864, Company B was changed to Company H, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, and the said Levi Jones was appointed first lieutenant of said Company H. He presented himself to the mustering officer to be mustered, but the said officer refused to muster him, on the order of General Burnside. He did good and faithful service as an officer under proper military appointment, and received no pay for it from October 7, 1863, to May 1, 1864.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of said bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN M. HIGGINS, SR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4907) for the relief of John M. Higgins, sr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John M. Higgins, sr., of Caldwell County, State of Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,550, for supplies and stores taken from him by the Army of the United States during the late war.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill comes within the rule heretofore adopted by Congress marking off a class of bills which ought not to pass. This case, it appears, was rejected by the Quartermaster's Department upon the ground that the property was taken in a part of the country which had been declared by the proclamation of the President to be in rebellion. It also appears that the claimant remained inside of the Confederate lines until 1864, although he left Kentucky in 1861. It appears, therefore, that he staid within the Confederate lines during the greater portion of the war.

Furthermore, the report does not state the kind of supplies that were taken. I think the words used are "stores and supplies" of the value of $3,550. "Stores and supplies" is a very general expression, and it seems to me that this report ought to have enlightened the committee to some extent at least as to the nature of these stores and supplies. What kind of stores were they? The term is broad enough to include military stores, broad enough to include any sort of material that might have been found in anybody's possession at that time. The fact that the Quartermaster's Department decides that this case originated in a State in rebellion proves conclusively that it does not come within the class of cases to which Congress intended to afford relief. If cases of this kind are to be opened up, and payment is to be made for "stores and supplies" taken under such circumstances, I do not see where we are going to draw the line. If we grant relief in this case we go inside the Confederate lines to a place which was within the Confederacy during the war. These stores, it is said, were taken by our troops and used; how they were taken is not stated; no vouchers are produced; it is not shown whether they were taken by an unauthorized raid or taken under the forms of law by a regular requisition. So far as this report is concerned that is left a matter of doubt.

The claimant simply swears that the Army of the United States took from him stores and supplies of the value of $3,550, for which he has not been paid. According to this report the proof shows that the stores and supplies were used by the Army, and the affidavits that the charges made are both reasonable and just. That is the general averment, but there is nothing to show whether the prices charged were really reasonable and just or not. That is simply a conclusion of the committee. The articles taken should be set forth, and also the manner in which they were taken, and the prices charged for them, in order that the House might have the necessary information upon which to base a judgment; for we have laid down the rule heretofore that supplies and stores taken without authority of the commander of a post are not to be paid for by the Government, even though they may have been used by the Army. I think this case ought to be sent back to the committee, so that they may get some further information about it, and, therefore, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] seem to imply that there is an effort on the part of the Committee on War Claims, or on the part of some member of the committee, to report bills to this House that are unjust, or in violation of law. This claim comes from the district that I represent. The claimant lives there. I know him, and I know the circumstances of this case. I know, furthermore, that there is no man upon this floor who would be further from attempting to establish a precedent that would lead the Government into paying a lot of unjust claims than I would be, and when the gentleman from Illinois assumes that this man was wholly inside the Confederate lines and that the payment of this claim would lead to the payment of claims generally of people living within those lines, his assumption is altogether wrong.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether this bill was not reported unfavorably by a committee of the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It was; but subsequently a majority of the committee agreed that it should be reported favorably, and the bill failed in the last Congress simply by reason of the absence of a quorum. The point of no quorum was made, and I refused to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. My recollection is that the majority of the committee were not in favor of the passage of the bill, but merely consented that it might be reported to the House and discussed on the floor.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. At the time the report was made the committee were willing that the bill should be reported to the House and should go upon the Calendar, but the majority of the committee were not in favor of its passage; but before it came up they were in favor of it. That was the situation.

Mr. LANHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it appears that the stores for which this claim was made were used by the United States Army?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir. The circumstances of the case were simply these: Mr. Higgins, the claimant, lived in Kentucky many years before the war, but in 1858 or 1859 he moved to Alabama. When it became evident to him that war was going to break out, being a Union man and desirous of not being within the Confederacy or having anything to do with that side of the controversy, he started back to Kentucky and made arrangements to move back to Princeton, his original home. He went to Alabama to get his property and bring it to Kentucky, but he found the army lines interposed between him and his home, so that he was not enabled to get through. He had his property with him, which he was trying to get back into Kentucky, a State that was still in the Union, but he was stopped at Dalton, Ga., and remained until 1864. When the Army of the United States reached that point they took and used his property for army purposes. His mules, his bacon, and other articles were used by the Army, and there certainly can be no injustice to any one in paying this claim, and no opening up of the door for any improper class of claims. This bill simply proposes to pay a loyal citizen of Kentucky for his property which was taken and used for the benefit of the United States Army; and although that property happened at the time to be in the State of Georgia, I can see no reason why the House of Representatives should stickle at paying a loyal man for his property taken under such circumstances, if it is going to pay anybody. His detention within the Confederate lines was unavoidable and was against his will; his property was taken for the benefit of the Army, and my position is that he is as much entitled to be paid for it as if he had been a citizen of New York or Indiana.

Mr. BIGGS. Can the gentleman inform the House whether the estimate placed on the property here is a fair one?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I do not yield the floor further than to hear the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does not the gentleman's report state that this gentleman remained in the State of Georgia until 1864?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, it does.

Mr. SPRINGER. That he remained in Georgia from 1861 until 1864?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, it does state that.

Mr. SPRINGER. How could he claim to be a loyal citizen of the Government and yet live so near Kentucky, and prefer to remain in that Confederate State of Georgia rather than return within the Union lines in Kentucky?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in reply to that question I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois just one thing, and that is this: he, like a great many other gentlemen I have met at different times, has a very poor conception of what loyalty to the Government meant in the Southern States. [Laughter and applause.] I will tell you that the loyalty of the men in the Southern States is as a jewel compared to the loyalty of the man who lived in the North. And such was the case with the loyalty of Mr. Higgins. He was faithful and loyal to his Government during the entire period.

Now, Mr. Higgins was not willing to abandon his property—to leave it in the State of Georgia to be lost to him altogether. He preferred to stay with it and try to get it back into Kentucky, which was his home, but he had to remain where his property was.

Mr. SPRINGER. What kind of property was it?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It consisted of mules, bacon, and corn, and things of that kind which were raised upon a farm below Dalton, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Kentucky tell us what particular act Mr. Higgins ever performed to testify his loyalty to the Government?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The acts he performed to testify his loyalty to the Government were like the acts of many other men who were in the South, who honored and revered the old flag; he attended quietly to his own business; he was not one of the kind who was willing to take up arms against the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did he claim to be a Union man down there in the South?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, he did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is enough.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. As I understand it, he lived in Kentucky in 1861.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. He came from Alabama and arranged to move back to Kentucky, and went back again to Alabama in order to bring his property into Kentucky.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I think a man who lived in the South and claimed to be a Union man had a great deal more Union sentiment than the man who lived in the North and claimed to be a Union man and yet never went into the Union Army.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I agree with the gentleman so far as that is concerned. But I do not see, Mr. Chairman, how a Union man living in the South, and who claimed to be a Union man, could remain there from 1861 until 1864 without having made an attempt to get back into the Union lines.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. In reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana, I wish to state that Mr. Higgins did not intend permanently to reside in the State of Georgia; that his home was in the State of Kentucky, and he was forced to remain within the Confederate lines in order to save his property. He was not, in other words, willing to abandon his property and to leave it in the State of Georgia in order to come within the Union lines in the State of Kentucky. It was not necessary that he should do this in order to evince his loyalty to the Government. His design was to bring that property back into Kentucky, and he was perfectly justified in so doing. None of us would be likely to abandon our property, under like circumstances, to get through the lines. I hope, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail, but that the bill will pass.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to resist the payment of any just claim. I think that the General Government should pay every dollar it honestly owes to one of her citizens. This claim was discussed in the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress, and my understanding was that the majority of that committee were then opposed to paying this bill. They were opposed to it for two reasons: one was that they did not believe the loyalty of the claimant was sufficiently established; and, secondly, because there was no affirmative proof he had been a loyal man, that he never did or said anything which is in proof that he was loyal to the Government.

My friend from Kentucky justly says that the loyalty of men in the North when compared with loyalty to the Union of men in the South, the loyalty of the Union man of the South was as a jewel. But according to my experience, when you found a loyal man in the South, in Alabama, Georgia, Florida, or any other of the Southern States, in 1864, you never found him owning $5,000 worth of mules and horses.

There is no reason why, in my judgment, the Government should be called upon to pay this claim. This property was taken in a State declared to be in rebellion. It was taken without any order from the War Department. So far as the evidence goes it is proved that it was not taken under the order of any one in authority. It was not taken by any officer of the United States Army. It was not by any one having authority from the General Government. And whenever you undertake to pay this class of claims you open the door to pay for every article of stores or supplies taken by marauding parties throughout the South during the war. The Committee on War Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress rejected every claim unless the claimant could prove loyalty in the first place, and in the second place show that the property was taken in accordance with some order from the War Department or under the authority of the General Government.

There is just the trouble here. I apprehend they will find no order from the commanding general to take this property. It has been taken upon the order of some man without authority; and there is no evidence that it went into the service of the Government for any purpose. I do not dispute that it may have gone there; but I do assert that it is not shown in any manner by any evidence that this was taken by any proper authority.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is there any evidence that it was taken by an officer of the Army or by any person and converted to the use of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. There may be evidence that it was taken by an officer of the Army, but there is no evidence that he took it by virtue of any authority whatever.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But what use was made of it?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That I do not know. It may have gone into the service of the Army, but the fact is not shown. There were millions of dollars' worth of property taken for the use of the Army which we have refused to pay for, simply because this man or that man took it without authority from the General Government. That rule has applied in every Northern State where property was taken. If a half-dozen soldiers went out and took a Northern man's property in a loyal State and used it for their own support, the Government could not be held responsible under the rules heretofore adopted; and if you pass this bill and adopt a different rule from the safe one we have heretofore followed, you open the door to pay millions of dollars for property taken without authority from the General Government or for its use.

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADE. Does the gentleman think that if the Government got this man's property he ought to be paid for it?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It may be very true, that it ought to be paid for if the Government got it. If the Government gave authority to take the property it ought to be paid for.

Mr. WADE. Ought not the Government to be willing to pay for what it got?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. But we can not afford to pay for damages committed by every individual soldier, for if we open the door for that sort of business, we will have to pay for all that was done by the Missouri troops.

Mr. WADE. The Government is no doubt willing to pay for all it gets.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does my friend assume that the Government should not pay for all the property it takes from its own loyal citizens and converts to its own use?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That question is not here. I am not going to resist the passage of this bill; but I want to say, that having been on the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress, I believed it due to myself and to the House to make the statement. If you want to break over the rule and pass such bills, it ought to be done with a full understanding of what you are voting for.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make a speech on this question. For twenty-odd years this House and the other House of Congress have been legislating in the direct line of this bill. If we are to wait and never pay a Union man for his losses until he reaches back and shows that the Secretary of War, or some official at Washington, gave authority to take his property, no man, or not one out of a thousand, will ever receive a cent. From the facts set forth here I have no doubt, looking at the character of the committee that considered the matter, that this was a Union man. His property was taken and used by the Government, and is the Government going to repudiate its own debts because you can not go back and find where they had authority from Abraham Lincoln, or Edwin M. Stanton, or somebody else, to take it?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It has repudiated its honest debts frequently, with much less ground for excuse than that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. That is true; and that remark leads me to say this, that I would rather have a note on any pauper in this country, forty years of age, who is honest, than a claim against the United States, unless it be in the shape of a bond. [Laughter.]

I am tired, for one, Mr. Chairman, every time a little claim comes up here from the South of hearing it said that because a proclamation was not issued by the man, and because he has not gone forth and called his neighbors together and had a grand mass meeting down South to show that he was a loyal man, therefore he is a rebel and his claim shall have no weight.

I hope the bill will pass, and that is about all I want to say. [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, every Congress that takes up the consideration of such claims finds that there is always a Banquo's ghost that rises up against the payment of a debt of this character by the General Government, and we are solemnly assured that the ghost is throwing down the bars leading to the public Treasury. We are told that it will bankrupt the nation if we pay any of these claims. That, sir, is to my mind neither an argument nor a reason againt their payment. I happen to live within a State which is upon the borders. I am not here as a Southern man, but I am here to advocate, and shall advocate so long as I remain a member of this Congress, the payment to every loyal man south of Mason and Dixon's line for every cent's worth of property the armies of the United States took from him during the war if the property was taken under orders and used by the United States Army. I am in favor, sir, of rewarding loyalty in the South rather than punishing it by legal enactments.

Further, sir, if we are to wait, as has been suggested, until an order from the commanding general is produced, as the gentleman from Indiana argues, those of us who went into the Army know full well that this will be impossible in a majority of cases. If we wanted a mule while in the Army we asked but few questions as to whether the man who owned that mule was loyal or disloyal, nor did we ever run to General Grant or to any other commanding officer for an order to get such property, but we took the mule and used it for the Army; and if the owner of this mule was loyal I suggest, in all fairness, he has waited long enough upon the Government to receive just compensation for his property. For one I am for paying him just compensation.

Mr. COOPER. You took the mule without asking permission of the general?

Mr. LAIRD. It was a providential dispensation to get a mule.

Mr. WARNER. If I remember correctly the facts of history the British Government paid to its subjects in this country who were called Tories for every horse and every piece of property that our forefathers took from them during the war of the Revolution if they were loyal to the British Government. And more recently, sir, if I remember the facts of history correctly, the French Government, coming out of a struggle such as no other Government has gone through, her energies seemingly paralyzed, bankrupt as she was apparently, yet to her eternal honor be it said she paid to every one of her citizens the value of all the property taken by the French army during the Franco-Prussian war, and for every cent's worth of property taken from her loyal citizens by the invading armies of Germany.

I hope, sir, to see the day when we, the people of this country, will cement the bond of union closer, if possible, and will not always meet this class of claims by crying out that it is prima facie evidence because the man lived South that he was a rebel. Nay, some make the residence South conclusive evidence of disloyalty.

I trust the day is not far distant when every just claim, without discussing whether it be from the East, the West, the North, or the South, will be paid.

We should take care that the claim is just, and then see to it that the Government shall pay it. [Applause.]

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. I was reminded during the discussion of this question by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] of the fact that during the war out of which this claim arises it did not by any means take a dispensation of Providence to get a mule, and wherever there was anything of an eatable nature to be gathered we were there in the midst of it, and it was about so also if it was of a ridable nature.

We hear a great deal said about the surplus in this country; and I take it that when it comes to a question about the payment of an honest claim we are not banded together for the purpose of an increase of that surplus by any means. If the Government of the United States would pay its honest debts, such debts as it allows to remain unpaid until, if a private individual were substituted for the General Government, that private individual would be disgraced and driven from the community—if the Government of the United States would pay the millions it owes to honest claimants representing the French spoliation claims; if it would pay the millions which it owes to men on the frontiers for losses sustained at the hands of predatory Indians; if it would answer as an honest man answers promptly to the claims of the millions of individuals to whom it stands honestly indebted to-day, there would be no surplus in the Treasury. I am certainly for the payment of this claim.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman from Nebraska allow me a question?

Mr. LAIRD. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. Is there no other proof that this man was a loyal man than the fact that he went South when the war broke out and remained there until it closed?

Mr. LAIRD. There is this proof, which is satisfactory to me, that a committee of this House charged in the assignment of duties with the investigation of this question has reported unanimously under that assignment in favor of the payment of this claim. And I say there ought to be a time when inquiry should stop somewhere on this side of beggary and the poor-house in regard to the man who has an honest claim.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Nebraska, is there any proof of this man's disloyalty?

Mr. LAIRD. I take it that it has been found by the committee he was all right.

Mr. WARNER. I asked the gentleman from Iowa, Judge LYMAN, who examined this case in the last Congress, and he informed me, as I remember, that he thought there was no doubt of the loyalty of this claimant.

Mr. COOPER. My friend from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] did not, I think, understand me. I asked if there was proof of disloyalty, assuming that the man should be considered loyal if there was no proof of disloyalty.

Mr. LAIRD. I understood the gentleman's question.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The chairman of the Committee on War Claims, General STONE, has kindly sent to the committee-room for the papers connected with this claim. I desire to call attention to them for a moment. I ask the Clerk to read the paper which I send to the desk, purporting to be an affidavit made by the claimant.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMANT'S APPLICATION.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Caldwell, ss:

I, John M. Higgins, on oath state that I am a citizen of the county and State aforesaid; that I was at the date the claim hereinafter set forth originated, and have been ever since, loyal to the United States; that on or about the 18th day of May, in the year 1864, at or near the town of Dalton, in the county of Whitfield and State of Georgia, the following articles of quartermaster's stores were taken from me by Lieut. Joseph Haste, Company A, Sixth Indiana Cavalry, to wit:

|---|---|
| One black mare mule, value | $200 |
| One deep-bay mare mule | 200 |
| One iron-gray horse mule | 200 |

That no receipt or voucher was given, as the affidavit filed will show, for said stores; that said stores were actually taken by said officer for the use of and used by the Army of the United States; that no payment has been made or compensation received in any way, or from any source whatever, for the whole or any part of said claim; that it has not been transferred to any person or persons whomsoever; and that the rates or prices charged are reasonable and just, and do not exceed the market rate or price of the articles at the time and place stated. And I do hereby appoint C. D. Pennebaker, agent of the State of Kentucky, as my agent to prosecute this claim for me, and to receive and receipt for the money or certificate issued in payment thereof.

JOHN M. HIGGINS.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Caldwell, ss:

This day personally appeared before the undersigned, presiding judge of the Caldwell county court of Caldwell County, in the State aforesaid, John M. Higgins, who subscribed and made oath to the foregoing affidavit the 12th day of August, in the year 1865.

J. N. TURNER.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find that the claimant states in this affidavit that at the time the claim herein set forth originated he was a loyal man. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] if he has any proof as to this man's loyalty before the claim originated?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; we have proof to show that he was never anything but a loyal man and was never known as anything else.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have another affidavit read. It will be observed that the affidavit which the Clerk has just read was made in 1865, and covers three items of property, three mules, valued at $200 each; in all, $600. Now, I ask to have read the affidavit I send to the desk.

Mr. COOPER. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I want to ask the other gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] a question. It seems from this record that these mules were taken by the gentleman's regiment, and I want to ask him if he has any personal knowledge of the matter?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. If the gentleman wants any information on that subject I will inform him that I was not a member of the regiment at that time, but I suppose my colleague, Mr. CHEADLE, can tell him what he wants to know, for the property was taken by his company. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask now for the reading of the affidavit I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY,
County of Caldwell:

We, W. G. Morse and J. M. Higgins, jr., of the county of Caldwell and State of Kentucky, being duly sworn according to law, state that on or about the 18th day of May, 1864, at or near the town of Dalton, in the county of Whitfield and State of Georgia, saw the quartermaster's stores described and charged for in the foregoing claim of John M. Higgins, consisting of the following articles, to wit, one black mare mule, value $200; one deep-bay mare mule, $200, one iron-gray horse mule, $200, actually taken by Lieutenant Haste, Sixth, Indiana Cavalry, for the use of the Army of the United States, which stores were used by the said Army; that the quantity charged is correct, and that the prices charged are reasonable and just, and do not exceed the market rate or price of the articles at the time and place stated.

W. G. MORSE,
J. M. HIGGINS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that these two affidavits which I have had read were made after the claim is said to have accrued, one of them being the affidavit of the claimant himself, and the other the affidavit of his son and a neighbor named Morse. They are the persons whose affidavits I still hold in my hand. I call attention to the fact that the first affidavit was made in 1865; the affidavit now presented, with the accompanying list of articles claimed for, was made in 1876. I ask that this account may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Government of the United States to John M. Higgins, sr., Dr.

| 1864. | | |
|---|---|---|
| May 18. | To 4 mules taken by Lieutenant Haste, of Indiana | $800 |
| May 18. | To 1 bay mare taken by the same person | 200 |
| June 7. | To 13 head of beef cattle taken by Colonel Laibolot, Second Missouri Volunteers, and commander of post at Dalton, Ga | 650 |
| | To 100 barrels of corn, taken by last-named officer's command, at $5 per barrel | 500 |
| | To oats taken off 60 acres of land after they had been cut and shocked, taken by same command | 200 |
| | To 3 large fat hogs | 50 |
| | To 300 pounds of bacon | 50 |
| | To flour and meal taken at different times, 30 sacks of which were taken at one time | 200 |
| | To a large lot of lumber | 500 |
| | To a large number of hogs and sheep taken from farm | 300 |
| | To a lot of blacksmith's tools taken from farm | 100 |
| | Total | 3,550 |

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What amount has been allowed by the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. The whole amount of the claim, $3,550.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, I will call the attention of my friend from Kentucky to the fact that while the claim in 1865 was a claim for $600, the value of three mules, the claim made out in 1876 is for the value of four mules, one bay mare, and other property, amounting in the aggregate to $3,550.

As I have had the first two affidavits read, it is perhaps a matter of fairness and justice that the affidavit accompanying this account, made in 1876, eleven years after the original claim, should also be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Caldwell, set.:

The affiant, John M. Higgins, sr., being duly sworn, on his oath says: That during the years A. D. 1859 and A. D. 1860 he did business as a merchant at Opelika, in the State of Alabama, and in the last-named year removed from there to the county of Caldwell, in the State of Kentucky, leaving a large unsettled business at the former place. That in the month of August, 1861, he returned to Opelika, Ala., for the purpose of settling up his unsettled business there, and with the expectation of coming again to Kentucky in a few months. That while he was there the armies of the two contending parties to the late war of the rebellion got between him and his home in Kentucky, and although he tried to do so, he could not return to Kentucky, but could only proceed as far homeward as the town of Dalton, in the State of Georgia, where he remained until the month of June, A. D. 1864, when he returned to Caldwell County, Kentucky, where he has continuously resided ever since. That all through the late rebellion, and from the 12th day of April, A. D. 1861, to the 20th day of April, 1865, he was loyal and bore true allegiance to the Government of the United States of America, and never aided or assisted the rebellion of the so-called Confederate States.

That during the time he so resided in and near Dalton, in the State of Georgia, he was engaged in the business of farming, and also in the business of milling with a combined saw and grist mill.

That as a farmer he raised many horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and hogs, and much corn and oats, and had large quantities of bacon; and as a miller he made and owned large amounts of flour, meal, and lumber.

That he has examined the account hereto attached in his favor and against the Government of the United States for $3,550, and knows that during the year A. D. 1864 he was the owner of such and all of the articles of property therein named, and that the said property was reasonably worth the prices in said account stated.

That as to the property named in the following items of said account, namely:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| May | 18. | To 4 mules | $800 |
| | 18. | To 1 bay mare | 200 |
| June | 7. | To 13 head of cattle | 650 |
| | | To flour and meal | 200 |
| | | To large lot of lumber | 500 |

he has personal knowledge that it was all taken and used by the Army of the United States; and as to the remaining items he is informed (as he believes truly) and he believes that the property mentioned in said remaining items was taken and used by the Army of the United States.

That so far as he has personal knowledge, information, or belief said account contains a just and true account of articles of property and their value, which belonged to him and were taken from him by and used by the Army of the United States by order of the officers named in said account, namely, Lieutenant Haste, of Indiana, and Colonel Laibolot, of the Second Regiment of Missouri Volunteers.

This affiant does not remember the regiment to which Lieutenant Haste belonged.

That all of said property was so taken and used during the year A. D. 1864, but the precise dates of all can not be given now because not remembered.

That none of the property mentioned in said account has ever been paid for in whole or in part.

JOHN M. HIGGINS.

(Sworn to before the clerk of the county court, Caldwell County, Kentucky, May 20, 1876.)

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the object I have had in view in presenting these affidavits and papers, which are somewhat voluminous, has been to show that it is at least possible there may have been a mistake made as to the proper amount which should be allowed in this case. I have looked over the papers hastily. There are affidavits of several persons as to the loyalty of the claimant; I see nothing to raise a doubt as to that. That he resided in the State of Georgia from 1861 to 1864 is reasonably well established. But I see nothing to raise a question as to his loyalty, though I can very well see how a mistake may have occurred as to the amount which should be paid by the Government.

The account which was made in 1865 is, it seems to me, much more likely to be accurate than that made out eleven years later. I therefore suggest to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], at whose instance these papers are here—he sent for them himself to the clerk of the Claims Committee, for of course the gentleman desires the whole case to be presented—I suggest to him, in view of this discrepancy between the amount of the claim as originally presented and the claim as now presented, that the subject be recommitted to his committee for further investigation.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the motion I made.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I propose to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES].

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman from Colorado proceeds I wish to make a single additional statement, and to call the attention of my friend from Kentucky especially to it. This claimant, according to the facts as now presented by these papers, had access to a court provided for the adjustment of claims of this character. Whatever gentlemen here may think proper to say in derogation of the honor of their own Government, I think that in all history no government has ever been found to present such ample means for the ascertainment and adjustment of every proper claim against it as our Government has done in connection with the late war. I admit it was otherwise in regard to the war of 1812 and the war of the Revolution, as the history of the country shows. But in regard to claims against the Government growing out of the late war our Government has been beyond precedent magnanimous to its people. In 1864 a tribunal was established under what is called the "4th of July law" for the ascertainment and payment of all these irregular claims arising in the loyal States.

In 1869 a tribunal was organized, known as the "Southern Claims Commission," with ample power to send its agents in all directions to ascertain the facts in reference to the claims of loyal men in the South. It had power to go everywhere and ascertain the truth. That tribunal was in existence for ten years. It does seem to me, after the reference of all the claims under the 4th of July law, as well as the claims under the act of 1869, which came within the jurisdiction of those courts, that those claims ought to be considered as ended. All these men have had their day in court, and we should have an end of these matters.

Mr. HOUK. I wish to state in reference to the Southern Claims Commission a single fact, and that is that at the time of the expiration of the law under which that Southern Claims Commission was organized it had not entirely completed its work. There were some two thousand claims with all the facts and conclusions of the committee, which were bundled up and dumped into the Third Auditor's Office without any settlement whatever.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to say that is not a fact.

Mr. HOUK. There were two thousand cases, with all the testimony supporting the claims, which were undisposed of at the expiration of that commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to dispute my friend's statement. My understanding is that that commission had ample time in which to dispose of these claims. It was composed of three judges, who were constantly employed for ten years. They were armed with more ample facilities to get proof than any tribunal, almost, under the law, except, it may be, the 4th of July law.

Mr. HOUK. That is true.

Mr. HOLMAN. They sent their agents into my friend's State; I think the number was as high as twenty-one, but I may overstate the number. They were sent into that State, as they were sent into other Southern States, for the purpose of gathering proof in reference to these claims both for the claimant and the Government.

Mr. HOUK. Scarcely a case comes up in this House of the character of the pending bill that this Southern Claims Commission is not referred to. It is alleged here again as the reason why this particular claim should not be allowed. I therefore wish to get before the House a statement of the fact that when that Southern Claims Commission expired its work was not completed, but on the contrary there were several thousand claims, with all the proof, which had never been acted upon, and which were all bundled up and dumped into the Third Auditor's Office. We are constantly having these claims brought up, and it is proposed to reject them because of this Southern Claims Commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am confident of one thing, that if any gentleman had suggested to Congress that this Southern Claims Commission required further time Congress would have granted it. Congress has always shown the greatest interest in doing justice in these cases.

Mr. HOUK. If Congress would have granted it then, why not grant it now? If Congress would have extended the time in reference to these claimants, gentlemen, what reason is there to refuse it in reference to individual cases where it is shown that the claim is just and the claimant was loyal?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend see that a case presented by these papers is merely ex parte and is quite a different thing from the investigation and report upon these claims by a tribunal like the Southern Claims Commission?

Mr. HOUK. The reading of these papers has changed my mind about this particular case; but I want this House to understand that this Southern Claims Commission did not complete its work at the time the law expired, but that there were several thousand cases which had been made up which were left over and dumped into the Third Auditor's Office.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I now yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES].

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, I followed the report in this case, and I do not think it shows the slightest disloyalty on the part of any man who lived in Western Kentucky or Tennessee during the war. It seems the army got between him and his home; that he was not able to return for some years. Sir, I have a little practical knowledge of the state of things which existed throughout that unfortunate country during that crisis. That country was beset with armies on every hand. There were the regular Union troops, the regular Confederate troops, the cavalry raiders. There were regulators, and every other kind of troops which were known to the warfare of the Middle Ages.

I commanded for a short time a cavalry expedition through a portion of that country, and it made an impression upon me I shall never forget. Here lived a poor man on his plantation. He had a large family; he had a few horses; he had a few mules, and was trying to raise a crop for his support and that of his family. The raiders on one side would come and carry them away, and raiders on the other side would come and take what the others had left. Will gentlemen tell me that such a man, in such a situation, should announce his loyalty and that he was a Union man on every occasion?

Any gentleman who reflects on the situation of that unfortunate individual must know the moment it got out that he was a Union man, the next Confederate raid everything would be taken away which had been left. If he said he was a Confederate and was trying to keep his family from starving, the Union cavalry would proceed to take what he had when they next succeeded in reaching his premises.

Why, sir, this poor individual, striving to keep his family from starving in the midst of such surroundings, would have been pardoned if he had stood up and told the most plausible stories that he could invent from morning until night, and fitting his stories to the troops, whether Federal or Confederate, that camped in the vicinity of his little home.

Sir, this committee have found, I believe, that this man drifted down into Alabama, and that he could not find his way back home again on account of the presence of the army for two or three years. I wish to say upon that point it is no evidence of his disloyalty. The poor fellow was driven around by these cavalry raids continually; and from my personal knowledge of that country, by practical observation, that fact is no evidence he was not the most loyal man south of the Ohio River.

Mr. Chairman, it is easy for gentlemen who live in the far distance from the scene of hostilities to say they want positive proof that a man is loyal to present such a claim; but if some of them, by the fortunes of war, had been placed in that man's situation they would have done anything at the time to save their families from starvation and their property from confiscation. Again, sir, I do think that this committee ought to know better than I do, better than the gentleman from Indiana knows, and better than any of us know, who have not taken these papers home and carefully gone over them and made notes of the testimony, whether or not a proper amount is reported here. It strikes me as farcical, and I want to say this, here and now——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I wish to say to the gentleman from Colorado that I was on the War Claims Committee in the last Congress when we investigated and reported against this bill, and I know as much about it as the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SYMES. The statement of the gentleman, that he knows as much as "the gentleman from Colorado," is entirely irrelevant. It is as irrelevant as speeches generally are to country juries in Southern Indiana. [Laughter and applause.] The "gentleman from Colorado" did not say he had investigated this claim, or that he knew whether this individual was entitled to $1,000 or to $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, I said I did not believe that the gentlemen who were not on the War Claims Committee knew as much about this report as the gentlemen who were upon it. They are honorable gentlemen; they are able gentlemen; they have investigated this claim carefully; they have reported it to the House, and I am not here to stickle on the question as to whether the committee think $2,000 or $3,500 is the right amount. I only say that if $2,000 was due to this man for property used by the Federal Army before 1866, I think he ought to have about $3,500 now, because this Government has delayed paying his claim for so long a time.

If the gentleman from Indiana was upon the committee, and understands about the claim, very well. I am not combating that. I am saying that the three hundred members in this House who don't know anything of the claim except by the report of the committee are justified in voting for it and sustaining that report.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment in order to have the report of the Committee on War Claims in the last Congress on this bill read.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I am willing to have anything read, and to have the claim fought in any way that gentlemen may desire to fight it, provided I am allowed to make a statement in response to the gentleman from Indiana at the close. Gentlemen can have the whole record and the testimony and all the communications in regard to the claim read and published if they desire it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I send to the desk the report of the Committee on Claims of the last Congress, and also a minority report submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], and ask that they may be read.

The reports were read, as follows:

The claimant in this case seeks compensation for property owned by him in the month of June, 1864, at Dalton, Ga. He says it was worth $3,550, and that the same was taken from him by the Army of the United States under the command of Lieutenant Haste, of Indiana, and Colonel Laibolot, of the Second Regiment of Missouri Volunteers. He avers that he was loyal to the Government of the United States.

Conceding this claim to be correctly stated, as matter of fact no compensation can be allowed for the loss. It was properly held and owned in an insurrectionary State, and was seized during active hostilities. All the general legislation of Congress has been against allowing this class of claims, and your committee see no good reason for a change of that policy. There is nothing so exceptional in this case as to warrant your committee in departing from the general rule, and they therefore recommend that the bill in this case do lie upon the table.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

[To accompany bill H. R. 940.]

I do not concur in the report of the majority of the Committee on War Claims in the case of John M. Higgins.

W. J. STONE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to add that during the entire session of the last Congress—both sessions—numerous reports came from the Committee on War Claims rejecting cases of this kind for the reason there stated; and the reasons given in the report furnished the groundwork for the legislation heretofore had by Congress upon the subject.

It has been uniform up to this time that property taken in the midst of hostilities was not to be paid for, and whether the claimant was loyal or not is not material. It is the case of property taken in the midst of war, as reported by the Committee on War Claims in the last Congress, for which compensation has not been made by general law of Congress; and I do not remember that any special acts of Congress have been passed in such cases up to this time. There may have been one slipped through without observation; but when it comes to discussion I think it will be found the records of Congress are uniform as to the fact that property taken in the midst of hostilities has not been paid for by the Government.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] permit me to say just one word?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman for one minute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not attach any importance whatever to the language of the report of the last Congress so far as the matter is stated to have occurred within the insurrectionary district. It is entirely possible that loyal men entitled to the protection of the Government may have resided within what is known in war parlance as the enemy's country, or in the insurrectionary district. Nor do I regard it as a matter of importance, so far as the discussion of this question is concerned, that there should be additional proofs of the claimant's loyalty. I do not suppose it is always possible for a man who is loyal to the Government to show it by any overt act, especially when he is surrounded on all sides by enemies.

I should assume if he were in the insurrectionary district and there was no evidence to show that he took part in the insurrection, that he was influenced to do something to further the objects of those engaged in insurrection against the Government—I should think it is fair to assume that he was loyal.

But here is a question that comes to my mind. I think that in all these claims that have heretofore been allowed by an act of Congress it was first necessary to show that the property upon which the claim is based was either quartermarter or commissary stores, such as might be properly used by the Army for military purposes. I judge from the nature of the articles that were appropriated in this case that they were articles properly entering into stores of this description. But it is necessary, I think, to show in the second place that they were seized by the command of an officer having authority. Certainly it is not essential that it should be shown that the seizure was founded upon an order from the War Department or even from the commanding general; but certainly it should be shown that it was by order of the officer in immediate command.

The reason why that is necessary is, I think, obvious. The Government is not responsible for every trespass committed by a soldier in its army operating in the enemy's country, engaged in its wars. For acts of trespass unauthorized, done out of a spirit of mischief or with the mere design of committing injury to the other side, for acts of this kind certainly the Government is not and ought not to be held responsible, even if in the commission of them there was a destruction or an appropriation of such property as might properly belong to the military stores of the Government; and it seems to me, and I have listened carefully to the reports in this case, and the testimony so far as it has been read, that it is not sufficiently disclosed that this property was taken by command of an officer having authority and duly appropriated in the proper and legitimate way to the use of the Army.

Believing that the stores were military stores fit to be used by the Army in the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments, and believing there is sufficient proof of the claimant's loyalty, I still hesitate under the circumstances to vote for this claim, because I do not see it has been sufficiently shown that the property was appropriated in such a way by the officers of the Army as would make the Government legally or in equity responsible for it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I have very little time left, but, in answer to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, I want to say the testimony here shows plainly that these stores were taken by a commissioned officer of the United States Army. I have never been informed what sort of commission there must be in order to make such an act authoritative. But these stores were taken by United States officers and for the use of the United States Army.

Now I want to say one word in regard to the point raised by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as to a discrepancy in these accounts. He says that in 1865 Higgins claimed an amount of $600 for mules. That is true. He says that these papers were sent for at my instance. That is also true. I do not want to cover up anything in a claim, and am not here to advocate the payment of claims that are unjust or illegal. He filed his claim in 1865 not having an idea that the United States Government would pay for the flour and bacon and beef which were used; but afterward, in 1876, when he found this class of stores and supplies was being paid for, Higgins asked the Government to pay him for that class of supplies for which they were paying others.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word about the cry raised here in regard to opening the flood-gates. I have heard that cry about opening the flood-gates ever since I have been in politics. Some fellow is always trying to get up a scare for the country by the cry about opening up some sort of flood-gates.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say furthermore that this man's loyalty is established; the taking and using of his property is established; the taking of it by a commissioned officer is established. It is just the character of claim that has been occasionally, and very occasionally, allowed here during the last twenty years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to one point?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the gentleman's report, I believe, he mentions the fact that this claim was presented through Mr. Pennebaker, the State agent of Kentucky.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. No, sir; I do not mention that in the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, it is mentioned in the papers.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It is in the papers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I read from these papers:

OFFICE KENTUCKY STATE AGENCY,
Washington, January 19, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inclose herewith for your consideration a claim under the act of July 4, 1864, of John M. Higgins, three mules, $600, and to request payment thereof.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. D. PENNEBAKER,
Agent State of Kentucky.

General M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

It appears, therefore, that in 1866 the claim was presented for three mules, amounting to $600; while now it is for four mules, and other articles which are added to the claim.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is simply a reiteration of what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has already said. I want to call the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the fact that, so far as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is concerned, you might as well shake a red flag in the face of a bull as to present here for payment any claim for property taken south of the Ohio River. But when there is a claim north of the Ohio, or a claim coming from his own district, he has no objection to it. Even at this Congress he presented before our committee a bill providing for the payment of a claim in his own district. I reported the bill back at his request, and he requested me as a favor not to object to his getting unanimous consent for its passage, and that bill has passed here and has gone to the other end of the Capitol; yet now he is here, interposing these technical objections to the payment of the just claim of a loyal man who happens to live south of the Ohio. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOLMAN. But the bill to which the gentleman refers was for the payment of a good claim, was it not?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Gentlemen, I was not loyal during that war; I was upon the other side, and it is the most astonishing thing in the world to me that I am made chairman of the Committee on War Claims, and am here working day and night—an average of eighteen hours a day do I give to this work—trying to get the Government of the United States to pay the just claims of men who were loyal to it during the war. [Renewed applause.] And, while I am engaged in that work, we find a man here coming from a loyal State who is unwilling to do justice to a loyal citizen of the United States whose home was in Kentucky, because he was so unfortunate, as he thought, as to be detained with his property in a State which was declared to be in rebellion. I am not here to advocate the payment of unjust claims. If this claim was good before the Southern Claims Commission, as is stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I wish to ask him why it is not just before the Congress of the United States, not having been filed before the Southern Claims Commission?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not care anything about "opening the flood-gates;" I hold that the Government ought to pay every just claim without regard to precedents.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. That is my position.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky how he explains the discrepancy between the bill presented by this man in 1865 and his present claim? I ask the question simply for information.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The explanation is this: When Mr. Higgins filed his claim at that time he believed that mules and horses taken by the United States Army were the only things that would be paid for. Afterwards he found that quartermaster's stores—bacon, flour, lumber, and such things—were being paid for. Then he added those items to his bill, and he was perfectly justified in doing it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, I am not here advocating the payment of any unjust claims; I am not here advocating the opening of any "flood-gates;" I am only asking that the Government of the United States will do justice to worthy and honest claimants whom it has encouraged by its laws to present their claims for losses incurred during the war.

Now, this Committee of the Whole can do just what it pleases in regard to this claim. If the sense of justice among members here is not deep enough to secure the passage of this bill, proposing to do justice to this man, in whose favor every point is established, the fault is not mine. I have done my duty; I have given you the whole facts of the case; I have not tried to cover up or keep back a single circumstance. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the suggestion made by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] expresses exactly the line of public duty on this floor. My friend reported a claim in favor of a Union soldier who had rendered service——

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I want to emphasize right here the fact that I have reported scores of claims in favor of Union soldiers who had had injustice done them for twenty years by men entertaining the opinions which my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] entertains in regard to these claims. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, my friend speaks very well; and the only reason I have not joined in applauding him is because I had this paper in my hand. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, my friend misapprehends. I did not expect him to report a bill to pay a soldier in my district, except upon its own merits; and I am sure he did not do so. I am sure he convinced himself that the claim was a just one and ought to be paid. If he reports any bill which is subject to criticism, he certainly, with his magnanimity and sense of justice, can raise no objection to fair criticism and discussion. Why, sir, he ought to ask me, as well as other gentlemen on this floor, to criticise any measure he may present, if justice requires such criticism. This is simply a public duty. Neither the wishes of my friend from Kentucky nor myself are to be considered in a matter of this sort. The question is what is right and just to be done by this great Government of ours.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I wish merely to emphasize the last remark of the gentleman. I am only attempting to do justice to meritorious and worthy claims. My remarks with regard to the position I had occupied relative to his own bill were only brought out by his reiteration of a point which had been answered to the satisfaction of everybody else in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that remark was in bad taste; I think such reference was entirely proper; and I know that my friend is always careful in his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say with emphasis that my friend from Kentucky has shown the utmost magnanimity with regard to claims on behalf of Union soldiers in the North as well as in the South. But I think the gentleman has misapprehended the point involved here; for I have said that it seems to be well established that this claimant was a loyal man. It is a question as to the justice of the claim.

I now ask the Clerk to read the paper which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE KENTUCKY STATE AGENCY,
Washington, January 19, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inclose herewith for your consideration the claim under act of July 4, 1864, of John M. Higgins, three mules, $600, and request settlement thereof.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. D. PENNEBAKER,
Agent State of Kentucky.

General M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be observed that the paper just read is dated January 19, 1866. The account presented at that time, very shortly after the close of the war, by the agent of the State of Kentucky to the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, was for three mules valued at $600. My friend from Kentucky says that the reason the other articles were not included in the claim at that time was that this gentleman did not suppose that anything but horses and mules would be paid for. My friend, however, forgets that the original claim presented against the Government in 1866 was for three mules at $200 each, making $600, while the later claim, to pay which this bill is reported, embraces four mules and a horse and all the other articles which are named, aggregating $3,550. How does my friend explain that? I yield for an explanation.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have explained that matter twice to the gentleman; and I apprehend there is no other gentleman on this floor to whom the explanation already made has not been satisfactory. But the gentleman from Indiana, in his determination to defeat this claim—and it has been my fortune to have him oppose every claim I have advocated on this floor—proposes to quibble over this matter until the House shall become weary and adjourn without disposing of this question, thereby defeating or delaying just payment to a man who stands knocking at your doors for justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. But still my friend will allow me to ask, is it not likely that a claim presented almost immediately after the period in which the claim is said to have accrued—for this claim is alleged to have accrued between 1861 and 1864—is it not likely that a claim presented in 1866 was more accurate than one made eleven years later?

Mr. WARNER. Does not the gentleman know if this claim was presented in 1866 it was not presented by the claimant himself, but by a State agent?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. And I understand that in this case the claimant now swears to his claim and to his loyalty at the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have called attention to the disparity of the claim made at different times, and I have no more to add. If the House thinks it proper to pay this claim thus enlarged, of course it will do so.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I hope that will not be done.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 126.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

A. GATES LEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4908) for the relief of A. Gates Lee, surviving partner of A. G. & B. P. Lee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to A. Gates Lee, of McCracken County, Kentucky, surviving partner of A. G. & B. P. Lee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $675, for use and occupation of their mill property by United States troops during the late war.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move to amend by inserting before "A. Gates Lee" the words "heirs of," and by inserting after the word "Lee" the word "deceased."

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 297) for the relief of A. Gates Lee, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

The petition is presented by A. Gates Lee, as the surviving partner of A. G. & P. B. Lee, and the claim made is for damages sustained by the occupation of real estate by United States troops from October 1, 1861, until about January 1, 1864.

The testimony submitted shows that A. G. & P. B. Lee built a flour-mill and appurtenances in the city of Paducah in 1857 or 1858, the whole original cost of which is estimated at $13,400; the machinery, consisting of steam-engine, boilers, etc., being estimated at $6,000. At this mill they conducted their business until 1861, when, they allege, offers were made to them to supply the Confederate troops with flour, in violation of the President's proclamation, at very lucrative prices, which they refused.

Their loyalty is attested by numerous affidavits and statements, one of which asserts that A. G. Lee was excommunicated from his church in the early part of the year 1861 because of his ardent devotion to the Union.

This mill and premises consisted of the main building, 50 feet long by 30 feet wide, three stories high; a shed two stories high, 50 feet long by 14 feet wide; a warehouse one story high, 100 feet long by 16 feet wide; and two double stables—all frame buildings; two engines and boilers, and three pairs of burrs, eight bolting-cloths, packers, elevators, fans, smut-mills, and the usual apparatus of a merchant flouring-mill; all occupying a lot in Paducah, 98 feet by 165 feet, inclosed by a plank fence.

These were taken possession of October 1, 1861, and occupied as headquarters by General Lew. Wallace, and continued to be so occupied by the successive commanders of the United States troops stationed there until January, 1864—two years and three months. During this time it is alleged that the mill and buildings were in effect destroyed; that the weather-boarding was taken off; the plank, fences, sheds, and timbers were used by the soldiers.

In October, 1865, J. H. Wilson, captain and assistant quartermaster, under orders from Major-General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of military division of Tennessee, appointed three citizens of Paducah to investigate and report the amount of damages sustained by the property known as "Linwood Mills" during, and caused by, its occupancy by the military authorities of the United States, and also the amount of rent equitably due for possession of said property. They reported in a few days after their appointment that the monthly rent was worth $75, and by a separate report that the damages sustained were $11,875.

No further proceedings appear until January 29, 1867, when Acting Quartermaster-General D. H. Rucker addressed to the Secretary of War the following:

"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, January 29, 1867.

"SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the inclosed papers relative to the claim of A. G. & B. P. Lee, for damage and destruction of property known as the 'Linwood Mills,' at Paducah, Ky., referred to this office by the War Department, and to report:

"That Bvt. Maj. Gen. J. L. Donaldson, chief quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., was directed, December 29, 1865, from this office, to pay rent for this property at the rate of $25 per month from the time it was seized by the United States to the time it was vacated.

"He was also advised that claims for damages could not be paid from any appropriation under the control of the Quartermaster-General, but that the claimants in such cases must await the action of Congress.

"The Acting Quartermaster-General knows of no objection, so far as this office is concerned, to the application of Mr. Frederick Koones, 'that the claim be referred to the Claims Commission.'

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"D. H. RUCKER,
"Acting Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General.

"Hon. E. M. STANTON,
"Secretary of War, Washington, D. C."

"August 8, 1868, General James A. Hardie, president Commission of Claims, addressed the Secretary of War, saying, after reciting the foregoing letter of General Rucker:

"'At the instance of the claimants this case was referred to the Claims Commission, by whom no action appears to have been taken in the premises. The commission see no sufficient reason for a modification of the action already had in the claim by the Quartermaster-General.'"

This was approved by Major-General Schofield, Secretary of War, August 12, 1868.

The rent of $25 was never paid by the Government.

That he and his brother had been loyal men; that their property has been taken and used in the public service, and thereby greatly injured; and that proper compensation should be made, the committee think there can be no doubt. Notwithstanding the assessment made by the citizens appointed by the assistant quartermaster, the committee feel at a loss to arrive at a just estimate of the damages. The whole of the buildings and machinery when new are said to have cost $13,400. The machinery is estimated at $6,000.

Your committee are of opinion that the case under consideration is one of great hardship, and recommend that claimants be paid the sum of $675 for rent of said buildings for two years and three months, and report herewith a substitute for the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will state the time covered in this claim for rental.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The property was taken possession of October 1, 1861, and continued to be so occupied by the United States troops until January, 1864, that is for two years and three months. It appears from the report of General Rucker, Acting Quartermaster-General, that the owners of this property agreed to take $25 per month from the day it was seized by the United States to the time it was vacated; and further, that Bvt. Maj. Gen. J. L. Donaldson, chief quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., was directed October 29, 1865, to pay rent for the property at that rate. But that rent of $25 was never paid by the Government.

In the Forty-ninth Congress I introduced a bill, which passed the House, appropriating money for the payment of this claim. It went to the Senate, and they were willing to allow for rent but not for damages. Since then A. Gates Lee, the surviving partner, has died after waiting so many years to be reimbursed for the use of his property. The heirs being in destitute circumstances are willing to accept the rate provided for in the bill, and I think the gentleman will admit there is no good reason why we should further delay doing justice to these claimants. It is only a rate of rent for this property which the Quartermaster-General directed should be allowed and which these parties are willing to accept.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why was not rental for the property fixed at the same rate in the preceding bill?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It was because A. Gates Lee was not willing to accept it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the Committee on War Claims think it ought to pass further claims for rent for the use of buildings or grounds occupied at the seat of war?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Paducah, Ky., could not have been said to be at the seat of war at any time during the war. Down to 1865 it was a depot of supplies, which were sent out in every direction. When this claim was made originally an officer was sent by the Department to investigate the facts, and the Quartermaster-General directed the payment of $25 a month during the time it was in use by the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the section of the statutes which I now send to the desk, and ask if in his opinion this claim does not come within the prohibition therein contained as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; that is to say, whether or not the Court of Claims is not expressly prohibited from considering claims of this class. I ask the Clerk to read the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. CHAP. 116. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppresion of the rebellion, or for the use or occupation of real estate by any of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky this question: Whether or not the claim now pending is not one of the class of claims prohibited by that section of the statutes?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the section which has been read, I will state in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, has nothing whatever to do with the pending case. The question as to the rights and powers of the Court of Claims is not in controversy here at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; but my friend will see that the question is very different. Is not this claim of that class which is there prohibited, and jurisdiction over which is not conferred upon the Court of Claims?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Well, it is not of that class of claims; and even if it was, so much the more strong would be our reason for coming to Congress. Here are the findings of an officer of the Quartermaster's Department, acting under orders of the General of the Army, and that report approved by Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, showing that the property was worth $25 a month, and the quartermaster was instructed to pay that sum. But A. Gates Lee, as representing this firm, was not willing to take $25 a month for it. Lee has lived out his days, unwilling to take the amount of the award; but now his heirs come in and say, "Pay us that sum and let us go; we are willing to accept it in liquidation of the debt." This is simply an act of Congress to carry out the order of the War Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed.

The amendment of Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

C. M. BRIGGS, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4909) for the relief of the estate of C. M. Briggs, deceased.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims is hereby given, subject to the proviso hereinafter mentioned, like jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the legal representatives of C. M. Briggs, deceased, for the proceeds of 455 bales of cotton, now in the Treasury of the United States, alleged to have been owned in whole or in part by said Briggs, as is given to said court by the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, upon petition to be filed in said court at any time within two years from the passage of this act, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That unless said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that said Briggs was in fact loyal to the United States Government, and that the assignment to him hereinafter mentioned was bona fide, the court shall not have jurisdiction of the case, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed: And provided further, That if the court shall find that the alleged assignment from one Morehead to said Briggs, of date April 18, 1862, under which said Briggs claimed said cotton, was intended only as security to said Briggs for indebtedness, and against contingent liabilities assumed by him for said Morehead, judgment shall be rendered for such portion of the proceeds of said cotton as will satisfy the debts and claims of said Briggs, to secure which said assignment was given.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had instructed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The joint resolution of the Senate of the following title, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read a third time, was passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof), namely:

Joint resolution (S. R. 6) to remove all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon Abram C. Myers.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof), namely:

A bill (H. R. 3) to remove the political disabilities of William W. Mackall, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. 4811) for the relief of Robert Johnson, of New York.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 76) for the relief of L. A. Morris;

A bill (H. R. 48) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson;

A bill (H. R. 120) for the relief of Charlotte Caroline Hackleman;

A bill (H. R. 611) for the relief of Mrs. P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 1387) for the relief of the volunteers of the Fourth Regiment of Iowa Infantry;

A bill (H. R. 481) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt; and

A bill (H. R. 482) for the relief of Levi Jones.

The following House bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment, was considered, the amendment agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 440) granting a pension to Mary C. Knight.

JOHN M. HIGGINS, SR.

The bill (H. R. 4907) for the relief of John M. Higgins, sr., reported from the Committee of the Whole, was considered, the question being on the engrossment and third reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill the title of which has just been read was the subject of considerable discussion in the committee, and it seems reasonably clear that the sum of $600 is due to this claimant since 1866. The bill provides a much larger sum. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Kentucky will consent to the recommittal of the bill to his committee for a further examination of the facts in the case.

If this claimant in 1866 sent in a claim for $600 it is certainly fair to presume that there was no just foundation for the claim of $3,550, for if it existed at all it existed at that time, at the time that the original claim was presented in 1866.

Therefore it seems to me the House should not hesitate to recommit this bill and give the Committee on War Claims an opportunity to reconsider its action. I therefore move that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims with instructions to allow the claim as originally made for $600.

It is very obvious that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] misapprehends the excuse for not making the claim full in the first instance. For when the claim was presented in 1876 it was for four mules and one horse, and other articles, running up to $3,550. My friend can see that this gentleman can not offer as an excuse that he presumed other articles were to be allowed for. He now claims for four mules and one horse, articles which he admitted as proper for the consideration of the Quartermaster-General, when the original claim was but for three animals, at $600. Therefore I move to recommit with instructions so to amend the bill as to allow the claimant the amount originally claimed, $600.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. That matter has been fully explained. We have discussed it here for an hour, and the very same reasons which were given in the committee against the recommittal of this bill stand good in the House. I hope the House will not recommit the bill, but will now pass it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to recommit the bill with instructions.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 96.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to recommit the bill was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 8; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted, and was 136.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

A. GATES LEE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 4908) for the relief of A. Gates Lee, with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the heirs of A. Gates Lee and B. P. Lee, deceased."

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF MISCELLANEOUS DOCUMENT NO. 124.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Texas yields to me that I may submit for reference the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 500 copies of the resolution designated as House Miscellaneous Document 124, as amended and passed by the House of Representatives January 26, 1888.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

NEW MADRID LOCATION SURVEY.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill a copy of which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4556) to confirm New Madrid location, survey No. 2889, and to provide for issue of patent therefor.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the action of the recorder of land titles of Missouri, in the case of Bernard and Anthony Laffond, under the act of Congress approved the 17th day of February, 1815, in pursuance of which survey No. 2889 was made and patent certificate issued by the recorder of land titles, No. 367, as the same are now on file in the General Land Office of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed; and patent shall issue therefor, as in other cases, according to said survey, any question of the regularity of the proceedings, in view of the absence of the relinquishment of one of the original owners, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DOCKERY. This bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. LATHAM) is as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred House bill 4556, have carefully examined the same, and respectfully submit the following report:

In consequence of injuries to certain lands in the county of New Madrid, in the then Territory of Missouri, in 1811, Congress passed the law approved February 17, 1815, and found in volume 3 of the Statutes, page 211, which is as follows:

"SECTION 1. That any person or persons owning lands in the county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, with the extent the said county had on the 10th day of November, 1812, and whose lands have been materially injured by earthquakes, shall be, and they hereby are, authorized to locate the like quantity of land on any of the public lands of the said Territory the sale of which is authorized by law: Provided, That no person shall be permitted to locate a greater quantity of land under this act than the quantity confirmed to him, except the owners of lots of ground or tracts of land of less quantity than 160 acres, who are hereby authorized to locate and obtain any quantity of land not exceeding 160 acres, nor shall any person be entitled to locate more than 640 acres, nor shall any such location include any lead mine or salt spring: And provided also, That in every case where such location shall be made according to the provisions of this act, the title of the person or persons to the land injured as aforesaid shall revert to, and become absolutely vested in, the United States.

"SEC. 2. That whenever it shall appear to the recorder of land titles for the Territory of Missouri by the oath or affirmation of a competent witness or witnesses that any person or persons are entitled to a tract or tracts of land under the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the said recorder to issue a certificate thereof to the claimant or claimants; and upon such certificate being issued, and the location made on the application of the claimants, by the principal deputy surveyor for said Territory, or under his direction, whose duty it shall be to cause a survey thereof to be made, and to return a plat of each location made to the said recorder, together with a notice in writing, designating the tract or tracts thus located, and the name of the claimant on whose behalf the same shall be made; which notice and plat the said recorder shall cause to be recorded in his office, and shall receive from the claimant for his services on each claim the sum of $2 for receiving the proof, issuing the certificate, and recording the notice and plat as aforesaid; and the surveyor shall be entitled to the same compensation for his services from the party applying as is allowed for surveying the public lands of the United States.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the recorder of land titles to transmit a report of the claims allowed and locations made under this act to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and shall deliver to the party a certificate, stating the circumstances of the case, and that he is entitled to a patent for the tract therein designated, which certificate shall be filed with the said recorder within twelve months after date, and the recorder shall thereupon issue a certificate in favor of the party, which certificate, being transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall entitle the party to a patent, to be issued in like manner as is provided by law for other public lands of the United States."

It will be seen by reference to the act that any parties owning sunken or injured lands were allowed to make a new location of an equivalent number of acres on any part of the public domain subject to sale and entry. Bernard and Anthony Laffond were the owners of a tract of land in the New Madrid district, amounting to 400 arpents (about 320 acres), and it appears that the recorder of land titles issued to them a certificate for a new location on the 26th February, 1825, in pursuance of which certificate they located their claim in Clay County, Missouri.

It further appears from the record of the recorder of land titles that Bernard Laffond, on the 14th of February, 1807, parted with 100 arpents of the injured land to James Simpson; but Simpson does not appear to have relinquished his interest in said land. For this reason the Commissioner of the Land Office is unable to issue a patent to the present owners, successors to the said Bernard and Anthony Laffond, and the bill seeks simply to quiet the title by authorizing the issue of a patent to the land in question, the present owners having held undisturbed and peaceful possession for sixty-three years. The chain of title from the time of the new location is perfect and complete; and the only defect standing in the way of the issue of the patent is the failure of Simpson to relinquish his interest in the New Madrid land.

There is no evidence showing just why the recorder of land titles issued the certificate in the absence of such relinquishment; but inasmuch as the bill gave him quasi-judicial functions, it is the opinion of your committee that the recorder understood Simpson had no interest in said lands. Simpson and his heirs (if any) are unknown, and have never in any manner, so far as the records of the Land Office show, laid any claim to the 100 arpents in question. The bill does not, however, affect any right that Simpson or his heirs (if there be any) may have in the injured lands. At all events, it is manifest that Simpson or his heirs have no interest in the Clay County land located under certificate 367, survey 2889.

For the reason, therefore, that the defect is only technical, and the present owners have held peaceful and undisputed possession of the land for sixty-three years under a certificate issued by an officer of the Government, we beg to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VESSELS IN DISTRESS IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. NUTTING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the Treasury Department is hereby requested, if not inconsistent with the public good, to transmit to this House, with all convenient speed, any and all correspondence, orders, and information in its custody in regard to the refusal of the Canadian authorities to allow American wrecking vessels and machinery to assist American vessels while in distress in Canadian waters, and as to whether Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery have been and are permitted to operate in American waters.

GOTTLOB GROEZINGER.

Mr. MORROW, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 647) for the relief of Gottlob Groezinger.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to refund and pay back to Gottlob Groezinger the sum of $1,047.60, taxes collected upon 1,164 gallons of grape brandy which had been destroyed by fire in the distillery of said Gottlob Groezinger: Provided, That it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary that said brandy had been accidentally destroyed by fire in the distillery before the tax thereon had been paid, and without the fraud, collusion, or negligence of the owner thereof.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to refund the tax on a quantity of brandy that was destroyed by fire, the case not being covered by the present statute relating to such matters.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why does not the case come under the statute?

Mr. MORROW. The statute relating to this subject is section 3221 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that the tax upon distilled spirits destroyed by fire shall be refunded by the Secretary of the Treasury; but it also provides that in such cases the spirits must be in the distillery warehouse or bonded warehouse, or in the custody of an officer, to have the benefit of refunding in case of fire.

Mr. HOLMAN. This tax has been paid.

Mr. MORROW. Oh, yes; the tax was paid, and the only difficulty about the refunding of the tax was that the brandy was in the distillery and not in the warehouse, where it was required to be by law.

A MEMBER. Was this bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MORROW. No; it was reported by the Committee on Claims. The claim is an entirely proper one. The only difficulty about the case is that the brandy was outside of the distillery warehouse at the time it was destroyed.

Mr. FORD. Were the Committee on Claims unanimous in reporting the bill?

Mr. MORROW. Yes; the committee were unanimous.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORROW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. PENINGTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6605) to equalize bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war for the Union; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' HOME, KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. HOUK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6606) to established a soldiers' home at or near the city of Knoxville, Tenn.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK CREEK RAILWAY COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 2017) to incorporate the Rock Creek Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair will lay before the House the following requests:

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LAIRD, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Col. Augustus C. Ball, recently an applicant for restoration to the Army.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HIRES, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. NEWTON, for two days, on account of illness.

The motion of Mr. LANHAM was then agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

VESSELS IN DISTRESS IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. NUTTING. I rise to a correction of the RECORD. While the Journal says that the preamble and resolution which I introduced yesterday were read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed, I find nothing except the resolution itself printed in the RECORD. The Journal seems to be correct; and I ask that in the RECORD of to-day the whole matter be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The preamble and resolution are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1888.

Whereas it is alleged that the Canadian authorities for years have refused and now refuse to allow American wrecking vessels and machinery to assist American vessels while in distress in Canadian canals and waters; and it is alleged further that Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery have been and now are allowed to come into American waters and assist any vessels there in distress—some of the facts in regard to these allegations will appear by the attached letters, which are made a part hereof:

"OSWEGO, N. Y., February 1, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: On or about the 30th day of September, 1881, I, being controlling owner of steam-barge Thompson Kingsford, was notified that she was ashore at Wellington, Ontario, and immediate assistance was needed. I informed our wrecker, Mr. Allen, who expressed himself ready to start at once provided the Canadian authorities would give him permission to work in their waters. I therefore applied by wire to the minister of marine at Ottawa, and after a long delay was informed that the assistance needed could be procured at Kingston, and the application was denied. I thought the treatment was severe, especially as my tugs were all ready to go, and we could have got the barge out of danger in twenty-four hours. As it was, during the delay, or rather by the delay in waiting for an answer, she was subjected to a severe gale, causing great damage and eventually costing us about $1,200 more than it would if we could have done the work ourselves.

"Again, on or about the 19th day of August, 1882, the same barge was sunk in the bay of Quinte by collision, and I again made application to go to her relief with my own appliances, and was again refused.

"To sum the matter up, the Canadian Government have persistently refused to allow us to use our tugs or wrecking appliances in their waters under any and all circumstances.

"JOHN K. POST.

"Hon. N. W. NUTTING,
"Washington, D. C., House of Representatives."

"OSWEGO, N. Y., February 1, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: At the suggestion of Mr. Allen, I make the following statement: On or about the 3d day of November, 1882, the schooner Camanche, of which I was controlling owner, was sunk in the Welland Canal, near Port Colborne. Although Buffalo was but 20 miles, and assistance could have been procured in six hours, we were told that American assistance would not be permitted, although at that moment the steam-pumps were loaded and ready to come. The result was we had to wait for assistance from Amherstburg, nearly 300 miles distant, and causing a delay of three days. Owing to the delay, the vessel's cargo swelled and sprung her entire deck up, and almost ruined the vessel.

"The treatment by the Canadians in this case was very unfair, and not at all as we treat them.

"ALBERT QUONCE.

"Hon. N. W. NUTTING, Washington, D. C."

Therefore,

Resolved, That the Treasury Department of the United States is hereby requested, if not inconsistent with the public good, to transmit to this House with all convenient speed any and all correspondence, orders, and information in its custody in regard to the refusal of the Canadian authorities to allow American wrecking vessels and machinery to assist American vessels while in distress in Canadian waters, and as to whether Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery have been and are permitted to operate in American waters.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION FOR POSTAL EXPENSES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a deficiency estimate from the Postmaster-General of appropriations to pay clerks in post-offices, and for rent, fuel, and light; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-STATION AT TWO HARBORS, MINN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board recommending legislation for the establishment of a light-house station at Two Harbors, Minn., instead of a light-house, as provided in the sundry civil appropriation act of August 4, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF FREDERICK FRERICHS AND GEORGE E. HINDEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting urgent deficiency estimates of appropriations to pay judgments of the Court of Claims in favor of Frederick Frerichs and George E. Hindee; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SECOND JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an urgent deficiency estimate of appropriation for salary of additional judge in the second judicial circuit; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ROOMS FOR HOUSE COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House in reference to renting certain rooms for committees; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask that this communication of the Clerk of the House be referred with instructions to the Committee on Accounts to report at as early a day as practicable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARNES, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of sickness and business.

JOHN C. WEAVER.

Mr. LANDES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House—the bill (H. R. 108) for the relief of John C. Weaver.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John C. Weaver, of Dennison, Clark County, Illinois, the sum of $600, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as compensation for a substitute furnished the Union Army during the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to hear the report read before consent is given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read, the right to object being reserved.

The report (by Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 108) for the relief of John C. Weaver, report as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5949) for the relief of John C. Weaver, having considered the same, respectfully report:

The claimant was drafted into the military service of the United States September 29, 1864—under the President's call, dated July 18, 1864, for 500,000 men for the term of one year—from Wabash Township, Clark County, Eleventh Congressional district of Illinois; examined, accepted, and held to service by the board of enrollment of said district November 12, 1864; sent to and received at draft rendezvous, Camp Butler, Springfield, Ill., November 22, 1864; assigned and forwarded to the Fiftieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers December 2, 1864; delivered at headquarters Provisional Division of the Cumberland, Nashville, Tenn., December 8, 1864. He was mustered out and honorably discharged (a private, Company F) July 18, 1865.

Immediately upon being so drafted, and as soon as the claimant reached Springfield, Ill., he procured one William Matheney to go as his substitute, and paid said Matheney for going into the military service of the Government as such substitute for said claimant the sum of $600.

It appears from the records of the War Department that William Matheney was enlisted December 6, 1864, for one year as a substitute for John C. Weaver; that he was accepted by board of enrollment of said district, sent to and received at draft rendezvous, Camp Butler, Illinois, December 6, 1864, assigned and forwarded to the Fifty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteers December 9, 1864, and delivered at headquarters Provisional Division of the Cumberland, Nashville, Tenn., December 13, 1864. He was mustered out and honorably discharged with his company (C) July 22, 1865.

The evidence clearly shows the claimant was compelled to perform this service for the Government without any fault or negligence on his part, but solely through the mistake or fraud of the agents of the Government, and that he has never been repaid from any source any part of the said sum of $600 which he was compelled to expend in order to procure said substitute.

Your committee have no hesitation, under the facts, in recommending that said claimant be allowed and paid the said sum of $600, and accordingly report in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not desire to object to this bill.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANDES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BAPTIST FEMALE COLLEGE, LEXINGTON, MO.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Private Calendar and put on its passage now the bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of the Baptist Female College, of Lexington, Mo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Baptist Female College, of Lexington, Mo., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000, compensation for rent of the college building while used by the United States Army for four years from 1861.

The amendments reported by the Committee on War Claims were read, as follows:

First amendment: In line 6 strike out the word "four" and in lieu thereof insert the word "three;" and after the word "thousand," in the same line, insert the words "one hundred and sixty-seven;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," insert the words "and sixty-seven cents."

Second amendment: Add at the end of the bill the following: "Provided, That the said sum be accepted in full payment of all claims against the United States down to the date of the passage of this act."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall this bill as amended pass?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, can we not have the report read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of the Baptist Female College, of Lexington, Mo., respectfully report as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House Report No. 3135, of the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is hereto annexed and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage with the following amendments:

First amendment: In line 6 strike out the word "four" and in lieu thereof insert the word "three;" and after the word "thousand," in the same line, insert the words "one hundred and sixty-seven;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," insert the words "and sixty-seven cents."

Second amendment: Add at the end of the bill the following: "Provided, That the said sum be accepted in full payment of all claims against the United States down to the date of the passage of this act."

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7321) for the relief of the Baptist Female College, of Lexington, Mo., have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

About July 1, 1861, the properly constituted military authorities of the United States took possession of the Baptist Female College building and grounds, at Lexington, Mo. This was a large educational institution owned and controlled by the Baptist Church organization. This property was not situated in a seceding State. It was used as barracks for the troops of the United States, to the entire exclusion of the owners, until September, 1864, a period of three years and two months, and besides being thus occupied by the United States the property was greatly damaged. Finally claim was made to the Quartermaster's Department for compensation, but payment was refused for want of proof of loyalty.

While it was pending before the Quartermaster's Department it was referred to Maj. J. M. Moore, quartermaster, for investigation. We quote as follows from his report:

"The building was taken possession of by United States troops on July 1, 1861, and not vacated until September, 1864. The damage sustained by the building by reason of its occupancy by the Government will not fall short of $10,000."

It was not the policy or practice of the Government to pay rent for public buildings used during the war, but in meritorious cases to restore them to their former condition, ordinary wear and tear excepted. But in the case of the Frederick Academy of the Visitation, Maryland, the Quartermaster-General reported to the Secretary of War, "it is difficult to draw the line between public and private in case of schools;" whereupon the Secretary approved the payment of rent, which has since been allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Your committee believe this to be a parallel case, and that the claimants herein should be allowed rent for three years and two months at the rate of $1,000 per annum, which the evidence shows to have been a reasonable rent, and reject all claims for damages.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

1. In line 6 strike out the word "four" and in lieu thereof insert the word "three," and after the word "thousand," in the same line, insert the words "one hundred and sixty-seven," and in the same line, after the word "dollars," insert the words "and sixty-seven cents."

2. Add at the end of the bill the following: "Provided, That the said sum be accepted in full payment of all claims against the United States down to the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I do not interpose any objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. SPRINGER. One word before the question is taken upon the passage of the bill.

I did not offer objection to bringing up the bill for consideration, but merely wish to state to the House that I can see no difference between the principle involved in the pending bill and the claim of William and Mary College, in Virginia, which was decided adversely by a very large majority on a yea-and-nay vote in the Forty-fifth Congress after a long and exhaustive debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the gentleman objected the other day to such a bill on the ground of location?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I have made no such objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

B. M. PARISH.

Mr. CARUTH. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar the bill (H. R. 322) for the relief of B. M. Parish, and pass the same with amendments.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to B. M. M. Parish, of Barren County, Kentucky, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,590, for property taken and used during the late war.

Mr. BURROWS. Before consent is given for the consideration of the bill let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PENINGTON) was read, as follows:

This claim was presented to the Forty-ninth Congress, and a report was made in regard to it by the Committee on War Claims. As the examination by your committee has led them substantially to the same results with those arrived at by the committee of 1886, they do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but refer to that report, and herewith annex a copy for information.

Your committee recommend that the bill referred to them do pass with the following amendment:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "one thousand five hundred and ninety," and insert in lieu thereof the words "six hundred and thirty-five."

[House Report No. 1443, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4512) for the relief of B. M. M. Parish, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

The committee find the facts to be stated in House report No. 2360, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

"The petition filed in support of this bill alleges a claim against the Government of the United States for corn, hay, and wood taken by the Army during the late war. Claim stated at $1,596.

"Claimant is a farmer, and resides on his farm of 400 acres, in Barren County, Kentucky. In October, 1862, at the time General Bragg was retreating from Kentucky, immediately after the battle of Perryville, General Rousseau's division of the United States Army, in following the retreat of Bragg, encamped on claimant's farm and remained three days, and whilst there took from him the stores charged for, and for which no vouchers or receipts were given.

"Claimant filed his claim in the War Department for adjudication. The Quartermaster-General referred the case to a special agent of the Quartermaster's Department for investigation and report. On October 18, 1874, he submitted a report thereon. He finds the claimant to have been loyal, and he recommended settlement of the claim, as follows:

|---|---|
| For 700 bushels of corn, at 50 cents per bushel | $350 |
| For 6,000 pounds hay, at 75 cents per 100 pounds | 45 |
| For 80 cords of wood, at $3 per cord | 240 |
| Total | 635 |

"The Quartermaster-General, on January 8, 1881, considered the claim and recommended that it be disallowed, for the reason that he was not convinced of the loyalty of the claimant.

"Your committee do not concur in the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General. We are satisfied that the claimant was a loyal citizen. His loyalty is established by gentlemen well known for their unfaltering devotion to the Union during the late war.

"The committee therefore recommend that the claimant be paid $635, the amount recommended by the agent of the Quartermaster's Department, and report back the bill and recommend its passage with an amendment, as follows:

"In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words 'one thousand five hundred and ninety' and insert in lieu thereof 'six hundred and thirty-five.'"

The committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill (H. R. 4512) with amendments, and recommend that it do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CARUTH. I move a further amendment by striking out the initial "M." where it occurs the second time in the name. It should read "B. M. Parish," and not "B. M. M. Parish."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the bill will be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

Mr. CARUTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER MARCH AND OTHERS.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3957) for the relief of Peter March, Thomas J. Wright, administrator, and others, and put it upon its passage. This bill, I will state, is for the payment of wages due to certain employés of the Government for twenty-odd years as the report sets forth. It has been reported favorably a number of times and is now on file in the present Congress. It appropriates the sum of $3,050 to pay about thirteen employés of the Government. The amount is confessedly due, and has been for twenty-odd years. The report may be read.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. PERKINS. I am satisfied with the report as far as it has been read, and do not desire its further reading.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the further reading of the report.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report. It is as follows:

The money appropriated by this bill has been due the claimants for more than twenty-three years. The bill providing for payment has been favorably reported to the House several times.

The Forty-eighth Congress referred the bill to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts. The finding of the court was reported to the Forty-ninth Congress, and the passage of the bill recommended by the Committee on War Claims; but it was not reached on the Calendar, and came over to this Congress and was placed on the Calendar.

Your committee have considered the findings and report of the Court of Claims, and recommend that the bill do pass.

[House Report No. 1613, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

That the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress, not being clearly and fully advised of all the facts in the case, referred it to the Court of Claims for a finding under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

Said claim has been returned by said Court of Claims to the committee, with the following findings of fact filed by the court February 1, 1886:

I.

The steam-boat Prima Donna was chartered November 22, 1864, by Capt. J. V. Lewis, assistant quartermaster, United States Army at Cincinnati, to transport a cargo from Cincinnati to Nashville, and to bring back such freight and troops as the officers of the Quartermaster's Department might send. It was to be a round trip, from Cincinnati to Nashville and return.

II.

There was no written contract or charter-party between Captain Lewis and the owners for the service of the boat. The terms of the agreement were that the Government should pay $200 per day for the services of the boat and crew and management, besides furnishing coal for its running, and the owners were to furnish the boat, manned, equipped, victualed, and officered; and operate and navigate the same, the movements and cargo only being under the direction of the officers of the Quartermaster's Department, while the owners had the entire and absolute possession of the boat, one of whom was on board and navigated the same.

III.

The steam-boat while so chartered carried a cargo from Cincinnati to Nashville, arriving at Nashville November 28, 1864. In pursuance of the original orders given by Captain Lewis for the vessel to return to Cincinnati after delivering the cargo at Nashville, the captain, on December 2, 1864, was ordered by the quartermaster at that place to take on board as many unserviceable mules as she could accommodate, and proceed with the same to Louisville. The captain objected to leaving, and protested against doing so, a report having come up that the Confederate forces were on the bank below Nashville in great numbers, and fully armed and equipped, but the quartermaster reiterated the order to leave. The captain requested a military escort, but the request was refused, and the quartermaster threatened that the captain and crew should be arrested if they did not immediately comply with the order; thereupon the steam-boat yielded compulsory obedience and left Nashville under these orders. About 18 miles below Nashville, on the Cumberland River, at a place called Bell's Mills, she was captured by Confederate forces armed with field-pieces, and the captain and crew were held as prisoners of war. The vessel herself was shortly afterwards recaptured and taken back to Nashville, and on December 17, 1864, was sent to Cincinnati, where she was discharged December 31, 1864, and the owners were paid in full for her services to that date.

IV.

Joseph Scott was captain of said steam-boat, and his wages at the time of capture were $250 a month; Isaac M. Clement was chief engineer, and his wages were $150 a month; David Vaughn was carpenter, and his wages were $75 a month; Barney J. Schooley was steward, and his wages were $75 a month; Frederick Kimmerly was a watchman, and his wages were $50 a month; Peter Marck, Frederick Smith, Owen McNabb, and Thomas Miller were deck-hands, and the wages of each were $40 a month. All of these persons were captured as aforesaid on December 3, 1864, and remained in captivity till the 15th of April, 1865, when they were paroled and released, with the exception of Captain Scott, who was released on the 11th of April, 1865; Barney J. Schooley, who escaped December 25, 1864; and Peter Marck, who was paroled February 22, 1865, and reached his home at Cincinnati March 4, 1865, though not finally exchanged till April 15, 1865. They have received no wages for the time they were in captivity, nor any commutation of rations.

The claims set up in this case were allowed by the Third Auditor, but disallowed by the Second Comptroller on the ground that such payments were not warranted by law.

V.

The claimants' wages and commutation of rations for the period of their captivity would amount to the following:

|---|---|
| Joseph Scott, captain, at $250 a month, December 3, 1864, to April 11, 1865, four months and nine days | $1,075.00 |
| Commutation of rations, 25 cents a day | 32.25 |
| | 1,107.25 |
| Isaac M. Clement, chief engineer, at $150 a month, December 3, 1864, to April 15, 1865, four months and thirteen days | 665.00 |
| Commutation of rations | 33.25 |
| | 698.25 |
| David Vaughn, carpenter, at $75 a month, December 3, 1864, to April 15, 1865, four months and thirteen days | 332.50 |
| Commutation of rations | 33.50 |
| | 365.00 |
| Barney J. Schooley, steward, at $75 a month, December 3, 1864, to December 25, 1864, twenty-two days | 55.00 |
| Commutation of rations | 5.50 |
| | 60.50 |

|---|---|
| Frederick Kimmerly, watchman, at $60 a month, December 3, 1864, to April 15, 1865, four months and thirteen days | $221.58 |
| Commutation of rations | 33.25 |
| | 354.83 |
| Peter Marck, deck-hand, at $40 a month, December 3, 1864, to March 4, 1865, three months and one day | 121.33 |
| Commutation of rations | 22.75 |
| | 144.08 |
| Frederick Smith, deck-hand, at $40 a month, December 3, 1864, to April 15, 1865, four months and thirteen days | 177.33 |
| Commutation of rations | 33.25 |
| | 210.58 |
| Thomas Miller, same rate and time | 177.33 |
| Commutation of rations | 33.25 |
| | 210.58 |

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

The members of the crew of said steamer first filed their claim with the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, by whom some of their claims were settled and paid, while for some reason not known to your committee the claims comprised in this bill were not paid, and a bill for their relief was presented to the Forty-seventh Congress, and was reported on favorably by the Committee on War Claims, passed the House of Representatives, and failed to secure consideration in the Senate for want of time. A bill for their relief was presented to the Forty-eighth Congress and was disposed of by reference to the Court of Claims, as heretofore stated.

Your committee therefore report the bill (H. R. 6203) providing for the payment of the amount found due said several claimants by said Court of Claims, and recommend that it do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LANHAM. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio. Whether this bill was referred in the present Congress, and reported by a committee of this House?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, sir; it was introduced during this session, and was reported by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] last week favorably from the Committee on War Claims, and is now upon the Calendar.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERMS OF UNITED STATES COURTS, MINNESOTA.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5932) providing for the holding of the terms of the United States courts in the district of Minnesota, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the district of Minnesota shall be held at the times and places following: At Duluth, on the second Tuesday in April; at St. Paul, on the first Tuesday in June; at Winona, on the third Tuesday in November in each year.

SEC. 2. That a grand jury and a petit jury shall be summoned for each of said terms, which juries so summoned shall be competent, and are hereby authorized, to sit and act as such juries in either and both of said courts at such term.

SEC. 3. The clerk of the district court shall appoint two deputies, one of which shall reside and keep his office and the records of said courts at Duluth; and the other of which shall reside and keep his office and the records of said courts at Winona.

SEC. 4. That the clerk of said district court shall also be the clerk of said circuit court where the same is held in said district, except at St. Paul.

SEC. 5. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect on and after —— next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I offer the following amendments to the bill.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Strike out of lines 6 and 7 of the first section the following words, "on the first Tuesday in June," and instead thereof insert the words "on the third Monday in June and the second Monday in December."

Strike out of line 7, section 1, the word "third" and insert "second."

Strike out in line 7, section 1, the word "November" and insert "January;" so that it will read:

"At Duluth, on the second Tuesday in April; at St. Paul, on the third Monday in June and the second Monday in December; at Winona, on the second Tuesday in January in each year."

Also, strike out in section 6 the word "next" and insert the words "its passage;" so that it will read:

"SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect on and after its passage."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. CRISP. I demand the regular order.

I call up the contested-election case of Lowry vs. White, but yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, who wishes to make a request.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman from Georgia yields to me for a moment.

I am directed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to ask leave for that committee to sit during the sessions of the House; and I make that motion accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the request will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PROHIBITORY LAWS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GUENTHER. I rise to a question of privilege. I have before me a petition signed by more than six thousand male adult residents of the District of Columbia, protesting in respectful terms against the enactment of prohibitory laws in the District. Yesterday, to see what would become of this petition if I sent it in the ordinary way to the petition-box, I took one leaf containing the body of the petition and thirty-seven names attached and sent it to the petition-box. To-day I see no mention of it in the RECORD. I now claim as my right, under Rule XXII, that at least the body of the petition shall be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin requests that the body of the petition, the nature of which he has stated, be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States and citizens of the District of Columbia, have the honor herewith to protest in the most respectful manner against the enactment by law of any prohibitory liquor legislation for the District of Columbia. The reasons for our protest are as follows:

First. Prohibition does not prohibit.

Second. We have now, and have had for years, for all practical purposes, local option in the District of Columbia, as no one can secure a license without the consent of the owners of real estate or residents within the square where the saloon is situated.

Third. It is discriminating against the commercial and business interests of the District of Columbia, and in favor of neighboring States, cities, and communities.

Fourth. It will lead to indiscriminate illicit distilling and smuggling.

Fifth. It will destroy industries that have in good faith and under the sanction of law grown up in the District for more than a half century, and which have materially aided in the development and prosperity of the District.

Sixth. More than fifteen hundred buildings now owned, rented, and occupied will become vacant, destroying their value and giving no compensation in lieu thereof.

Seventh. The wholesale business, now prosperous, will be diverted to Baltimore. Trade follows liberal laws and deals where it can secure all its wants.

Eighth. The wage-workers not only in the places where liquor is sold and manufactured, but also in all branches of business dependent on the same, will be thrown out of employment by prohibitory legislation.

Ninth. It is a blow at the industrial interests of the country, as the cereals of the farmer enter largely into the products of the brewer and distiller.

Tenth. It will divert, not destroy, the liquor traffic; the drug stores will become the saloon and perjury prove to be the order of the day.

Eleventh. Prohibition has in every instance where tried increased, not lessened, drunkenness. Prohibition is in the interest of immorality, for it creates hypocrisy, perjury, and dishonesty, and makes the home a saloon. The appetite of man can not be legislated away; it must be trained, not restrained. Crime can not be prevented by law; it can only be punished. The traffic of manufacturing liquor must be regulated so as to produce purity, its selling so regulated as to make it respectable.

Twelfth. We are not the upholders of vice, crime, or drunkenness; we are peaceful, law-abiding citizens, proud of our country, and desirous of its prosperity, but not in favor of unnatural laws that will prove a dead letter on the statute-books.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LOWRY VS. WHITE.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. I ask unanimous consent to take up a bill from the Private Calendar for consideration at this time.

Mr. CRISP. I call up as a question of the highest privilege the pending election case. I yield thirty minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. At the close of the debate upon the report of the committee the day before yesterday most pregnant and important questions were asked, and they were answered. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] I remember as one who asked such a question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was another; and yet other gentlemen made this significant and important inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who was concluding his remarks: With regard to the names of those who purported to have become naturalized citizens in the county of Allen from 1860 to 1870 inclusive, did there appear on the record in fact any order of the court naturalizing these one hundred and seventy-eight people—a period of time covering ten years and including the date at which Mr. White says he was naturalized? I say that is a most important and pregnant inquiry. And it was answered, within the hearing of every member of this House, that the records of the court of Allen County were silent as to the naturalization of these one hundred and seventy-eight people.

Am I mistaken? Was not that the question? Was not that the answer? Why was the question asked and why the answer?

Let me be fair and candid about this matter. If it is a fact that the records of the court of Allen County, in Indiana, are so utterly without verification, so utterly without judgments and decrees of court, well might Mr. White say that within that period, "on the 27th or 28th day of February, 1865, I was naturalized, and there is no record of my naturalization." In the ratio and proportion of the want of fidelity in that record is the truth of Mr. White's claim exhibited. In the exact ratio, therefore, in which the record of Allen County is correct, in that ratio Mr. White's statements are not to be credited. I now state to this House that there is a full and complete naturalization record in the case of every one of those one hundred and seventy-eight men. I will show that from the record, and more, there is not a man in Indiana or out of it who has ever produced a certificate of naturalization in that court where the record does not disclose the fact of complete naturalization, except the one unfortunate fatal mistake for Mr. White.

There is one name, I am fair in stating, that is in this condition. But I tell the House it will appear from that record before we are through with it that there will not be left a vestige of a claim for Mr. White. On page 287 appears the name of Gotlieb Laemle. So far from that being a defect in the record it comes to us with absolute force of proof of the verity of the record. Laemle in 1854 received a certificate of naturalization, and that certificate recites the reason why no record in 1854 should be made of it, and that is, it came within one year of the filing of his declaration. Therefore he should not have been upon the record, and some clerk gave him this certificate that he was not entitled to. But when it came to the records of the court Mr. Laemle's name does not appear until 1865. In that year he did have it put upon the record. I say, therefore, that the absence of the name of Laemle in 1854 is a pregnant fact testifying to the verity of the record.

Now, to this record. An examination of it by the House will disclose a most remarkable fact, the fact of a conspiracy; and I think I know what I am talking about. I know I have examined every figure and fact in that record. What does it disclose? There is no dispute about it. Maier, a clerk, testifies that at the instance of Mr. White he was engaged for two weeks making up those three sheets of paper. How did he make it? Here is the testimony. He says, "I took down every name from 1860 to a certain date in 1870, inclusive, that appeared upon the naturalization book." He then begins it; he puts down the names—and I regret that every member of the House has not a copy of this record. I will try to give some description of it. The first name is Adolphus Klein. Then running out a column, "mark," "page;" under the word "page" is "100," signifying that Klein is on the one-hundredth page of a book, a naturalization book. He then makes another column, which he heads "order-book." He follows that down with the names or marks of the order-books "T," "J," "K." Then another column of figures; opposite Klein's name "70," the page of the record of the order-book, which the clerk put in there only to represent that if Klein was naturalized on the date specified, namely, January 16, and there had been an order on the order-book, it would have been on that page. Then another column, which, from beginning to end, is marked "no record." Then another column, indicating the terms of the court by name, "common pleas" and "circuit."

Now, wherefore that arrangement? He goes on in his testimony and tells us that upon the order-book of that court there is not a naturalization of these persons, and that there is no record of it. He combines these two things cunningly to deceive. His statement did deceive part of the majority of the committee; it did deceive every member of the minority on this floor, judging from their statements, and it did deceive a large proportion of the members of this House. A cunning device! He said, "I will take so much of the record from the books of naturalization, and I will take so much from the order-book of the court, and, combining the two, I shall be able to testify that the record of the court discloses no naturalization of these persons." Kern, who was a deputy, has testified to the same fact. Maier testifies again, and I will read to you now from his testimony to show you how he stated it and how he happened to get caught. I am going to read from page 284. Mark you, Maier had testified earlier in this record, but here he is recalled; and when they get through with his direct testimony the following questions are asked him on cross-examination, and then for the first time this fraud, this trick, this deception, begins to be unfolded. The House will indulge me, I trust, if I consume a little extra time in trying to be careful about this statement. I read now from the cross-examination of Maier:

20. Q. You still adhere, then, to the view that there is some legal requirement rendering it incumbent on the judge to note the proceedings of the court on what is called the court docket?

A. I know of no such law, only the practice and custom of the judges, which I suppose is to prevent clerks from writing up proceedings that have not come before the court.

21. Q. How many of the matters contained in the list marked "Exhibit D" are there, if any, which do not appear in the record called the Record of Final Oaths?

(Objected to as immaterial and irrelevant, and for the further reason that there is no such record authorized by law.)

A. Under instructions I commenced with said record of date January 16, 1860, page 100, and took off every name up to and including August 20, 1870, page 188 of said book, during which time there was between one hundred and seventy and eighty names contained in said exhibit, each of which appears in said record.

22. Q. There are, then, none of those but what appear of record in said Record of Final Oaths?

A. The names are copied from the book called Record of Final Oaths, No. 1, Allen County.

23. Q. And that is a record book composed of entries consisting of blank forms filled up in such manner as to adapt them to the particular case, and similar to those set forth in Exhibit V, connected with the deposition of your former deputy, Mr. Jacob J. Kern, is it not?

A. Can't say that it is a record, only that it is a book containing blank forms to be filled up so as to adapt them to any particular case as set forth in Exhibit V.

Turning to Exhibit V, they copy from that book the exact requirements of the law decreeing full naturalization, and the clerk certifies that it is an exact copy from the book.

Mr. MORGAN. Are the judgments of the court ordering naturalization in that book?

Mr. MOORE. I see the point the gentleman is after, and I will answer his question before I get through. Now, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I say there is not a man, not one—if there is, who is he and what is his name?—there is not a man, I say, who was naturalized in Allen County but that his name appears in the record and his final naturalization is declared, not in the order book, but in a book of final oaths. There is not a case except the one I have told you about, and that case is significant.

Now, how are these books made? I take it that almost every gentleman in this House has been in some State court when people were being naturalized. I happen to live in a district composed largely of foreign-born citizens. The county I live in, an agricultural county, has some 4,000 voters. Having myself presided on the bench for ten years, it is possible that I have personally witnessed the issue of as large a number of naturalization papers as any one here, possibly a larger number than any other member of this House.

The matter is done there exactly as it is done in Indiana. These records are not a part of the regular records of the court. I take it that in Mississippi—and I am somewhat of a Mississippian myself—there are certain orders of a court so formal in their character, being always in exactly the same words—for instance, forfeitures of bonds and proceedings in cases of naturalization—that it is more economical to have the books containing such matters bound as such, being made sometimes by order of the court a part of the minutes, and sometimes not; so that in this department of business those minutes pertaining to forfeitures and to naturalization are made in a moment by filling up the blanks in those books.

Now, this cunning device has been discovered; but in it is another fact overwhelming when the records of Allen County are attacked for a proper and intelligent purpose, to destroy their verity; and in proportion as their verity is destroyed so becomes important and of probable truth the statement of Mr. White. But when Mr. White is the only man in the county of Allen who says, "I obtained a certificate, but it is lost," and yet his name is not recorded among the names of those made citizens by that court, then his case is peculiar. If Mr. White had said, "I was naturalized, but they gave me no paper," his case would have been stronger. Why, sir, these blanks are filled up, and one of them is given to the citizen while the other is retained. Mr. White's position is that the officer of the court gave him one of the certificates and retained in the office the other blank. Where is that blank? Let it be produced.

Mr. White gives as the date of his naturalization the 27th or 28th day of February, 1865. If on that date there was an odd blank in that book it might correspond with the certificate alleged to have been received by Mr. White; but if there is no blank in that book it does not correspond with the assumption that one blank was filled up and another not filled up. Who will explain this?

Turning to that date you find that on the 27th day of February Mr. Wellman was naturalized; and that is all right. On the 28th of February Caspar Shoep was naturalized; and there is his testimony; he is all right in the record. But Mr. White is out of the record. There is nothing, except what he says, to show that he was ever in the court or that his name was ever upon the record.

Mark you, silence is sometimes an overwhelming answer; and the silence of a record answers any man who says there is a record when there is no record, with this limitation and exception, that if, on examining the records, you find them so defective that they can not import their own verity, then human testimony can begin. A record that does not exist is as much verified by its non-existence as a record that does exist to verify what the record says. That is law.

Now, gentlemen, I desire to look briefly (for I must be brief) at what I concede to be the law. I state to you that in the provision of our Constitution in reference to naturalization are the strangest words to be found in any ordinance or law. The provision is that Congress shall have power—

To establish—

That is the first time such language was used—

To establish an uniform rule of naturalization—

The only time that the word "rule" is expressed and emphasized in that instrument. In the same clause there follows this language:

And uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Why in all other ordinances but this are "laws" spoken of; and why did the framers of the Constitution in writing this ordinance use the phrase "establish an uniform rule of naturalization?"

Ah, those compatriots knew what they meant, and they verified their meaning in the cases submitted to them. Let me emphasize this by reference to a historical case.

Mr. Gallatin, than whom there was no grander man in that great era, left Geneva and came to the United States in 1780. He served as a professor in the grand corporation of the Cambridge University, the oldest, as it is to-day one of the most honorable, of such institutions of learning in this country. He goes into the province of Maine and down into Virginia purchasing great tracts of land; he goes into Pennsylvania purchasing a farm. He serves as a soldier in the American Revolution, devoting to the cause of the colonists his fortune as well as his personal military service. He sits in the grand convention that ordained and amended the constitution of Pennsylvania. Three times he was elected to the Legislature. Thirteen years he had spent in this country, his residence here antedating the adoption of the Constitution; but under a memorial presented to the Senate of the United States, those Senators, standing at the very birth of the Government its sponsors, said to Mr. Gallatin, "You have not been a citizen of this Republic for nine years."

That is about as strong a case (to claim no more for it) as Mr. White's. I allude to it for this purpose—that we may begin at the right point. Ours is the only Government that ever naturalized foreigners save by some supreme act of parliament. We proposed to make the acquirement of citizenship easy. Until recently the law provided that the alien seeking citizenship should go into a court of record and file his declaration. That had always been the law up to two years ago, when Congress amended it so that parties are now allowed to go before a clerk of the proper court and file their declaration. But Congress has never modified the other provision, requiring that there shall be a court of record with a clerk and a seal. There is your "uniform rule." Congress thought it best and most economical to the citizen to intrust the State courts as well as the Federal tribunals with jurisdiction of this matter.

When we look to the act of Congress we find they did enact an uniform rule of naturalization, and declared that no alien should be naturalized in any other mode. This mode is prescribed with great care. It expressly provides the admission shall be before a court of record of common-law jurisdiction, with a clerk and seal. Yet we find there is no record, nor paper, nor decree, in the court of Allen County, Indiana, naturalizing Mr. White, where he claims he was naturalized. Yet the same record fails to show, as before demonstrated, that the omission applied to any other naturalization in that court.

No case has yet been cited where parol evidence was admitted to supply a record or decree. The case In re Coleman, 15 Blatchford's Circuit Reports, 406, is cited as sustaining the position of contestee. This decision was rendered by an eminent jurist, and investigates very thoroughly the entire law and decisions upon that question. In Coleman's case there were the original oath of renunciation and the oaths of the witnesses, as required by law, and in the book of naturalization the decree of naturalization, and the eminent chief judge decided these proceedings were a substantial compliance of law.

In Spratt vs. Spratt, 4 Peters, 393, the court decided there was a sufficient judgment of record. In The Acorn, 2 Abbott's U. S. Reports, 434, the court again decided that there was a sufficient record of naturalization. In these cases, nor in any that I can find, no parol evidence was offered or introduced; the sole question being, was there a sufficient record?

For one, Mr. Speaker, I can never, in view of the Constitution requiring that a member of this House shall have been a citizen of the United States for a term of seven years, give my consent to the proposition that Mr. White, the sitting member, who has no record of his naturalization except which he obtained the day before his election, has the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution.

Can any man upon this floor account for the fact that Mr. White did, on the day before his election, obtain his final papers, if in fact he had been fully naturalized in 1865?

Is the question of citizenship of aliens in this country to be so dwarfed that, instead of looking to the records of the courts where the Constitution and laws wisely confide their keeping, we look only to the vague and indefinite statements of witnesses? Have our citizens of foreign birth no higher security for their rights as citizens than that which resides in the bosoms of men? No, Mr. Speaker, the solemn records and judgments of courts declare and fix those rights. Strike them down, and instead of improving the rights of citizenship of our foreign-born citizens you destroy them. Yea, you do more; you introduce confusion; you invite fraud, of which no man sees its ultimate effect.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty minutes of the hour have expired.

Mr. CRISP. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL].

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I would have been perfectly willing to have remained silent and said nothing in regard to the questions involved in this case, if I had not been a member of the Committee on Elections, whereby the duty devolved upon me of discussing the majority report, in which I united.

It is a fact, sir, familiar to many at least, that so far as my appointment on that committee was concerned, it was not desired by me. It was not the character of work I liked; it is contrary to my tastes. But as I am a member of that committee, standing here in my place, I shall endeavor to discharge my duty at all times, and hew to the line of right, let the chips fall where they may.

I may be compelled, sir, in the discussion of this case to criticise a gentleman who sits as a member upon this floor, and if so, I have only to say he has placed himself in a position which calls for criticism and I am not responsible for it.

It is admitted, sir, that James B. White, the sitting member, is a gentleman of foreign birth; that he came to this country in 1854, after having attained the age of eighteen. Then, in order to be eligible to a seat on this floor, he must have been a citizen of the United States seven years before the commencement of the present Congress on the 4th day of last March. I undertake to say that the testimony in this case, as shown by the record, does not sustain any such pretension as that. There is no record of that fact; that is admitted. There is no trace of any record of that fact; that is admitted.

The contestee seeks to prove his naturalization by parol testimony, but the record in this case shows this state of facts: Some days before the Congressional election in November, 1886, when it was ascertained there was no record evidence of his naturalization, two gentlemen of high respectability and honor in the State of Indiana, Andrew J. Moynihan and Robert C. Bell, visited him, and laid that question before him, desiring to do him no injustice, knowing that it would be to the disadvantage of the Democratic party and operate as a boomerang on that party if the charge were made and it was not true. Mr. White, on that occasion, insisted that he had been naturalized; he also insisted that he was naturalized in order to vote for John C. Frémont; that he was a young man when Frémont was a candidate and he believed that if Frémont was not elected the country would go to the dogs, using his own language.

It is a historical fact that Frémont was a candidate for President in 1856, which was only two years after Mr. White came to this country. So that would not do. Then he said he was naturalized in 1857 or 1858 in the common-pleas court of the county of Allen, in the State of Indiana. They told him that there had been a careful examination made of the record of that court, and that there was no record of that fact and no trace of any record.

Before they parted with him, Mr. Speaker, they suggested to him that possibly he might have taken out naturalization papers somewhere else. "No, I did not," he replied. "But you might have taken out naturalization papers in order to secure a passport to Europe on some trip you made abroad," these gentlemen said. Mr. White replied no, he never secured any naturalization papers except in 1857 or 1858. It will be observed that his direct attention was called to the fact, whether, in order to make his trip to Europe, he might have taken out naturalization papers to secure a passport, but he replied he could recall no occasion when he had taken out papers except in 1857 or 1858.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on finding there was no record or trace of record of any naturalization, then he decided to change his tactics, and all over that district he had placards printed, "I was a soldier and am a citizen," thereby falling back on the act of Congress, believing that as he had been a Union soldier during the late war the act of Congress constituted him a citizen without going through the forms of naturalization.

The election came on. However, sir, on the very day before the election, on the 1st day of November, he went 39 miles into an adjoining county—the county of Warsaw, I believe—and there presented himself as one who owed allegiance to a foreign country, and was then and there naturalized. The court of his own county of Allen was in session on Thursday, the day this question was raised on him. The court was in session on Friday and Saturday following. Three days did he have to go before the court of his own county and take out his naturalization papers, if he was entitled to them, yet he hied off 39 miles to another county, a county outside of his district, and took out his naturalization papers on the day before the election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, he seeks, however, to overcome all of these facts, and how? By introducing one witness, a Mr. Jenkinson, who swears:

> I think I saw Captain White naturalized one or two years after the close of the war.

And he fixes the date of the close of the war as the 9th day of April, 1865, the date of the surrender of General Lee.

Another witness is Mr. Pratt, who swears to the same point on which Mr. Jenkinson was examined, and says:

> I am of opinion that Captain White was naturalized in 1865.

It will thus be seen that neither Jenkinson nor Pratt swear absolutely to the fact, but give a mere expression of opinion with reference to it, one saying, "I think he was naturalized," the other, "I am of opinion that he was naturalized;" but there is no affirmative fact sworn to by either.

There is one answer to a question propounded to Jenkinson in regard to this matter on which stress is laid by the contestee, and I propose to give him the benefit of that answer in justice to himself. Jenkinson stated that there was one circumstance which impressed him with the idea that White was naturalized, and that was a remark made in his hearing to the effect that it was a very singular thing to find a Union soldier renouncing his allegiance to the Queen of England. Now, the time he claims to have been naturalized was more than twenty-one years before, and that remark might well have been made in connection with some other Union soldier instead of Captain White.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the testimony in this case so far developed by me, I ask if there is a court in this land which would undertake to declare this man to be a naturalized citizen? The record against him, his own statement against him, every fact and circumstance against him, he standing alone in vindication of his claim, upon the depositions of two men, Jenkinson and Pratt, who, as I have shown, when they were swearing in the case, testified, one "I think" he was naturalized; the other, "I am of opinion" he was naturalized in 1865. I repeat, is there a court anywhere which would hold that he was naturalized in 1865, or seven years before the commencement of the present Congress? I can not think so.

But there is another fact to which I wish to call your attention briefly. In the conversations which the contestee had with the two witnesses, Moynihan and Bell, to whom I have already referred, he said, after reflection, that Mr. Nelson was clerk of the court, and that Chittenden was in the office with him at the time he was naturalized.

The evidence on this point shows clearly that in 1858 Nelson was clerk of the court in which White declared his intention, and that Chittenden was deputy, and his papers or declaration of intention were in Chittenden's own handwriting. But it also appears from this testimony that Nelson's term of office expired in 1862, three years before the date contestee claims now to have been naturalized, and never had any connection with the clerk's office after that time; and also that Chittenden's connection with that office ceased at the same time, and that he never had any connection with it after 1862, but that he was clerk of the city council of Fort Wayne from 1863 to 1869.

Now, the contestee himself, in the first place, fixes the time and place and court in which he was naturalized: fixing the time at 1857 or 1858; the court, the common-pleas court of Allen County, Indiana, and names the clerk as Nelson and the deputy clerk Chittenden. But all the facts go to show that his testimony in that respect was not correct, and hence that he was not naturalized at that time—he only declared his intention.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker, and I refer to it reluctantly, for I have already stated I do not like to criticise the contestee himself or his testimony; it is a most disagreeable duty to me, but he has made statements in connection with the subject of his naturalization that to my mind at least weaken his own testimony to such an extent as to render it, in my judgment, unworthy of credit. On the Saturday night preceding the election, when he knew he did not have any naturalization papers, he said on the stump to his supporters, "You put your ballots in for me on the 2d, and I will show my papers on the 3d."

Nearly four weeks after the election, and when he had time to cool and was not in the fervor of a political contest, he said to Mr. M. V. D. Spencer, "I have my naturalization papers; they are more than seven years old, and if you want to see them you can." He knew at the moment that he did not have such papers; that they were not in his possession; but yet that statement appears as a part of the testimony. According to the record in this case no human eye ever rested upon that paper, if it existed, outside of the eye of the contestee himself. Receiving that paper, as he claimed after the election, in 1865, from that time up to 1887, when his deposition was taken, quite twenty-two years, no human eye ever looked upon the paper so far as the evidence shows. There were his children and family, his clerks, his employés, his neighbors all around him, and yet not a solitary witness is brought forward to testify that he had ever seen or heard of the existence of such a paper.

It seems to me, sir, that an alien sufficiently attached to the institutions of this land to link his destinies fully with this people, ought to look with pride upon the evidence of citizenship and to treasure it with sacred care, and not place it where the rats might gnaw it, the moths destroy it, thieves steal it, or the elements rot it. It seems to me he ought to have a place for it and to be able to say, "I know I saw this paper which made me a citizen of the grandest government ever vouchsafed by God unto man at least once in twenty-one years."

But not so with the contestee. If he ever had what purported to be his full naturalization papers, according to his own evidence, he had no place for it, and paid no more attention to it than if it had been a trifling rag, instead of the evidence of high American citizenship. He knew not where it was or where it ought to be, where he had put it, or what had become of it. So far as the evidence shows his eye had never rested upon this important paper from the time he says he received it in 1865 down to the hour he was examined and his deposition taken.

If he cared so little for the muniments of citizenship, he must have cared little for citizenship itself, except so far as it enabled him to vote and hold property, and he could do both under the laws of Indiana by virtue of his declaration of intention alone.

But, Mr. Speaker, I care not if the parol testimony introduced by the contestee was as clear as the noonday sunbeams and as certain as the life we live, it could not be used for the purpose of proving naturalization. If that paper which the contestee claims to have had ever existed, it could only have existed as an exemplification of a record, for it was not a record itself. If there is no record there can be no exemplification of a record, and the evidence shows clearly that there was no record, and hence there could be no exemplification. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MOORE] referred so fully and so well to the fact that every single witness who was introduced to prove that he had been naturalized in this county, and had his certificate in his possession, that his name appears upon the record-book of the clerk's office of the court of common pleas, Allen County, Indiana, called the "Book of Final Oaths," except James B. White, the contestee, whose name is not there. I shall not consume the time of the House in referring further to it. And now, coming back to the point that it is inadmissible to prove naturalization by parol testimony, I will show you that it is admitted, and must be admitted, that naturalization is in itself a judicial act, and must be a matter of record to give it legal force and effect.

It must take place in a court of record. What is a court of record? According to Blackstone it is "a court where the acts and proceedings are enrolled in parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony."

According to Webster it is "a court whose acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled on parchment or in books for a perpetual memorial; and its records are the highest evidence of facts, and their truth can not be called in question."

Wharton in his Law of Evidence, section 1302, says:

A court of record is required to act exactly and minutely, and to have record proof of all its important acts. If it does not, these acts can not be put in evidence.

Under the naturalization laws of the United States, the proceedings of naturalization are required to be in a court of record and to be recorded. The statute itself has this direct requirement. It is mandatory.

In the case of Elliott vs. Piersel, 1 Peters, 329, the Supreme Court of the United States declared this doctrine:

What the law requires to be done and appear of record can only be done and made to appear by the record itself or an exemplification of the record.

In this case naturalization does not appear by the record, and there being no record, there could be no exemplification of a record.

In Desty's case, 8 Abbott, New York, the court held that—

When the record fails to show proceedings necessary to the issuance of a certificate, the court can not make up the record nunc pro tunc and issue a certificate.

So that if the contestee had appeared at any time since 1865 in the very court in which he claims to have been naturalized, and had proved by parol testimony as strong and convincing as was ever presented to a court, that court could not have entered a nunc pro tunc order because the record failed to show that at any time within the history of the court any proceedings of naturalization in connection with him were had.

Mr. Speaker, these authorities could be multiplied and piled one upon the other until they would present a memorial column almost towering heavenward erected to the wisdom and policy of the doctrine that you can not make a record by parol testimony.

There are cases, sir, in which the records were not full—the orders not written out in full—wherein the courts have held that there was enough on the record to satisfy the court that there had been naturalization proceedings, enough upon which to base a nunc pro tunc order, or that there was enough on the record to show that the last things in order, for instance, the taking of an oath, had been done, and it was to be presumed that the requirements leading up to that point had been complied with else the court would not have administered the oath—the oath being the last step in the proceedings. Such was the case of Campbell vs. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 176.

In the case of Coleman vs. Davenport, decided in 1879 by Judge Blatchford, there was a book called "Naturalization Index" upon which Coleman's naturalization appeared, and Judge Blatchford held that it was a record. So that was decided upon a record.

There is no case, Mr. Speaker, that I have been able to find that contravenes the doctrine that you can not make a record by parol testimony; or where the record declares by the absence of any entry that certain proceedings were never had, you can not show by parol that they were had.

There is one case which runs on all fours with the case under discussion. I refer to the Swinburne case, decided by the supreme court of West Virginia, the opinion being delivered by the president of that court, Judge Green, who is, in my opinion, one of the brightest ornaments of which the judiciary of this country can boast.

It was alleged that Swinburne, who was an alien, had been naturalized in the circuit court of Kanawha County, Virginia, now West Virginia, in 1856 or 1857. There was no record of it. Parol evidence was offered to prove naturalization. Judge Green, delivering the opinion of all the judges, said:

I have thus far, as did the county court of Kanawha, considered this case as if all this parol evidence introduced by the defendant as tending to prove that in 1856 or 1857 Ralph Swinburne was naturalized before the circuit court of Kanawha was admissible; but it seems to me clear that none of this evidence was admissible. It had, when viewed in its legal aspect, no tendency even to prove what it was introduced to prove. The naturalization of a foreigner is, by the laws of the United States, a proceeding in a court of record in which the court, upon certain facts being satisfactorily proven and a certain oath taken by the applicant, by its judgment declares that the alien is admitted to be a citizen. (See Rev. Stats. of U. S., 2d edition, sec. 2165.)

If the records of this court at the time when it is claimed that an alien was thus admitted to citizenship is produced and shows that he was not only not so admitted but not admitted at all, how can any parol evidence on any conceivable legal principle be admitted to prove a fact which it is conclusively shown can not possibly exist? The defendant's counsel refer to the following authorities to show that in this case such parol evidence was admissible: Nalle's Representatives rs. Fenwick, 4 Rand., 585—588; Sasportas rs. De la Motta, 10 Rich. (S. C.) Eq., 38; Campbell rs. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 176; Blight's Lessee rs. Rochester, 7 Wheat., 536; and an opinion of Judge Blatchford in the United States circuit court for New York, decided June, 1879, and reported in the New York Herald, a newspaper. None of these cases seem to me to touch the subject under consideration.

Plain, direct, and emphatic language is used by this learned judge. Nothing is left to inference.

"Where the record shows that Swinburne was not only not so admitted, but not admitted at all, how can any parol evidence on any conceivable legal principle be admitted to prove a fact which is conclusively shown can not possibly exist?" says Judge Green. How precisely does this language apply to this case! Change the name of Swinburne for White and you have a decision in this case by this court.

This proceeding might be regarded as in the nature of a trial by record. Robert Lowry charges James B. White with being an alien. White pleads naturalization, which is a plea in the nature of a plea of a matter of record; Lowry rejoins, "No such record." Then, according to Blackstone, the trial is by inspection of the record itself, no other evidence being admissible, and upon inspection of the record it is found that there is no such record as that pleaded, and of course the plea fails and judgment must be entered up accordingly of "No record; still an alien."

Freeman on Judgments lays down the doctrine that the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc is always proper when a judgment has been ordered by the court, but the clerk has failed or neglected to copy it into the record. But an entry must be found somewhere in some book or record required to be kept by law in that court.

I conclude, then, that there being no entry on any book or anywhere in the court of common pleas of Allen County, Indiana, there was nothing upon which a nunc pro tunc order could have been entered, and that this Congress will not by virtue of its plenary power, which has been invoked, declare that James B. White became a naturalized citizen of the United States seven years before the commencement of this Congress when there is not a court in the land which would so declare. I do not understand that it has ever been held that Congress in the exercise of its plenary power will disregard settled principles of law, trample under foot mandatory statutes or constitutional provisions; I do not understand that Congress has the plenary power to admit a gentleman to this floor as a member who has not the constitutional qualifications of being twenty-five years of age, seven years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen. Congress can not in the exercise of its plenary power put its foot upon the Constitution. In my opinion, Gladstone or Bismarck would be as eligible to a seat on this floor as the contestee.

I conclude, second, that when a foreigner is required to become a citizen of the United States through a court of record, he can not be made a citizen by the mouths of any number of witnesses, or by a mere clerical act of a clerk of a court.

If by the mouths of witnesses citizens could be made, then perjury would be at a premium and fraud upon the elective system would hold high carnival. If a clerk could by the issue of certificates make citizens, then, on the eve of elections, if he were corrupt, voters could be manufactured by the wholesale and turned in like a deluge upon the polls.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary for me to refer to the remark which has been made here that great hardship will result to the contestee in this case in the event the majority report is adopted. It is enough for me to know what the law and the Constitution of my country are. It is no hardship to require a man, in order to secure a high privilege, to comply with the law which confers that privilege. I yield to no man in my regard for the foreign-born citizens of this land. In my veins courses Irish blood; I am proud of it, and there is not money enough in the universe to purchase one drop of it. My grandfather was a full-blooded Irishman, and was almost present at the laying of the corner-stone of this Republic, and yet he was required to comply with the naturalization laws of the country. If one who was almost present at the birth of the Constitution was required to go into a court of record and there to renounce all allegiance to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereign, and swear fidelity to that Constitution and then to exhibit record evidence of that fact in order to enjoy benefits under it, in an humble way, it is no hardship to require a man, more than a hundred years later, to go through the same proceeding in a court of record, and to submit record evidence of that fact in order to hold a high and dignified position upon the floor of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to sit in the councils of the nation and among its law-givers.

Our naturalization laws are liberal enough. They are plain and simple and easily understood. No man need err in their construction or application. To hold with the minority of the committee would be in effect to wipe from the statute-book every vestige of these laws.

Is this House prepared to do this? Is it prepared to break down all the laws of evidence and destroy all the safeguards which the naturalization laws throw around the subject? For one I am not. As high as the privilege of a member of this House to a seat on this floor may be, and as much as we may regret the necessity of unseating a gentleman chosen by the people to represent them, it is far better that he should lose his seat than that great fundamental principles should be disregarded and scattered to the wind.

Allusion has been made, sir, to the contestee as a Union soldier. I want to say for myself that that fact has weighed in his favor with me and not against him. Though for four years I stood on the opposite side in that conflict of arms which reddened our land with blood and bathed it in tears, filled it with graves and draped it in mourning, fighting for what I had been taught was right, in the discharge of what I conceived to be my duty, and though I am proud at this hour of the prowess of the Confederate soldier, yet I turn at the same time with admiration to the Union soldier who was true to the flag that floated over him, true to the cause that he espoused, true to the teachings of his fathers, and with all the earnestness of a warm nature, I grasp his hand as a brother whose courage on the field and magnanimity in victory have added renown to the name of the American soldier and extended the circlet of glory about his head.

It may be a weakness in me, sir, or it may not be, but whenever I am brought in contact with one who was a soldier on either side, my heart warms up to him; I feel that we were once fellow-sufferers, and that for four years at least the same stars shone down upon us by night in the bivouac, the same sun scorched us by day on the march, the same snow chilled the marrow in our bones, and the same dangers confronted us. But, sir, duty was ever the talismanic word of the true soldier, and duty has been and shall ever be my talismanic word as a Representative on this floor. Then, in the discharge of my duty, unpleasant as it may be, I shall vote for the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in this case. [Applause.]

Mr. ROWELL. In the time that I had allotted to myself for the discussion of this question I had not designed to discuss the facts in the case, because the proof of the fact of the naturalization of Mr. White amounted to such a moral certainty that I did not suppose it would be necessary to dwell upon that question. I had designed to devote my time to the discussion of the law. But it does seem that the gentlemen of the majority have so far weakened in their opinion of the law that they find it convenient to discuss more elaborately the question of fact, and to insist that this contestee has not proved that he was a naturalized citizen seven years before the commencement of his term of office. Therefore I shall have to use a very few minutes on that branch of the case.

This is a somewhat remarkable contest. A gentleman, an ex-member of the House, an ex-circuit-judge, the nominee of his party in a district ordinarily with 3,000 Democratic majority, is defeated at the polls by 2,500 majority at an election where nearly 35,000 people voted; at an election where there is not a whisper against its character; where there was a full poll, a fair and free vote, an honest count, and an honest return. Yet that gentleman, disregarding the popular will, almost as if in contempt of it, asks this House to give him the privilege of representing a people who had declared that they wanted another. Be it said to the credit of the committee he found little comfort there, unless there is comfort in a report that while it fails to give him the seat deprives his more fortunate and popular competitor of that seat, and deprives the people of the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana of the representative of their choice, unless the report shall be rejected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we ought to give effect to the popular will if we can do it consistently with the law and without violence to the facts; and in what I say I shall attempt to elucidate the facts and the law, believing as I always shall in every recurring contested-election case that every one here is sitting as a judge to do equal and exact justice.

I do not want this contestee punished because he was popular at home. I do not want him punished because without his fault he was born in a foreign land; nor yet do I ask that he shall be seated unless he is entitled to his seat. That he is an American in all that goes to make up American manhood will be admitted everywhere. He came to this country in his youth. He has spent all the years of his mature manhood here. He married here; his children were born here. All of his financial interests are and have been in this country. He demonstrated his patriotism in the best way that men may demonstrate that feeling by periling his life and shedding his blood upon the field of battle that the national unity might be preserved. Mr. White swears distinctly and absolutely that in 1865 he appeared in the court of common pleas of Allen County, Indiana, with his witnesses; that he proved his good disposition toward the Constitution and the laws and his right to citizenship by two credible witnesses; that he took the oath of renunciation and allegiance, and that he received from the court his certificate of naturalization.

There is no uncertainty about his testimony. It is clear, distinct, and unequivocal. The circumstances are given, the reasons for taking out the papers at the time.

This testimony must be accepted as conclusive, or it must be rejected altogether. You must either accept it or hold that Mr. White has been successfully impeached in one of the methods of impeachment recognized in the law. He either lies or he has told the truth. He either commits perjury or he was naturalized. There is no escaping that. He proves by a man of eminent character, Mr. Jenkinson, substantially the same facts, and in a way that makes Jenkinson a perjurer, unless Mr. White was naturalized. He confirms his own and Mr. Jenkinson's testimony by that of Mr. Pratt, ex-sheriff of Allen County, and sheriff at the time of naturalization.

And what is offered in opposition? Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Lowry had known for weeks that there was no record remaining in this court of Mr. White's naturalization—notwithstanding that Bell had known that fact—it was kept back until five days before the election, after every weekly paper supporting Mr. White had gone to press and to the country. And then Mr. White is telegraphed for, is brought back from his campaign, and Bell and Moynihan confront him, spread around him the meshes of the net prepared for him, and make the charge that he is not a citizen. He says, "I am a citizen; I was duly naturalized; Jenkinson was with me when I was naturalized." That is the material fact. Bell says he fixed the time in 1857 or 1858, but Bell conveniently forgot the important part of that conversation, that Jenkinson was present. Moynihan recollects this and Bell forgets it, and both may have mistaken the reference to 1858.

There happened to be two other witnesses to that conversation, White and his son, but both give a version different from the version given of it by Bell and Moynihan, the two men who had brought him back from his campaign in the district on the eve of the election with a view to demoralizing his lines and securing to Mr. Lowry the election. These witnesses seem to have been ignored by the majority. What is the object of the testimony produced? It is simply to impeach Mr. White. That is all. There was a legitimate way to impeach him. There were thousands of people in the Twelfth district of Indiana that knew whether he had a reputation for truth and veracity or not. They are not called here—not one of them—to discredit Mr. White, or to say aught against his integrity as a man or his truthfulness as a witness. Why, sir, in view of the fact that in a district with 3,000 against him politically, 2,500 men who did not agree with him politically have testified to the good character that he had built up in more than thirty years' residence among them, that sort of criticism is the criticism made by the criminal lawyer trying to save the neck of a guilty client, and not the legitimate criticism of a lawyer intending to elucidate the truth. Nor has it any bearing on this case according to the laws and rules of evidence.

Leaving that point, I come now to the record. Here are one hundred and fifty cases in which the only record is a duplicate certificate of naturalization; but each of those one hundred and fifty copies declares that the record of that case is in a certain book; and when you turn to the book there is no record there. Therefore the recital of a record is a falsehood.

There is upon that record a case where a naturalization was made in 1851 and the record made in 1865. The record does not include any of the cases where there was no record at all. In three different cases it has been proved there was no record—not the scratch of a pen. In Sardinghausen's case Mr. Lowry himself testifies that he examined all the books in the case and there was no scratch of a pen; nothing to show that any naturalization had taken place, and when Sardinghausen's attention is called to it, and his certificate of naturalization is delivered to Bell, this same Bell in the course of two days comes back from that same court with this same clerk, bringing a certified copy of the record. This undisputed fact speaks for itself and for the unreliability of the record either in what is put in or what has been left out.

Read the memoranda in the testimony of the clerk, and you find that this record is sometimes false, more often faulty, frequently without anything upon the record to show the case; forged decrees of divorce; records made years after the action purporting to have been taken; records of naturalization made at times when no court was in session; and all by this deputy clerk, Nelson, and yet it is seriously claimed that such a record or absence of record impeaches Mr. White. I leave that part of the case because I have not time to discuss the evidence. I propose to discuss the law of the case.

Mr. Speaker, we are a part of the legislative branch of this Government. There is a judicial branch; there is an executive branch. We are passing upon a statute passed by Congress and approved by the President. I ask gentlemen whether they will accept the interpretation of that statute from the judicial branch of this Government or whether they will go down into a State court and let the decision of such a court overrule the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

I undertake to say that the Supreme Court of the United States has absolutely, positively, and without possible question, decided that the certificate of naturalization, whether there remain a record or not, is conclusive proof of such naturalization, not to be attacked collaterally at any time or place. That being true, it ought to be an end of the discussion so far as the law is concerned, and there is no need to invoke the plenary powers of the House on this question of eligibility to prevent this great wrong, seemingly attempted in this contest.

There is a principle of law that universal acceptance is persuasive of what the law is. From 1795, when this naturalization law first went into force, down to the present day it has been the almost universal custom of all courts to issue to the applicant for naturalization a certificate of naturalization, under the seal of the court, as his commission of citizenship, reciting the facts that proof of residence, good character and disposition was made, that the oath of renunciation and allegiance was taken. Now, I call attention to the fact that you may hunt the statutes through from beginning to end and you will find no syllable or letter authorizing the issue of that certificate, unless the certificate is a duplicate record of the proceeding. It is not a certified copy of the record. Nowhere in any court does it purport to be a certified copy. But it does purport to be an original certificate under the seal of the court, accepted everywhere as original, primary proof of naturalization, not because it certifies a copy of a record, but because the court has issued it as the record of a fact. Passports have been granted for ninety years past upon the production of such certificates. The protection of the United States has been invoked time out of mind in the protection of foreign-born citizens, on their presenting just such a certificate. The American people would spring to arms in the twinkling of an eye if a foreign Government should, willfully and intentionally, lay violent hands upon an American citizen possessing such a certificate.

But early in the present century this question came up in the Supreme Court. A court in Virginia had decided a certificate not good naturalization. The case to which I refer is in 6 Cranch. In the court of Suffolk there is a minute of the judge upon his court docket, which says that William Currie——

Mr. CRISP. A minute?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir, a minute.

Mr. CRISP. There is no such minute here.

Mr. ROWELL. This minute or memorandum states that William Currie, a native of Scotland, who had emigrated to Virginia, took the oath. Do I need to say to the lawyers of this body that such a minute is not a record—that if such a minute were made in a common-law proceeding and execution issued upon it, the execution would be invalid. That has been decided so often that it would be almost an insult to quote law upon a question of that kind. But the Supreme Court disposes of that question. There was issued to Currie a certificate simply reciting that he had taken the oath of allegiance and renunciation. It did not recite that he had proved his residence, his good disposition, his correct character. It was simply recited in his certificate that he took the oath of allegiance and renunciation. In this case the court expressly say—it is the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court—that this certificate, copied into the record in the Supreme Court—not a record in the court below—is proof that the man was naturalized. Parol proof was heard to show that this was the kind of certificate usual in that year, that the court was in the habit of taking the requisite proof in these cases; and the Supreme Court say the oath would not have been administered if the court had not been satisfied; and so the decision of the court below was reversed, the naturalization was upheld and held good, and that, too, expressly upon the certificate—so stated in the opinion.

And so they reversed the court below. It was a question of the right of property. They appealed it as to the naturalization.

Then as late as the 91st United States, that court has used this language:

A certificate—

Mind you, a certificate—

A certificate of naturalization issues from a court of record when proper proof of residence has been made of five years, and the applicant is of the age of twenty-one years, and is of good moral character; the certificate is against all the world a judgment of citizenship, from which may follow the right to vote and to hold property. It is conclusive as such.

Now, gentlemen say the question of naturalization was not involved in the Tisdall case in 91 United States. I have noticed when lawyers find a case against them they always talk of obiter dicta. Why everything a court says, except the mere judgment for the plaintiff, or for the defendant, may be called obiter dicta. But this is a case involving the admissibility and the weight of testimony; and the court in pronouncing judgment as to the admissibility and weight of testimony went on to illustrate the law and used this language. Suppose it is obiter dicta, it is the language of great jurists speaking about matters of law, members of a court sitting on the most exalted bench in the civilized world, language to go into the law-books and receive the criticism of judges and members of the legal profession everywhere. Dicta, though it may be, it is dicta coming with such weight to this House you dare not raise a technical objection to it.

I shall not stop to read from them, but the text-books have copied this language and laid it down as law. I say the text-book writers on this question lay down the law with reference to proof of naturalization just exactly the same as I have defined it here. All of them—my time will not permit me to read from them.

I come to another case, a case over in New York, involving the validity of five or six thousand naturalization papers issued in 1868. Was there a record? No part of one; only an index-book. John Swiss, Switzerland; John Roe, witness; a date, and nothing more—in other words, an index-book. Will anybody say that is a record or any part of a record? A United States circuit judge, now an honored member of the Supreme bench, Justice Blatchford, decided the naturalization was proved on such a certificate of naturalization as the one in this case, or substantially so. And he further declares that the act of the clerk commanded by the statute is to be not only considered ministerial but merely directory; and if directory, of course everybody will acknowledge that the failure to make a record can not invalidate any naturalization.

It is an act, says the court, the applicant has nothing to do with. It is separated from the man himself. It is directory and the clerk may neglect to write it down. It does not invalidate the naturalization if the certificate is issued. Citizenship is a personal right, which, once acquired, can only be taken away by the act of the citizen himself.

Now I come to this question of record. As I said awhile ago, this certificate really was what it purports to be, an original document, issuing out of the court as a commission of citizenship. The record usually kept in the Western and Northern States, where there are a large number of people to be naturalized, is always almost exclusively another copy of the same oath without anything else on it. As suggested by my friend from Texas [Mr. MOORE], it is a blank taken out of a book of blanks—one blank torn out of a book of blanks. Another book of similar blanks filled up makes the clerk's record. What is it, then, but a duplicate record? The record was kept in the court and a duplicate record was given under the seal of the clerk to the applicant.

Do I need to quote the law that when duplicates are issued one is of as much dignity as the other, one is as much primary proof as the other?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Allow me, by way of suggestion, to refer to what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] said, that the certificate was an exemplification of the record, and inasmuch as there was no record there could be no exemplification of any record. I should like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. ROWELL. A certificate does not purport to be an exemplification of the record; it purports to be an original paper. These original certificates are held by millions of naturalized citizens in this country. They do not purport to be a certified copy or exemplification of the record, but the original paper, signed by the clerk and sealed with the seal of the court, and as the commission of absolute citizenship.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield to me for the purpose of asking him a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Can you conceive of a case in which the record of the court or any part of the record of the court is turned over to an individual to be carried by him in his pocket?

Mr. ROWELL. I can conceive of a case where a decree has been prepared, approved by the court, and the approval indorsed upon the decree. Suppose, as the attorney in the case, I had prepared the decree and obtained the approval of the court? I put it in my pocket and carry it off, and it is a record just as much as if I had left it with the clerk.

Mr. CRISP. But does not the gentleman understand that in the case to which he refers the paper belongs to the court?

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. And such papers are entered upon the minutes and are filed away in the court, and that no man is entitled to keep possession of those papers in his pocket, for they could be recovered by the court on a rule at any time?

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly; but that is an entirely different question. I am not saying whether a man ought to take away a record of that character or not; but I argue, in response to the gentleman's question, from universal custom, that the courts have so interpreted the rule and given out the records.

Now, there is a great mistake in the minds of men as to what constitutes a record. Some think that there is no record unless it is where the case is docketed, an order-book kept, an extension of a judgment upon a book—that it takes all these things to make a record. To record a proceeding is to take it down in writing. The proper place for a record is in the custody of the clerk, in order that it may be identified or certified.

But if it goes out of the custody of the clerk it is still a record. The court, in 6 Cranch, approved in 7 Cranch, and affirmed in 91 United States, have decided that this very certificate is conclusive evidence of naturalization, not to be attacked collaterally and without reference to any record, and Blatchford, justice, has decided, in the New York Coleman case, that that clause in the statute requiring the clerk to make a record of the proceeding is not a mandatory part of the statute. But now you quote West Virginia and Georgia, and the circuit court of the District of Columbia, six years before the decision in Cranch, to overturn in the House of Representatives the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and for what purpose? For the purpose of depriving the people of the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana of their chosen Representative in Congress. For the purpose of making out the man whom they have so trusted to be a liar and unworthy of credence, you have invoked a doubtful technical rule to do injustice. Everywhere the courts will invoke a technical rule to prevent robbery and injustice. Everywhere it is the boast of modern courts that they push away the cobwebs and technicalities they may find coming between them and the doing of equal and exact justice, unless the technicalities are so thoroughly imbedded in the law as to compel obedience or legislative correction.

But this American House of Representatives, invoking a technicality upon this question of evidence, undertakes to defeat justice and seeks to deprive the Twelfth district of Indiana of its Representative and the people of their choice, and this Representative of the seat to which he was duly elected. And that technicality stands repudiated by the court created to interpret United States statutes—a court whose interpretation is authoritative—a court vested with power to review an appeal and overrule the decisions of the very courts you rely upon in this very class of cases.

He is to be punished for the negligence of a ministerial officer, a clerk of the court in Allen County, whose pigeon tracks are all over that record in forgery and fraud. I repeat it, all over it in forgery and fraud.

This is your impeaching evidence; this is the record which is to make Mr. White a liar. It is on a par with your claim that taking out the papers a second time tends to prove that they were not taken out a first time, in the face of the fact that Mr. White then and there declared that they were his third papers.

In the great city of Chicago there are 30,000 voters just in the condition of this man, with every record of every court burned, the clerks of the courts dead, their own houses burned almost before they could escape from them, the papers all burnt up, and I pledge you that not one of them ever saw a record so as to be able to testify to its existence. More than one member of this body, many hundreds of men occupying high positions in the American Government, are precisely in the condition of this contestee, and yet you say it is dangerous to invoke parol testimony. Why, Mr. Speaker, you hang a man on parol testimony.

Is it more dangerous to invoke parol testimony to establish a fact of this character to sustain and vindicate the popular will than it is to hang a man? You supply most solemn records, when they are destroyed, upon parol testimony. You prove the contents of the most important documents, when lost or destroyed, upon parol testimony. It is necessary in all human affairs so to do, to prevent injustice and wrong, and, although witnesses may sometimes speak falsehood, and writings may sometimes be forged, yet the courts will continue to adjudicate cases and ascertain facts under these rules of evidence, even if this House should determine that foreign-born citizens are not entitled to the benefit of such evidence when they happen to be popular enough to secure an election to this body.

Why it is said that Mr. Pratt, one of the witnesses in behalf of the contestee out there in Indiana, is not to be believed, because he did not work for and support Mr. Lowry at that election, but was a strong supporter of the contestee. If that be true, sir, there are more than 2,500 able-bodied Democratic liars in that district who did the same thing. [Laughter and applause.]

It is said that Mr. Jenkinson is not to be believed because he is sixty years old, and that, therefore, he can not remember the circumstances of twenty years ago. I tell you, gentlemen, there is no pretense to impeach the testimony of Mr. Jenkinson except on account of his age; and if he be impeached on that ground there are a great many men around me here who are in the same situation, and on that account are in danger of being discredited. There is no other reason for discrediting him, except they say he was in very bad company. [Laughter.]

He was with White at the time he took out his papers, and, like "poor dog Tray," is to be kicked out and punished because he was in bad company, and his testimony is to be characterized as perjury.

Now, sir, in the time that I reserved for myself I have had thus hurriedly to examine these questions. I want to say a word in answer to a statement that you have not any proof of the contents of the paper, and that the testimony given by the contestee, showing his recollection to be unreliable, is such that you can not believe him. Does anybody doubt, when we produce the kind of certificates issued in that court, and he swears he got his naturalization papers, that that is the kind of naturalization certificate he got?

Are you raising that sort of a technical objection to the proof of the contents of the certificate? What proves to the moral sense, what carries with it conviction, is conclusive evidence——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Are you not assuming that this clerk, whom you have attacked as unworthy of credence, did in this case issue the proper paper to this man?

Mr. ROWELL. I am; because it is in proof that was the only kind issued; because had he not issued the proper paper he would have been caught in the act. Nor am I assuming that this clerk intentionally left this off the record. Here are twenty or thirty cases out of the one hundred and fifty where in the record of the oath there is a failure to fill up the blank certificate at the end of it. Making out a certificate of naturalization, or making a memorandum on a piece of paper to take with him to court, he loses it, forgets it, and it fails to go on record. And all foreign-born citizens are to be told, "If you did not see to it that the clerk put down what was exactly right you shall not occupy a seat in Congress if the partiality of your people has elected you to it."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You said he would have been detected if he had not issued the right kind of a certificate. Will you point to the testimony of any witness who read that paper or saw it?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Would it have made the least difference if the clerk had issued the wrong papers?

Mr. ROWELL. Not one single bit. If the clerk had perpetrated a fraud—and the question of my friend from Ohio is on a par with the technicalities erected in this House for the purpose of turning a foreign-born citizen out—would he not have been detected? Would a clerk be likely to issue a false certificate into the hands of a man and take the chances of being detected? However such technicalities may appear to the mind of my friend from Ohio, whom I honor very much, I think that kind of argument does not strike the intelligent critic of evidence as being very weighty in overthrowing moral proof. It is on a par with attempting to criticise what a man says on the stump.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say I only suggested it to correct a presumption; I was putting one presumption against another.

Mr. ROWELL. The presumption that a clerk issued a certificate purporting to be a naturalization certificate into the hands of an intelligent man implies that he did not try to palm off a bad certificate upon him. And yet you ask me to point to the evidence that anybody read this certificate. I have heard judges remark that courts are presumed to know something when attorneys insisted upon proving things of common knowledge. I shall presume that the members of the House know something, and will take it for granted that the clerk did not palm off a fraud upon Mr. White in place of a proper naturalization certificate.

They say that Mr. White is not worthy of credence. He is impeached for something he said on the stump. Now just stop, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, at that point. If we all have got to have the brand of liars put upon our brows because we sometimes make a mistake in what we say on the stump, how many here who talk at all would go out of this House with the brand of liar written all across their foreheads! [Laughter and applause.]

That is on a par with all the criticisms which have been made. Ah! they talk about Spencer's evidence. Spencer is called in the last ten days, when the mouth of White and the mouths of his witnesses have been sealed; when no question as to language, time, and place has been put to him; and then Spencer comes in and undertakes to recount testimony that my friend from Ohio, sitting on the bench, would not have permitted had a litigant attempted to bring it into court as impeaching testimony. And yet it seems to be the monument raised up here for men to look at. What for? To impeach Mr. White; to impeach the man that in the Twelfth district of Indiana, where he had lived for thirty long years and done business, was elected by 2,500 majority by Democrats and Republicans alike; where he took over at least 2,500 Democratic votes—the best Democrats in the district.

That is the kind of man whom you seek to impeach by saying he declared on the stump that he had his papers, when within three or four days of the election this was suddenly sprung upon him, "You are going to be charged with not being naturalized; the voters are to be prevented from voting for you; and a placard is to be posted at every poll in the district for the purpose of breaking down your lines, driving off your friends, and so securing the popular vote for the man the people do not desire to elect." He undertakes to stem the tide, to rearrange his lines; and what does he say? "I am a citizen of the United States." Oh, it is said he ought to have fallen into the pit dug for him; like the silly fly he ought to have walked into the web of the spider.

Under what obligation was he to go into details with the enemy who had concocted a plot and kept it secret until it was too late for him to answer? Mr. Speaker, I can not believe, I shall not believe unless compelled, that gentlemen who have been deemed worthy of a seat in this exalted body, worthy to represent the American people in making its laws, are so regardless of the rights of citizenship, so regardless of the voice of the people, so regardless of the protection due to the thousands upon thousands of naturalized citizens of this land, that they are going to erect this barrier against Mr. White in his claim to retain his seat. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I occupied?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied forty-two minutes. He has four minutes remaining.

Mr. ROWELL. Just a word more; this is important. It is important to all of us.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. How do you account for the loss of Mr. White's second papers?

Mr. ROWELL. Oh, I can not stop now to talk about that. His store, full of oil, was burned up, and the employés had to run for their lives. Perhaps that accounts for it; I do not know. I had a commission in the Army; I can not find it; I looked for it last fall and could not find it. I guess I had a marriage certificate. Under the laws of Illinois, if I want to get married I have to go to the county clerk and prove to him that I and my intended are competent to enter into the marriage contract, and get a license. I have to present that to one qualified to perform the marriage ceremony and he must return it and the clerk must record it. Suppose that in returning it should get lost in the mails; suppose a clerk, like the one in this case, should be careless, are my children to be bastardized and is my estate to be confiscated because of the negligence of that clerk? And are the naturalized citizens of the United States, when a Chicago fire occurs, when losses happen, when clerks are careless, are they to be debarred of that right of right, the right to be citizens of this Republic? I will not believe it. It can not be done. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the speeches which have been contributed to this discussion by both sides of this House. I have read with great interest the speeches which were delivered at the session of this House last Thursday, and I think it but fair to the side with which I am affiliated, to state at this stage of the proceedings the conclusion which I have reached.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that in discussing a question of great public policy, one that involves the sovereignty of the people, we are not bound by the technical rules which have been prescribed for the determination of disputes between citizens when they are compelled to submit their contentions to tribunals organized for the purposes of settling them. We are here, as I take it, on a broader basis. We have to inquire, in the first instance, whether the people of this district in Indiana have lawfully expressed their choice. Now, the only question in dispute is that which goes to the qualifications of the sitting member, under the laws and Constitution of this country, to occupy the seat to which he was undoubtedly elected; and the objection which has been advanced to his claim is one which, in my judgment, turns upon a question of fact.

I do not believe that there is any fair question of law before this House. I do not regard a record as anything but the proof of a judgment. The judgment is the act of the court, which stands independent of anything that a clerk may do or fail to do. Now, there is no record of what this court has done. We are therefore driven to inquire into the facts of the transaction, and Captain White stands before this House declaring upon his oath that in 1865 he attended before a court in this county in Indiana where his naturalization is said to have taken place, accompanied by witnesses; that he complied with all the requirements of the law, and that a certificate of naturalization was issued to him by a competent authority. Holding the views that I do of the record, there is nothing left for me to decide but whether I will believe the statement which is made by Captain White under the solemnity of an oath, and which is corroborated by a character against which not one word has been uttered in the course of this debate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we claim to represent popular sovereignty in the fullest meaning of the term. To our party belongs the mission of extending to its utmost limits the power of the people at the ballot-box, and so far as the people of the Twelfth district of Indiana could speak, they have declared their wish, their will, their command that Captain White shall be their Representative throughout all the sessions of the Fiftieth Congress. [Renewed applause.]

Against this command of the people, against this decision, solemnly recorded at the ballot-box, we have a number of circumstances advanced by the Committee on Elections which it is asserted form in law a reason why the decision of the people should be reversed.

I for my part accept the statement which has been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL]. I believe that either Captain White was naturalized in Indiana or he has committed perjury. I believe that he is a duly qualified member of this House of Representatives, or else his place is at the bar of a criminal court to answer an indictment for crime.

Holding that view, Mr. Speaker, to what circumstances must the mind be directed in order to ascertain the legitimate course for a member of this body to pursue under the solemn obligations of his oath of office? He must look to the character of the person upon whose statement he proposes to base his action. This man comes here with thirty years of honorable life to give weight to his statements. He comes here with a history which is a part of the history of this country. He has held high and important offices. He has discharged all the duties of citizenship. He has shed his blood for his country. [Applause.] And now my voice will not cast a vote which will make the wounds he received in honorable service bleed afresh by reason of the ingratitude of his fellow-citizens. It will rather be my pride, as I hope it will be in my power, to cast a vote which will show that he who risks his life in defense of this land merits and receives a reward which will serve him like an armor invulnerable to the shafts of the enemy when in any crisis of his career he has to place his character in the balance against those who would impugn his integrity. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in what I say I but express my own loyalty to the laws. I do not believe that the political effect of this vote would sway a single member on this side of the House so far from his sense of obligation to his conscience as to cause him to cast a vote with a view merely to its political effect in the future. But if such a suggestion enters the mind of any Democrat here, let me say to him that the best way to avoid any possible influence which the decision of this case may have upon a Presidential election, is to so comport ourselves in the discharge of our duties that no Presidential election will ever come into this House, but that the votes of the people will decide in favor of that party which I believe is pledged to every system of good government that ought to win the confidence of the electors. [Applause.]

Believing as I do, while there floats over my head that flag which Captain White and his comrades have kept aloft in the breeze over every part of this country, extending the power of Congress to every section of the Union—while I thus feel grateful to the heroes who preserved that power intact and who cemented with their blood this Union under which we live, I shall not cast a vote which I would regard as treason to my constituency and which would pronounce a soldier of the Union guilty of perjury and unworthy of association with honorable men. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. What disposition does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] propose to make of the remainder of the hour?

Mr. ROWELL. How much of the hour remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seven minutes.

Mr. ROWELL. I yield that time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, when I read the report and the briefs in this case, they led me to doubt the conclusion of the majority of the committee; but on account of the great respect which I have not only for the legal ability but for the honesty and impartiality of that majority, I reread and reconsidered this case to see if my first impression was not wrong. But a reconsideration has not changed my conclusion. A conclusion of this kind, Mr. Speaker, of course, ends for any member of this House all discussion. We sit here as judges, and we are not honest men if we do not vote as we believe, irrespective of any party consideration whatever. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to give in a very few minutes (for I have but a few) the reasons which have led me to the conclusion at which I have arrived. There are two questions here—one of fact and one of law. The question of fact is, did the contestee in this case go before a court of record and make the proofs which the statute required him to make in order to become a citizen of the United States? Secondly, the question of law is, if he did this, the record being wanting, is it competent to prove the fact by parol? As to the first, the question of fact, I have carefully considered the evidence in the case, and to me it seems to be satisfactory that the contestee went before the proper court and made the requisite proof and took the oaths required. Let me add that in reaching this conclusion I have proceeded upon the principle that when a man has received a majority of all the votes cast in his district, every presumption not absolutely unreasonable must be entertained in his favor. We have no right to unseat a man who has been sent here by the majority vote of his constituency unless some rule of law stands in the way and is conclusive against him.

I merely repeat what has been before said when I remark that either Mr. White is a perjurer and his two witnesses are perjurers, or else he went to the proper court and made the requisite proofs in order to secure the rights of citizenship. Mr. Speaker, when I turn to the testimony of those who attempt to contradict him I am but the more confirmed in the belief that he did this; for though this matter was sprung upon him but two or three days before the election and without any notice in advance, he at once said, "I have my naturalization papers; I am a citizen." There was no hesitancy—no dodging of the issue. When it is suggested to him, "You must not only have your first papers, but your second papers," he says, "I know that; and I have them." When it was stated to him, "The records of the court show the issue of no papers to you; may you not have obtained them elsewhere?" does he like a dishonest man try to catch at this straw? No; he says, "I obtained all my papers in this county," though he knew that the records could be examined at once. Those are not the words of a man who did not believe what he said. This man knows just what the facts are; he does not forget—he can not forget. The facts, therefore, I think are clearly in his favor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come to the legal question, and if there is anything settled by the court which has the right to settle the law absolutely and finally, it is settled that the thing which this man did constituted him a citizen. Let it be borne in mind, this man says that when he went before the court with his witnesses and made the requisite oaths, he got his certificate of naturalization. There are hundreds in this room who know the steps taken on such an occasion, and they know that the rule is uniform that the certificate of naturalization is given when the proofs are made and the oaths taken.

Some one has suggested here, as a reason why we should unseat the contestee, that there is no definite proof of the form of the certificate which he received. I see no force in this objection; I have seen hundreds, I think I might say truthfully thousands, of those certificates of naturalization issued and I have had reason to examine some of them; but if I were asked, especially if the question were sprung upon me suddenly, I could not answer specifically, nor could I, after time to reflect, give the very terms or words of them. How many here could give the precise form of their title deeds? They could readily answer that they had a deed in the usual form, just as the contestee has sworn that he received a certificate in the usual form, but beyond that they could not go. Had the contestee been more particular and positive in his statement as to the very form of his certificate he would only have cast a doubt on his veracity and have given ground to suspect that he was drawing on his imagination for his facts.

We all know that the certificates issued on such occasions are essentially alike, and no one here has doubted, nor does it admit of doubt, but that such a certificate issued to the person naturalized after he has, on his part, complied with the statute, is all that is required to confer on him and prove citizenship. The contestee has sworn positively that he did, as is the usual if not the uniform rule in such cases, receive such a certificate, and that it is lost. The case of Campbell vs. Gordon (6 Cranch, 176) as has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] is, therefore, on all fours with this.

The facts in that case are as follows: A citizen of Virginia died intestate, without issue, leaving a landed estate in Virginia. His brother, who, like this contestee, was a native of Scotland, having removed to this country, and became, as he alleged, naturalized, died, leaving a daughter; she claimed the land by descent from her uncle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I do not wish, unnecessarily, Mr. Speaker, to trespass upon the time of the House, and I will therefore only state this single point. [Cries of "Go on!"] If her father had been naturalized she inherited the estate; if not, it had escheated, and the question involved in her case was the validity of her title, and that was conceded to be valid if her father had been legally naturalized; his naturalization was, therefore, the single question in the case.

The record in that case shows that a certificate of naturalization had been issued to her father in essentially the same form of the certificate issued to the contestee in this case, and in that case there was no other record. It is true there were certain memoranda made by the clerk, in these words: "At a district court held at Suffolk, October 14, 1795, William Currie, native of Scotland, migrated into the Commonwealth, took the oath, etc." This is not a record of naturalization; indeed, it is not a record at all, or in the nature of a record.

It is merely a memorandum made by the clerk for his own convenience. The only record there was in that case was the certificate in substantially the same form of the certificate in this case, and the court held that the evidence established the fact of naturalization. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Washington, Chief-Justice Marshall and the other members of the court concurring.

It is true that in the case cited the certificate issued by the clerk to the person naturalized was produced in court, whereas in this case it is not produced; but the contestee has accounted for its non-production and has proven its loss. And no lawyer or intelligent layman would doubt but that it is legally competent to show by parol the existence of a record and its loss or destruction, and when that is proven it is competent to show its contents by parol. The case cited and this case are, therefore, not distinguishable; for the existence, the loss, and the contents of the certificate being proven, as a matter of evidence the parol proof of the contents has the same probative force as the certificate would have had if presented.

Let me read briefly from their opinion:

> In support of the first objection it is contended, that although the oath prescribed by the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject," passed the 29th of January, 1795, was administered to said William Currie by a court of competent jurisdiction, still it does not appear, by the certificate granted to him by the court, and appearing in the record, that he was, by the judgment of the court, admitted a citizen, or that the court was satisfied that, during the term of two years, mentioned in the same section, he had behaved as a man of good character, attached to the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.
> It is true that this requisite to his admission is not stated in the certificate; but it is the opinion of this court, that the court of Suffolk must have been satisfied as to the character of the applicant, or otherwise a certificate, that the oath prescribed by law had been taken would not have been granted.
> It is unnecessary to decide whether, in the order of time, this satisfaction, as to the character of the applicant, must be first given, or whether it may not be required after the oath is administered, and, if not then given, whether a certificate of naturalization may not be withheld. But if the oath be administered, and nothing appears to the contrary, it must be presumed that the court, before whom the oath was taken, was satisfied as to the character of the applicant. The oath, when taken, confers upon him the rights of a citizen, and amounts to a judgment of the court for his admission to those rights. It is, therefore, the unanimous opinion of the court that William Currie was duly naturalized.

Now, the court must have been satisfied. Why? Because by the parol evidence received it was proved that the man had been naturalized.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, if my time will permit.

Mr. CRISP. Where do you get the idea that it is based on the position that the record was proved by parol evidence? There is no parol evidence in it. He infers from the fact that he did take the oath that he did everything else preliminary to the taking of the oath.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Let me answer the question of the chairman of the committee from the book itself. The report shows that parol evidence was given, that was one of the errors complained of, and every lawyer knows that when you take memoranda like these and supplement them by parol, so as to show a judgment, it is all parol. For if, as you claim, you can not show what the judgment was by parol, then it follows that you can not add one iota to it by parol.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us look for a moment at the consequences of the action here proposed. In portions of the country perhaps more than half the people are of foreign birth. Shall we say here, by our action on this case, that a mistake of a clerical officer of any one of our courts, over whose actions they have no control and for whose errors they are not responsible, may disfranchise them, may make their actions, which would otherwise be patriotic and legal, unpatriotic and criminal? Such action on our part would justly alarm hundreds of thousands of people.

I can never assent to a position which would make the rights of so many people dependent on either the intelligence, the honesty, the vigilance, or the accuracy of a mere clerical officer. It gives me pleasure to believe—I think I may safely say know—that such is not the law of our country. If I did not feel sure that it is not, I should, at the earliest possible moment, introduce a bill to change the law.

In what position would we place the contestee by such a vote?

If he was in a court of law, an error in the record could be corrected so as to prevent injustice, nunc pro tunc; or, if he was in a court of equity, that court would act on its maxim that that should be considered as done which ought to be done, and as such an error ought to be corrected, and the proper entry made, the court would consider it as made.

But here, in the House of Representatives of the United States, which should in such cases be guided by the broadest principles of equity, the vote we are asked to give would deprive the contestee of the rights which he would be entitled to either in law or equity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CRISP. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted to me, as a member of this committee, I propose to take the position, and attempt to demonstrate it to every fair-minded man on the floor of this House, without being committed (as gentlemen in favor of the contestee seem to desire to commit all of us favoring the report of the committee) to the proposition that the contestee was guilty of perjury—I propose to maintain that the evidence upon which this claim is set up, that he was naturalized on the 28th day of February, 1865, is insufficient because it is contradictory and destructive of itself.

In considering this case I was not actuated by the question as to whether there were many foreign-born citizens in my district, nor whether there were many soldiers in my district. I esteem both of these classes of my fellow-citizens as I would be esteemed by them. I was appointed a member of this committee by the action of this House, not of my choice. I remember that upon the threshold of my membership I took the solemn oath to sustain the Constitution of the United States; and with the recollection of that oath upon my lips I came to consider this case and all of the difficult questions, either of law or of fact, involved therein in the spirit of such judicial fairness as they ought to command. But at the same time I came to consider it with the sympathy and feelings akin to those which were manifested by many members on the floor of the House but a few moments ago when the fact was alluded to that this contestee had shed his blood for the preservation of the Constitution. Of what value is that Constitution to us, of what value is it that men shall shed their blood for its preservation, unless it be preserved in the purity of its provisions without regard to conditions, or policies, or parties?

All provisions of the law favoring the naturalization of aliens who were soldiers are to be heartily approved. But those provisions do not apply to this case. The law does not go so far as to make such soldiers citizens without having complied with its plain requirements.

I do not forget, sir, that upon one occasion a battle-scarred veteran of three wars was elected to this House as a member, backed by a majority three times as large as that of this contestee, and by that party over there he was sent back and his district turned over to his opponent. I allude to the case of the gallant General Shields, when he came here as a Representative from the State of Missouri. [Applause.]

I remember, also, that upon a former occasion, at an earlier day, when he was elected to the United States Senate from the State of Illinois, he was virtually sent back to the people by the Senate; because at that time he had not yet been naturalized. I remember that the records show that Albert Gallatin, who was here at the birth of the Republic, was deprived of his seat on the same ground.

Mr. GUENTHER. Did General Shields ever claim that he was naturalized?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He did not claim it upon the first occasion of which I speak, and upon the record was not sent back on that ground. He was sent back because your party had a majority in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CONGER. And that is the reason you are going to deprive White of his seat, is it?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. Is that the reason you propose to send this man back?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, sir.

I shall continue my argument now, Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen will permit.

The testimony does not show that the contestee in this case ever appeared in a court of record and was naturalized.

Mr. LONG. Is not the fact shown that he was naturalized?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, sir; it is not shown that he was naturalized, except as to the fact of naturalization in a county outside of his district and but the day before he was elected; and that naturalization is not according to the requirements of the Constitution, which provides that he shall have been a naturalized citizen for seven years prior to his becoming a Representative in Congress.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman pardon me for interrupting him?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can yield for no more questions, as I have but twenty minutes.

Let us look at the circumstances of this case; let us look at the conduct of the contestee in this matter. Let us do it intellectually, without any criticism or insinuation against his moral character.

Three days before the election came on, two gentlemen came to him and said, "We understand you have not been naturalized." What was his answer? Gentlemen say we must believe his testimony. Now I read from his testimony as to what he said on that occasion:

I said that was all nonsense; that I had been naturalized years ago; that I took part in the Frémont campaign and was an earnest worker for Frémont, believing like other young men that the salvation of the country depended on his election, and I was very enthusiastic and voted for him.

Let us now consider carefully the testimony of these two gentlemen on this point.

MR. BELL'S TESTIMONY.

Page 155:

"You say you took them out in 1857 or 1858. May you not have taken out the other papers in Kosciusko County?" He said, "No, sir; I did not. I took them out here." Then I said, "Before you did that in 1857 or 1858, you must have declared your intention at least two years before." He said, "Yes, I did; I am not mistaken about that. I took them out in order to vote for Frémont. I was young then, just a boy. It was in the days of border ruffianism, and I supposed that unless Frémont was elected the country was gone to the dogs, and I am not mistaken about that. I took out my papers in order to vote for Frémont, and all I took out were taken out here in this county."

MR. MOYNIHAN'S TESTIMONY.

On the 28th I had such an interview with Captain White, in company with Mr. Bell. We related to him the information given to us, that he was not a fully naturalized citizen. We misunderstood the proposition as first given us, understanding it that he had taken his first papers in Kosciusko County, and we put it to him in that way. He replied that he had never taken any papers in Kosciusko County. We then questioned him as to his taking out papers of naturalization. He replied that along about 1856 or 1857 he had taken out papers. He said that he believed Mr. Jenkinson was clerk. Mr. Chittenden, he understood, was in the office. I wish to say, rather, that Mr Jenkinson was in the office with him or accompanied him to the office either in the capacity of a friend or attorney. We asked him if he recalled having taken out two separate papers, explaining to him the necessity of such a procedure. He said that he had not or could not recall any occasion for taking out papers other than those referred to, about 1856 or '57, urging at the same time that he took the papers out then in order to vote for Frémont, candidate for President, saying that there was considerable feeling, that he was a young man and there was some belief then that unless Frémont was elected the country, to use his own expression, would go to the dogs, and border ruffianism would be upon us. He said that he had not paid much attention to papers at that time, being, to use his own expression, a young buck, full of life, and looking only to the immediate surroundings. We asked him if at any time in going to Europe or abroad he could recall having taken naturalization papers outside of Allen County, and he said he did not; that he took no papers outside of Allen County.

6. Q. Mr. Moynihan, did you, as city editor of the Sentinel, in so far as you did publish the item referred to as Exhibit G, make a true and conscientious report of what you said to White, of what Mr. Bell said to White, and of what Captain White replied to you?

A. I took notes of the dates and main facts and drift of the conversation between us. I did not write this first article; it was written by Mr. Bell. Afterwards, in referring to his eligibility, I did make use of my information in the editorial columns, and to the best of my knowledge and belief this article marked Exhibit G is a true and fair exposition of the conversation and interview had with Captain White.

7. Q. Did you, in Exhibit G, publish any statement as having been made by Mr. Bell or yourself or by Mr. White to you or to Mr. Bell in the conversation referred to that was not made?

A. To the best of my knowledge and belief there was nothing here in the article marked Exhibit G but what is a fair and just outline of the conversation and interview had with Captain White.

Q. 8. Is it substantially what was said between you?

A. It is.

Why did this gentleman revert to the Frémont campaign, if he did not intend to be understood then that he was naturalized in 1858?

Here follows part of the article alluded to by Mr. Moynihan:

Not desiring to do Captain White an injustice, a reporter of the Sentinel sought an interview with him to-day before publishing the facts, in order to ascertain whether he had any papers in his possession to show that he had been naturalized. He promptly said that he had not. It is due to him to say that he asserted that he felt sure that he had taken out the necessary papers. That it was done in this county and not in Kosciusko, where he had once lived, and where the records have also been carefully searched. At the time of the interview the reporter had understood that the declaration of intention was made in that county. This was an error on his part. Captain White asserted that he had taken out final papers in 1857 or 1858, and that his first papers were taken out so that he could vote for Frémont in 1856. The records show that in this he was mistaken. He did not apply for his first papers until 1858, two years after Frémont ran. So if he voted for Frémont he did so illegally. Neither could he have taken out final papers in 1857 or 1858, because that could not be done until two years had elapsed after taking first papers.

It is altogether certain that Captain White, like thousands of others, only took out his first papers, and as these allowed him to vote, paid no attention to and neglected full naturalization.

The captain doubtless remembers taking out his first papers, and that is all he did. He stated very frankly that it was a matter that he had not thought of nor given any attention.

There are suggestions of the solution of Mr. White's unexplained and unexplainable course that do not involve him in perjury or any other evil conduct.

That is his first position. That is equivalent to his saying to these men, "I had made my declaration of intention before 1856, the year of the Presidential election." That can not be questioned. Then what does he say? He goes on to say that he took out his second papers in 1857 or 1858. There is his own testimony and there is not any question about it. It is corroborated by Moynihan; it is corroborated by Bell; it is corroborated by his son. He made that statement or the equivalent of that statement that he voted for Frémont and took out his other papers in 1857 or 1858.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the contestee admit that before the committee?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is his testimony, his deposition as it appears in the record. Immediately there was a consultation of his friends held. Lawyers were called in; politicians were called in. He had gone to his home and made a search for this certificate and he states that he did not find it; that he did not find his marriage certificate; that he did not find his honorable discharge. Let me say to you that no man can find in the record any statement that those papers were together with his naturalization papers. He says himself that he does not recollect whether he sent home his honorable discharge or not.

But then what occurred? When this consultation was held did he at any time say to any of his friends that he was naturalized in 1865? No; not once. Did he send any one to the court to see if the record would show that he was naturalized in 1865? No; he made publications in the paper and asserted that he was a citizen because he was a soldier. He did not at any time or place in the presence of any witness brought here say anything at all about 1865 until he did so on the stand in March of the year following.

Gentlemen on the other side say, "What about it if he did make a mistake at that time?" There was not any mistake. He said, "I voted for Frémont." He might as well have said, "I declared my intention prior to that election, or else I committed a crime against this country. I voted for Frémont; I took out all my necessary papers in 1857 or 1858."

Now with those facts staring us in the face we are led to consider the evidence which shows or tends to show his intention to create the impression that he did take out naturalization papers in 1865.

I have here the excerpts I have made from the record, which I shall not stop to read, and in printing them I shall not put in a word which does not occur in the record.

MR. WHITE AS TO DATE OF NATURALIZATION.

"A. Resigned that position in 1864 at Atlanta, Ga., and came home the following December of that year; remained at home until the latter part of February, 1865; I then started for Europe, and early in March, being in New York for that purpose, received a telegram to come home, that my wife was very ill; I did come home; remained with my wife."

"A. In the year 1865, in the latter part of February, about the 28th day of that month, I had determined to make a trip to Europe, and had talked with some of my friends in relation to it, amongst them Mr. John Brown, who advised me before doing so to take out my second papers in order to get a passport. I went with Mr. John Brown, accompanied with Mr. Alexander Muirhead, for that purpose. I told them to go to the court-house, and I would get the Hon. Isaac Jenkinson as my other witness. I went there with Mr. Jenkinson, and Mr. Chittenden was there in the court-house, and Mr. David H. Colerick was there. Judge Borden was in the court, on the bench, and I told him I wanted to get my second papers. He asked who my witnesses were. I said they were here. Mr. John Brown and Mr. Jenkinson were then sworn as my witnesses. I then took the oath so prescribed for that purpose, to become a citizen of the United States. It was in the court of common pleas. The oath of allegiance was administered to me in open court by Judge Borden, the then presiding judge of the court of common pleas. The principal fact in connection therewith was the fact that I was going to Europe."

INTERVIEW WITH MR. BELL, IN MOYNIHAN'S PRESENCE.

Page 230:

"Our people claim you are not a naturalized citizen of this country, and as such are not eligible for a seat in Congress." I said that was all nonsense; I had been naturalized years ago; that I took part in the Frémont campaign, and was an earnest worker for Frémont, believing, like other young men, that the salvation of the country depended on his election, and I was very enthusiastic and voted for him; that I remembered very well of taking out my first papers in the little brick on the corner of Main and Calhoun streets, then the clerk's office, and that Chittenden was then in office; and the next time, I said when I took out my second papers, Jenkinson was one of my witnesses. Mr. Bell then said, "That can't be so, surely, for the records have been gone over carefully, page by page, not relying on the index, and there is no record of your papers." I said, in reply, "I could not help that; that I did not keep the records, but that I had all my necessary papers."

As to the time and year in which you took out your final papers?

A. Neither the time nor year was spoken of in either case as to when I took out my first or second papers. I claimed then in that interview, as I have done ever since, that I had taken out all my necessary papers; that it was done in Allen County, and not in Kosciusko County.

29. Q. Did or did you not say in that interview to Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan that you had taken out all your necessary papers?

A. Yes, sir; I told them that I had taken out all my necessary papers.

Page 231:

A. No, sir; not one word was said as to the time or date in taking out either my first or second papers by me.

38. Q. Did Mr. Bell say to you that you must have taken out your first papers before that in order to vote for Frémont, and if he so stated, what reply did you make to him?

A. No, sir; Mr. Bell didn't say one word as to time in taking out my first papers or as to voting for Frémont. It was myself who said I had voted for Frémont.

MR. WHITE COUNSELING WITH FRIENDS.

Page 232:

Mr. Oppenheim spoke and advised me, as an attorney, that if I could not find them to go to Huntington County or to Kosciusko County and take out another set of papers; that he had been talking with other attorneys, and they agreed that they would do me no harm and might possibly do me good, as I might have trouble in getting the courts here to make a nunc pro tunc entry. In talking matters over a little while he left. They advised me and talked matters over, and said, "Nevertheless, that is true; yet you must go to some other county, as the courts are shut down here, and take other papers. They will not hurt you, and may do some good;" that they had not looked up nor had time to look up all the matters pertaining to the case; that in some of their minds they felt that if I took papers now they would relate back, in their judgment, to the time I took the oath when I enlisted. After a good long while's talk I said I did not like to do it, yet would be governed by their opinion, and as they said to go I would go and do so, but I hoped they would make no mistake in the matter. They said, "No trouble about that; they can't do you any harm, and when the campaign is ended there would likely be no more of it."

Page 237: PUBLICATIONS BY MR. WHITE.

I said nothing about first papers in 1858 or second papers in 1865, and I had several thousand extra copies of some of those papers circulated through the district to endeavor, if possible, to checkmate the falsehood.

Q. Now answer the question, please, as to whether, during such time between the appearance of the Sentinel article and the election, you published, or caused to be published, any statement in any of the newspapers, whether daily or not, to the effect that you had completed your naturalization, or, in other words, taken out your second papers, on an occasion when you were contemplating a voyage to Europe?

A. No, sir; I published no statement regarding my taking out my first or second papers, or that I had at any time been contemplating a trip to Europe, but I did publish a statement in all the daily papers of this city and assured the people that I was a full citizen of the United States, and that the assertion to the contrary was simply a campaign lie.

Page 188: MR. JENKINSON'S TESTIMONY.

A. I think Captain White was naturalized within one or two years after his return from the war, at Fort Wayne, and that I was present as a witness or a spectator. I am not sure which; I think I was a witness, though.

Q. 9. Please state before what court or judge such naturalization took place.

A. I am not sure; it was in the court-house at Fort Wayne, and I think before Judge Borden, but I am not sure that it was before him.

3. Q. If the contestee was naturalized at the time you say he was, please state who were the witnesses.

A. My impression is that a gentleman named John Brown and myself were the witnesses. Now, that is my impression, but it is a very strong impression. I wanted to say impression because I do not want to say positively. I might have been there as a friend of Mr. White's or something of that kind; my impression is that I was there as a witness, but I am not positive as to that; I might have been there as Captain White's friend.

Q. 4. At the time was the court in open session, transacting business?

A. My recollection is that the judge was on the bench and the court officers were there, but that there were not many others there.

Q. 5. Are you sure that Judge Borden was on the bench at the time?

A. No.

Q. 6. If Judge Borden was not presiding on the bench at the time, please state the name of the officer that was.

A. I am not sure who was judge at the time, but it was the judge of the court that was presiding, whoever that was; I can't remember who was judge at that time.

Q. 7. Was the clerk of the court present, recording the proceedings that was being transacted before the court?

A. I have no recollection now of who were and who were not present, except that it was in court at the time, and can not remember about the clerk any more than I can about the sheriff or any other officer; I only know it was in court and officers were there; it is a good long time ago.

Q. 8. Who was clerk of the court at that time?

A. I don't remember now.

Q. 9. Was this in the common pleas or in the circuit court?

A. I should think circuit court. I don't know anything about common pleas now.

Q. 10. Why do you say you don't know anything about the common pleas court now?

A. What I had in my mind was, I can't remember now just at what time the common pleas court existed. I know they were in existence at one time.

Q. 11. Are you in doubt now as to whether there was in existence at the time you speak of even a common pleas court for Allen County?

A. I don't know whether there was or not.

Q. 12. State all who were present at the time you claim the contestee was naturalized. Please do not omit any one who was present at that time and give their names.

A. Well, besides the judge and officers of the court, whom I am confident were present, there were present Captain White, John Brown, E. L. Chittenden, and myself. I don't think there were any others, except those interested in the proceeding. I can not now recall who the officers of the court were—not from recollection.

Q. 13. At what term of court did this supposed naturalization of the contestee take place?

A. That I can not tell.

Page 189:

Q. 16. Did it occur in the spring, the summer, the fall, or in the winter?
A. I can not remember that at all.

Q. 40. If E. L. Chittenden, of whom you have spoken, was present on the only occasion of the kind on which you were present, in what capacity was he acting?
A. I couldn't be sure as to what purpose he was there, as I am not sure of many of the details that occurred at that time. I am impressed with the idea that he was there.
Q. 41. Was not he acting as deputy clerk, and did he not fill out a paper that was signed and sworn to by Captain White at the time; and was not that paper simply a declaration of intention to become a citizen?
A. I can't be sure as to what capacity he was there in, if he was there. I have no recollection of any papers being filled out at that time, and there is one incident connected with the occasion which satisfies me that the purpose was not a mere declaration of intention. I have no recollection of any papers being drawn up or signed or sworn to on that occasion.

Q. 44. If there were but one occasion on which you and E. L. Chittenden were present with Captain White at the court-house when he was taking any step in regard to naturalization, and that was on the 24th July, 1858, what would you say in reference to there being still another instance of a similar character when you were present?
A. I remember no such occasion in 1858. It there were but one occasion, and if E. L. Chittenden and myself were present on that said occasion in July, 1858, I don't think I was present then on any other occasion.
Q. 63. Persons whom you speak of as being present at the time of the occurrence are all dead, are they not?
A. I don't know that they are all; I know that three of them are dead that I supposed were present; the others I can not tell about.
Q. 64. Who are the living?
A. I don't know, as I said before, who was present except the officers of the court; I don't know that any are dead but the three, and I can't name any others but Captain White and myself; I suppose all the officers of court are not dead.
Q. 65. Who were the officers of the court then present?
A. I am not sure who they were at that time.
Q. 66. What is your recollection?
A. I think Borden was judge, and I don't remember the others.
Q. 67. You don't even remember who was clerk or sheriff, or acting as such?
A. No; I do not.
Q. 68. Do you say positively that Borden was judge, and present acting as such; judge of the court of common pleas?
A. No; I do not.
Q. 69. Can you state with certainty who was the judge, or of what court he was the judge?
A. No; I can not.
Q. 70. Are Judge Borden, Mr. Chittenden, and Mr. Brown, all of whom you have spoken, deceased?
A. I believe they are all dead.
Q. 71. If it were some other judge than Borden who acted, is he still living?
A. I can't say; I don't remember who were the judges about that time.
Q. 72. How many judges at that time held court in Allen County?
A. I am not sure of any but the judge of the circuit court.

Page 196: W. T. PRATT'S TESTIMONY.

6. Q. Where has Captain White resided since you first became acquainted with him?
A. He resided here all the time, with the exception of the time he resided at Warsaw, Kosciusko County, Indiana. I do not know how long he was there; two or three years; till the war broke out.
7. Q. Where did he reside during the years 1864, 1865, and 1866?
A. I do not know whether he had got back from the war in 1864 or not, but his family resided here, in the back part of what used to be called Spencer's out lot, on Douglas avenue; his family resided there—his wife and children. He came home wounded, and I went up to see him, and that is the way I know he lived there.
8. Q. Did he return to Fort Wayne at or before the termination of the war?
A. He returned to Fort Wayne, but I do not know whether it was at or before the termination of the war.
9. Q. What official position, if any, did you hold in Allen County, Indiana, during the years 1864, 1865, and 1866?
A. I was sheriff of the county.
10. Q. Who was judge of the court of common pleas of said county during said year?
A. Judge Borden.
11. Q. State whether or not, as sheriff, you were present and usually attended the sessions of said court.
A. Yes, sir.

Page 197:

12. Q. You may state what, if anything, you know in regard to the appearance of the contestee, James B. White, in the said court of common pleas for the purpose of being naturalized.
A. I am of the opinion that Captain White, Isaac Jenkinson, David H. Colerick, and I think some one else went up, and Judge Borden swore them in open court.
13. Q. Did said parties appear in said court as witnesses in a cause then on trial in said court, or in relation to an ex parte matter then presented to the court by said persons?
A. That I do not know. There was no case on trial at the time.
14. Q. State your best recollection and impression as to whether John Brown was present at the same time in said court.
15. Q. I mean John Brown, the miller, a brother-in-law of the contestee.
A. I do not remember.
16. Q. State whether there were others than the three you have named present at the time, and, if so, your best recollection as to who else were present.
A. There were others present, but I could not undertake to say who they were.
17. Q. What is and has been your best recollection and impression as to whether or not the contestee was then naturalized in said court?
A. Until this question came up here I had no opinion about it, and it had passed out of my mind; but remembering the circumstance and the custom of taking two witnesses, my opinion is that he was naturalized at that time.
18. Q. You may state whether or not you recollect the fact of an oath being administered to the contestee, James B. White, in the court at that time, and, if so, you may state if you recollect who administered that oath.
A. I think there was, and that Judge James W. Borden administered it.
19. Q. You may state as nearly as you can at which time and in what year the contestee, James B. White, appeared in said court, as you have heretofore stated.
A. I do not remember the season of the year. My impression is that it was the latter part of 1865 or the early part of 1866. My impression is that it was the latter part of 1865.
(Objected to by counsel as being immaterial and incompetent.)
20. Q. State when you were first elected sheriff of Allen County.
A. In 1862.
21. Q. When did your term of office commence?
A. It commenced the latter part of October or first part of November, 1862.
22. Q. How long did you continue in office?
A. Four years.
23. Q. State whether or not there was any other person than the contestee and those who attended him, who had at the time any business to be then transacted before the court.
(Objected to by contestant on the ground of being incompetent and immaterial.)
A. I do not remember.

Page 198:

How many other persons appeared in said common pleas court during the years 1865 and 1866 for the purpose of being naturalized?
A. I do not remember,
30. Q. Out of that good many, please name a single other person who appeared in said court for the purpose of having naturalization in either of those years.
A. I do not remember any.

Does he give any sufficient or satisfactory reason for his opinion in this case? The answer must be, None whatever.

Who are his witnesses? Whom does he call to prove these facts? First, he calls a Mr. Jenkinson to state in his behalf what occurred. In his own testimony he says:

I started to go to the court for the purpose of being naturalized, accompanied by Mr. John Brown and Mr. Muirhead.

There are two persons, sufficient to make the proof; why need he go after Mr. Jenkinson? Nowhere in the evidence does Mr. Muirhead again appear. He says he goes for Mr. Jenkinson and brings Mr. Jenkinson there. Now, the testimony of Mr. Jenkinson shows that he did not know what year this was; that he did not know what season of the year it was; that he does not recollect, but he thinks and has impressions, etc.

And what is more, although he had been a lawyer at that bar, although he was the editor of a leading newspaper at that time, Mr. Jenkinson can not tell in what court this occurred. But stay. Oh, yes; he tells you the court; he says it was in the circuit court. Mr. White and Mr. Pratt say it was in the court of common pleas. Mr. Jenkinson says, "I do not know anything about the common pleas court, and do not even know who was the judge of the common pleas court." Yet the man before whom these papers were said to have been taken out was the judge of the common pleas court, and the contestant in this case was the judge of the circuit court at that time. Read that testimony and you will find it is exactly as I have stated. They do not agree as to the court. Then Mr. Pratt says that Colerick and Jenkinson were the witnesses; that they were sworn. Jenkinson says he thinks he and Brown were the witnesses. White says they were Brown and Jenkinson; but after having heard the testimony of Pratt four or five days afterwards for the first time, he swears that Colerick was present at that time.

Here is what Jenkinson said, in his own language:

There was present Captain White, John Brown, and E. L. Chittenden, and myself. I do not believe there were any others except those interested in the proceeding.

In another part of his testimony he says:

I do not think there were any others there than those interested in the proceedings except officers of the court.

And he makes Mr. Chittenden an officer of the court at the time that he appears, although Mr. Chittenden was not an officer of the court in 1865. If gentlemen are going to insist that this man was naturalized in some court, pray tell us which court. Was it the circuit court? I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON], who says that he has read the record.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The court of common pleas. He so swears.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But does not Jenkinson, his other witness, upon whom he relies, swear that it was in the circuit court?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. He says that he will not swear which it was, and I say that a man like Jenkinson would be quite likely to make such a mistake twenty-three years after the event. The courts are of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman says Jenkinson would be likely to make such a mistake; he would be just as likely to make a mistake as to his having been there at all in 1865.

There is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the House.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Not at present. When Captain White wants to impress upon this House that he recollects so distinctly that he took out his last papers, he says the fact that he was going to Europe was the chief fact in connection with the matter. In the conversation with Bell, in the presence of Mr. Moynihan, his attention had been called to the fact that he might have taken them out somewhere else when he attempted or intended to go to Europe. In his testimony he says that he went to New York in the latter part of February or the first part of March. If he went to New York the latter part of February, it was on the 28th day of February, and I challenge anybody to say that he would have forgotten that fact at the time when he was questioned as to his naturalization, and from then on up until the time when he came upon the witness stand, and he never applied for the passport, which was his chief object in becoming naturalized.

Gentlemen say that he was advised to go and take out papers in the other county. Why? He says in his own testimony that it was with the idea that perhaps they might relate back—relate back to what date? To 1865? Oh, no. That they might relate back to the time when he took his oath as a soldier in the Army. The doctrine of relation was to be applied to some date. Now, why was it that that date was not the time at which he claimed he had taken out his other papers? Why did his mind run back to 1861 instead of 1865? Why did his recollection pass beyond the date now claimed as the one at which he took the oath of allegiance.

There is no difference, no question of difference, between him and the other witnesses as to the fact that he did claim that he was naturalized in 1857 or 1858. The testimony of all the witnesses corroborates that. He said, "I took out all the necessary papers at that time." He repeated that; he emphasized it; he dwelt upon it; and he stated, as the thing which forced it upon his recollection, the fact that he was at that time an enthusiastic supporter of John C. Frémont, and had voted for him in 1856.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to what appears to be a misstatement of fact on his part, made inadvertently, no doubt?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. My time has expired, and I do not know that I have the right to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to call my colleague's attention to what seems to be an erroneous statement of fact made by him in regard to the treatment of General Shields. General Shields never was a member of this House. I find a record here which shows that General Shields was expelled from the Senate of the United States upon a report made by Mr. Mason, of Virginia.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That does not answer the fact that he was driven out of this branch of Congress by the votes of your party after he had been duly elected by the people.

Mr. GROSVENOR. General Shields was never put out of Congress by a Republican House. He never was in the House of Representatives. He filed papers and contested the seat of Mr. Van Horne of Missouri, in the Thirty-ninth Congress. His contest failed. That is all. He thought he was elected and tried to get in, but the House decided he was not elected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But he had first been put out of the Senate by a resolution reported by Mr. James Mason, a Democrat of Virginia, and demanded upon the motion of John C. Calhoun, declaring his pretended election null and void.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, Mr. Calhoun was not living at the time I speak of. It was after the war, after General Shields, like the contestee in this case, had participated in the war for the Union.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that to be your statement, but the statement I am making shows you are wholly mistaken.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not yield for any more such statements. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to print in the RECORD the quotations from the testimony which I have referred to but have not read.

There was no objection.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CRISP. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH].

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the speeches made here on behalf of the contestee, I almost feel as if I owed an apology to the House for having agreed to the majority report. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] It has been contended here that it is a reproach to occupy the position occupied by myself and the gentlemen with whom I have agreed in bringing in that report. Much has been said in this case that I think would have been more appropriately spoken in another arena. I fancy, sir, that such speeches were made in the campaign out of which this contest came. If the personal claims of the contestee were the question before this House, if its decision depended upon his personal qualifications or his military services, I would be willing to admit that his friends in this House had presented for him a very strong case.

I would say further that if I had been in the position of the contestant in this case, if I had received the disapprobation of my fellow-citizens as he did in the election, I would have bowed gracefully to the result and would not have brought the case here. [Applause on the Republican side.] But, Mr. Speaker, the case has been brought here. It is conceded that it is properly and legally before this House; and ours is the responsibility to dispose of it.

I have been taught to believe that the Constitution of my country ought to be implicitly obeyed. I have also been taught to believe that the laws of my country should be strictly followed. According to my view of this case, the act of Congress prescribing the mode by which aliens may be admitted to citizenship requires them to appear before a court of justice having a clerk and common seal, and requires that a record of the proceedings shall be made.

I hold that all the authorities adduced in this House do not show anything to the contrary. The certificate issued by the court is merely an instrument of evidence. To contend that the certificate is the record is, in my judgment, to imitate the emphatic style of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], preposterous. If the position of that gentleman is correct, a court may have its records all over the United States, and, for that matter, in foreign countries, too. But the courts have held, and, as I maintain, properly held, that the certificate of naturalization, the exemplification of the record—call it by whatever name you please—is nothing more than an instrument of evidence, which shall be sufficient evidence of the fact of naturalization. Not a single authority, not a single case, whether from a United States court or a State court, has been produced here to sustain the position of the friends of the contestee. I maintain there can not be found a case involving proof of naturalization in which there was not either some record made—a small record, it may be, but at least a record—or the certificate of naturalization was produced.

Now, when the citizenship of this contestee was challenged he went to the court in which he claimed to have been naturalized and failed to find any record. The powerful presumption of fact from the absence of the record is, I think, that the naturalization did not take place. As was said by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MOORE], the absence of any record, the fact that no record was made, is the most powerful evidence that the party was not then and there naturalized, as he claims. Now, how do gentlemen propose to meet this absence of any record—this omission, as they claim, of the clerk to make the record of Mr. White's naturalization?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield a moment for a question?

Mr. MAISH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to put this case to the gentleman: Suppose it is conceded that a person appears in the proper court and in a perfectly proper way with his witnesses; that he and his witnesses take the requisite oaths; suppose there is no question about these facts at all, and yet the proper record is not entered; the clerk neglects to make the entry in the records of the court; is the man naturalized or not?

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, if the applicant for naturalization omits to do what I conceive to be his duty, omits to see that a record of his naturalization is made, and afterward loses the certificate which he takes, he is then, though he may have been naturalized, not in a position to prove it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is true; he is not in a position to prove it by ordinary evidence; but that does not answer my question.

Mr. MAISH. He is not in a position to prove it at all.

Mr. CUTCHEON. My question is simply whether the man did become a naturalized citizen by virtue of the facts I have supposed to exist, without reference to the evidence.

Mr. MAISH. He became a naturalized citizen, Mr. Speaker, when he was naturalized; but how are you going to establish the fact that he was naturalized when all the instruments of evidence by which he might prove the fact are missing, as in this case?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then that brings us to the point to which I wanted to call attention—that this is a question of fact only, not a question of law.

Mr. MAISH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered the gentleman's question. The contestee, finding no record of his naturalization; finding, as he alleges, that he has lost his certificate of naturalization, how does he propose to supply the deficiency? Does he call the judge of the court? Of course not; the judge is dead. Does he call the witnesses who he claims took oath in support of his application for citizenship? He calls one witness, who alleges that he was either a witness or a friend. Does he produce the testimony of the clerk? He does not. Does he produce the testimony of Muirhead, who he testified was present when the transaction took place? He does not.

Now, I insist where the certificate of naturalization can not be produced, it is necessary to prove the fact of naturalization by record evidence. The act of Congress provides that the applicant for naturalization can not prove his residence himself, but it is necessary he shall have the testimony of two witnesses to that fact.

Mr. ROWELL. Is it necessary to have two witnesses, or is that only a custom?

Mr. MAISH. No, I think it is necessary.

Mr. ROWELL. My understanding is that it is only a custom.

Mr. MAISH. The act of Congress, I believe, requires the testimony of two witnesses to that fact, but my friend from Illinois may be correct in his understanding of the law. At all events, for the sake of argument, it may be admitted that the fact of naturalization may be established by parol testimony. Will it be pretended by gentlemen on the other side that proof at least as high should be produced to the court as would have been required at the time of naturalization? I say the case of the contestee has utterly failed to meet this requirement. The case rests mainly on his own testimony, which in the original proceedings would not have sufficed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, not a single case, not a single authority, has been shown to this House in which there was not some record evidence that the party was before the court and that the court acted in the case. In this case, on the contrary, no record whatever exists. In all the other cases in the same court some record, a very meager one in most of them, may be found. If, like the case of Coleman in New York, the contestee could have produced a certificate of naturalization, and if he could have shown, as in that case, that there was some record—evidence giving the name of the applicant, his occupation, the names of his witnesses, his residence, and the certificate of naturalization supplemented by the initials of the judge—I say that if the contestee in this case had produced a case like that I would cheerfully and cordially have voted for him. But the case of the contestee, as presented by him, is utterly wanting in any of these essential requisites. It is like that of two tramps examined in New York some time ago. They were arraigned before the magistrate, who asked one of them, "Where do you live?" He answered, "Nowhere." He turned to the other and said, "Where do you live?" to which he received the reply, "Just above the other fellow." [Laughter.] There is in this case uncertainty piled upon uncertainty, and nothing upon which to found any proof.

Several cases have been produced to show that the fact of naturalization must be proved by record evidence, either by the certificate or the record itself. In addition to the case in 2 Cranch, where the question came squarely before the court and where it was held that the fact of naturalization could not be proved by parol testimony, the case in West Virginia was produced, a case on all fours with the case now before us. I now call attention to a case not yet referred to from the State of Vermont, a State where great lawyers seem to be "native and indued unto that element," the State of Edmunds and Phelps. It was a case of a contested election, and the attempt was made before the court to prove naturalization by parol testimony. The court held in that case, to quote from that opinion:

A certified copy of the record of the court in which one is naturalized is the legitimate evidence of the fact. Parol testimony to prove naturalization is inadmissible.

Mr. ROWELL. What do you read from?

Mr. MAISH. I read from the Atlantic Reporter, volume 6, page 608.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Was not that a case where there was an allegation of fraud in the records?

Mr. MAISH. It does not appear from the record what the contention was. But what difference does that make? The offer to prove naturalization by parol evidence was refused.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The gentleman will not deny if this man had a certificate it would be competent and sufficient evidence of that fact.

Mr. MAISH. I say to the gentleman from Minnesota that if the contestee had been able to present a certificate of naturalization, under the seal of the court, I would have cheerfully voted to seat him.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Now, if my friend will be courteous enough to yield for a moment.

Mr. MAISH. But if the House is ready to cast the question of naturalization upon the uncertain sea of parol evidence, covered over by the slime of perjury and tossed by the billows of partisanship, then I must be content.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. MAISH. But it will be found supremely impolitic to do so. I can not yield to the gentleman for another question. I do not wish to be discourteous to him, but we have high authority, the highest known to the world, that the office of asking questions is not one of very great distinction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRISP. I reserve the remainder of the time allotted to this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one hour and twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. ROWELL. Will the gentleman from Georgia consent to an adjournment now?

Mr. CRISP. I prefer to carry out the arrangement we have heretofore made.

Mr. ROWELL. Then I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has two hours and five minutes remaining.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that there is anybody in this House who is a member of it, and who desires to get at the right—and I believe we all do—but who considers the action that is about to be taken in this matter as very important. I desire for a little time to address myself to the legal proposition which seems to have come up in this case.

I think the first gentleman who talked upon this subject in favor of the report of the majority of the committee took the ground that the law was that the record of a court could not be proved by parol evidence. I can well understand how the gentleman could take that position, for I can not see how it is possible for the majority report in this case, under the facts as developed, to be sustained, unless that is the law.

Now, I do not believe, and in fact I have a right to say that I know such is not the law. I say that because courts in the past have decided it over and over again. I say it because if that was the law it would subvert and undermine the status of affairs in this country in regard to civil, criminal, and political rights, and endanger the entire fabric itself. Let us see whether or not that is true.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a man in a court of competent jurisdiction is placed upon trial, after due indictment, for murder. He is called into court and the indictment is read in which he is charged with killing his fellow-man, and he pleads not guilty to the indictment. Soon he is placed upon trial for his life. His reputation for all the years gone, the reputation of his family, the good name that his ancestors have borne, and that perhaps he himself had theretofore borne, all are in jeopardy, and his life is also in jeopardy. Twelve good and true men constitute the jury who are called to try him under the indictment. Such proceedings are had as that the facts are placed before the jury and the court; and, by and by, after deliberation by themselves, the jury file back into the court-room, and after being asked by the court or by the clerk of the court, "Have you agreed upon a verdict in this case?" announce through their foreman, "We have agreed upon a verdict," and that verdict is that the man is not guilty of the offense wherewith he is charged in the indictment.

Now, I will suppose for a moment that the clerk of the court, either through incompetence or carelessness, or from any other reason that you may assign, fails to put down upon the docket before him the fact that the jury has found the man not guilty on trial. I will suppose, sir, that he does not take the indictment and put upon it the fact that this man, under that indictment, had been put upon trial, and the further fact that the jury on that trial found him not guilty. Time passes. As a matter of fact, with or without an order of the court even, this man passes out of the court a free man. You and I will say he is free indeed, in fact and in law. But time passes and some vicious person or persons, desirous of putting him again in jeopardy of his life, call up the old indictment and ask to have him tried over again for the old offense. He says, "I have been tried for this once and acquitted. I have been put in jeopardy of my life, and have been declared not guilty." "Ah! but there is no record. The clerk is dead, and the books have been searched and no record appears of the fact of that trial and acquittal by a constitutional jury under the laws of the land, and hence you must be tried again."

My friends upon the other side attempt to show and say that the law is that the record of the court is that kind of substance that it must be produced in order to show a class of facts such as that I have narrated here in order to prevent this man from undergoing a new trial. Now, it must be and is the fact that a man who has been placed under these circumstances has a right to say that he has been placed in jeopardy once, and in the absence of a record under such circumstances may show the fact by parol or any other character of testimony. Why do I make this statement, Mr. Speaker? Because I assert, to start with, that the record of a court is not the judgment of a court. When a jury says that a man is not guilty, that is the judgment of the peers of the man, a constitutional jury, and that in fact and in truth is the judgment of the court.

When a judge on the bench, after having examined the evidence in a case which has been brought before him, says, "Mr. Clerk, you enter on the docket that the plaintiff shall recover of the defendant $600 and the costs of the action," the words of the judge are the judgment; and the jotting down by the clerk on his docket is the mere crystallization of that fact; it is a mere entry of the judgment; that and nothing more. And when you have once arrived at that fact that the record kept by a clerk in regard to judgments by the court in actions before the court is mere evidence, then when that evidence is swept away, from any cause, or if that evidence never existed, you can supply its place.

I recollect very well in my own State the case of a man whose title to his house and lot was in jeopardy, and the question on which it all turned was whether certain proceedings in the surrogate court for the sale of the estate to pay debts of the deceased were regular or not. Upon an examination of the record which by the law was required to be kept, it was found there was no record of the case. What did the court do? The court allowed persons who were in the court at the time to come forward and testify that papers were produced which were necessary evidence in the case on which to base the judgment and action of the surrogate. That case went up to the court of appeals, and they finally held it was perfectly proper that where the judgment of the surrogate was based on a presumed record, when that record appeared to be defective or did not exist, its place could be supplied by parol testimony. Was this wrong? Not at all.

I have a case here before me which I will read if any gentleman demands it; a criminal case where a man was acquitted. No record was made, yet afterwards he was allowed to plead the fact of a prior acquittal and prove the fact by parol, and the result was that he was honorably acquitted.

It has been stated here and assumed all the way through that there is no record in this case. I will go a step further. I say there is a record in this case. I say there is evidence of the admission of this man to citizenship in this country. Why do I say that? I say that because it is an admitted fact and the books of record in Allen County, Indiana, show that this man filed his declaration of intention; and it is there on record; that is part of the record of this man's admission to citizenship. He could not be admitted to citizenship unless he could show that the declaration of his intention had been filed. There is no dispute on the other side and there can be none that this man went into the court in Allen County, Indiana, and that there is now to-day on file in the proper book under the proper seal of the court his declaration of intention to become a citizen. And I say that that is a part of the record. It is like the filing of a complaint in a mortgage foreclosure or equity proceeding to set aside some title to real estate. It is the basis of the whole record; and we have that to base our action upon.

But, furthermore, he has affirmed his intention since that time. He has committed such acts and done such things in his life as to show his intention there was finally carried out. He has lived for a quarter of a century in the midst of a constituency who have shown by their votes that they appreciate this man as a man and as a citizen. They by their ballots show you that they have confidence in him as a man and that they had confidence in him having filed his declaration of intention to be a citizen, that he had become a citizen.

Let me go a little further. What else has he done? Why, sir, in 1861, when it was necessary that a man should have bravery of heart and of mind and strength of muscle and of body to show himself a citizen of the United States, he did this. He went into the Army and there bared himself to the bullets and shafts of the enemy. He stood between you and me on the one hand, and anarchy and the subversion of the Government on the other. I say the best evidence that he intended to become a citizen of the United States is the fact that he fought for it and bled for it.

Now let us see what further appears. Afterward, according to the evidence of perfectly reliable witnesses, he said he desired to carry out his intention. Why? Because he desired to go abroad, where his American citizenship would protect his person and protect his property; and so he bethought himself of carrying out his first intention of becoming a citizen; and he and two men of that county, who are now living, swear that they went into a court of competent jurisdiction and that he did carry out his original design and was made a citizen of the United States of America in fact.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROWELL. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting the report of Professor Swenson on the subject of sorghum sugar; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the act of May 29, 1884, a report of the operations of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the year 1887; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

ISAAC D. SMEAD & CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 25, 1888, certain data respecting work done for the District by Isaac D. Smead & Co.; which, on motion of Mr. DAWES, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of 59 citizens of Wisconsin, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a letter of Marie A. Brown, an American citizen resident in London, relating to the proposed world's exposition, with proof that America was discovered five hundred years before Columbus; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and the Discovery of America.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of 111 citizens of the Fourth, Seventh, and Eleventh Congressional districts of Iowa, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Concurrent resolution requesting Congress to prohibit the sale of adulterated lard, and require statement of actual contents on package thereof, and to pass the bill now pending for that purpose.

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to secure legislation that will prohibit the sale of adulterated lard throughout the United States, unless on the package containing the same a true statement is given of the actual contents, and of the proportion of genuine lard therein; and that they be further requested to aid in the passage of any bill now before Congress having in view the purpose above indicated.

I hereby certify that the above resolution passed both branches of the Twenty-second General Assembly of the State of Iowa.

[SEAL.] FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BERRY presented resolutions adopted by the Arkansas Agricultural Association, and resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Pine Bluff, Ark., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 650, known as the Dawes bill, taxing cotton-seed; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of the members of the faculty of King College, at Bristol, Tenn., praying for the enactment of an international copyright law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Tennessee, officially signed, representing nearly 6,000 members, praying for the abolition of the internal-revenue tax on alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present numerous petitions from citizens of Indiana, numerously signed, praying for prohibition in this District. I move their reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Charles McCarty, a pensioner under certificate No. 129849, praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of David A. Parkhurst, late a private in Company A, First Michigan Sharpshooters, praying for the removal of the charge of desertion from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio, remonstrating against any reduction of the wool tariff. I will not ask that it be read, but that it be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House Joint Resolution No. 4.]

Requesting our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to oppose any reduction of the wool tariff.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio: First. That we recognize in sheep husbandry one of the most important industries of our State and country, and one that almost every farmer is directly interested in, and without which our country can not be independent; and that we do therefore view with apprehension and alarm all propositions and measures to abolish or reduce the tariff duties now levied for its protection, and respectfully request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to oppose the same.

Second. That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and to each of the members of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States from Ohio.

ELBERT L. LAMPSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WM. C. LYON,

Adopted January 26, 1888.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1888, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888.

JAMES S. ROBINSON,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Columbus, Ohio, January 27, 1888.

In compliance with the request contained in the resolution above set forth, I have the honor to transmit a certified copy of the same herewith.

J. B. FORAKER, Governor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio, opposing certain measures suggested in the President's message, which I ask be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House Joint Resolution No. 5.]

Requesting our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to oppose certain measures which were suggested in the President's recent message.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio: First. That we believe in a protective tariff for the sake of protection, to the end that we may have a diversity of employment, domestic commerce, home markets for our farmers, good wages for our laborers, and such development of all our material resources as will make it possible for us to supply all our wants in both peace and war, and thus be independent as a nation among the nations of the earth.

Second. Under this wise and patriotic policy, inaugurated and steadily upheld and enforced by the Republican party since its advent to power in 1861, we have prospered as no other nation ever did.

Third. We regard the views expressed by His Excellency the President of the United States, in his recent message to Congress, in opposition to this policy, as unwise, unjust, and unpatriotic, and as calculated, if formulated into law and given effect, to not only dissipate our surplus revenue, but also paralyze our industries, stop the development of our resources, degrade labor, stagnate and demoralize business, and reduce us to that weak and dependent condition to which the country had been brought by a Democratic free-trade policy when the Republican party was placed in power in 1861.

Fourth. That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to oppose all measures that may be offered for the purpose of giving effect to these views and recommendations of the President.

Fifth. That the governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives from Ohio in the Congress of the United States.

Adopted January 26, 1888.

ELBERT L. LAMPSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WM. C. LYON,

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1888, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888.

JAMES S. ROBINSON,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Columbus, Ohio, January 27, 1888.

In compliance with the request contained in the resolutions above set forth, I have the honor to transmit a certified copy of the same herewith.

J. B. FORAKER, Governor.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Ohio, officially signed, praying for a national commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ohio, officially signed, representing 5,000 members, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on all alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of 208 citizens of the Fourteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Congressional districts of Ohio, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Marine Association of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the passage of Senate bill 616, extending the right of pensions to steam-boat men and others acting under orders from United States officers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Macomb, McDonough County, Illinois, praying for the enactment of a law for the reissue of fractional currency, not as a substitute for silver, but to supplement it, and especially for use in the mails; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of N. K. Fairbank, Jesse Spalding, and other citizens of Chicago, praying for an increase of the salaries of the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States in that district; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of 150 citizens of Illinois, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Michigan, officially signed, praying for the abolition of the internal-revenue tax on all alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the Territory of New Mexico, officially signed, representing 200 members, and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wyoming Territory, officially signed, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on all alcoholic liquors; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present a petition of numerous citizens of New Jersey, praying Congress by a joint resolution to adopt and propose to the several States an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, importation, exportation, and transportation of alcoholic liquors. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO presented the petition of G. F. Syfrett and 25 other citizens of Vernon, Fla., and the petition of W. F. Russ and 53 other citizens of Miller's Ferry, Fla., praying that increased compensation be allowed fourth-class postmasters; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. TURPIE presented a petition of the Business Men's Association of Evansville, Ind., praying for the enlargement of the marine hospital at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of citizens of Claremont, Surry County, Virginia, in which they set forth that the undersigned citizens of Claremont, Surry County, Virginia, respectfully represent that they believe that unless something is done to establish schools and pay teachers the South will always be as it is at present, one hundred years behind the North. They say that the school-houses are from 5 to 8 miles apart, and are poor structures at that; that they have but five months' school out of a year, and pay their teachers $25 to $30 a month, and they pray for the passage of the school bill. This petition is signed by a number of citizens of that place. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the memorial of Rev. S. P. Leeds and a large number of citizens of the town of Hanover, N. H., remonstrating against the admission of Utah as a State. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of District Assembly No. 66, Knights of Labor of this District, in which they set forth that 300 more rooms for school purposes of the best modern kind, free books and material for the children, teachers in sufficient numbers to give each child ample personal attention, and salaries on a scale to secure the best educational talent should be provided immediately for the sufficient accommodation of the school population of this District.

The petition is quite well written, strongly setting forth the necessities of the case and the occasion for further legislation in order to supply sufficient schooling facilities for the children of this District. I would ask that it be printed, but as the request is likely to be objected to, I will simply move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with the request that they give it attention.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented petitions of citizens of the First and Second Congressional districts of the State of New Hampshire, praying for the passage of the bill to prevent the importation, exportation, manufacture, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of Omaha Indians, praying for the payment of $70,060 due them under the treaty of 1855, in two installments; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I present a communication from Vickery & Hill, publishers, of Augusta, Me., in the nature of a memorial to Congress, protesting against any legislation that will exclude from second-class postage rates publications in the nature of books, complete or in parts or in series, whether sold by subscription or otherwise, thereby preventing the diffusion of standard literature among the people. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I am informed, are considering this subject, which is a very important one, and I hope they will give attention to the interesting statements contained in this memorial. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of 182 citizens of the First Congressional district of the State of Oregon, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of 42 citizens of the Second Congressional district of Connecticut, and a petition of 57 citizens of Montana and Washington Territories, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER presented a petition of 130 citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New York, officially signed, representing 16,000 members, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on all alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of 202 citizens of the Sixth, Eighteenth, Twenty-fourth, and Thirty-third Congressional districts of New York, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented three petitions of the surviving members of the Thirty-seventh Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and of widows of deceased members of that regiment, praying for the enactment of a law granting pensions to them; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER presented the petition of Anne Lucas, praying to be allowed pay as a laundress during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of the city of Greeley, Colo., praying that a suitable appropriation be made for the construction of water reservoirs in the State of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAMERON presented a resolution adopted by Granville Centre Grange No. 309, of Granville Centre, Bradford County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the repeal of the oleomargarine law; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Connecticut, officially signed, representing 3,000 members, praying for the abolition of the internal-revenue tax on all alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William B. Covie and 120 other citizens of Connecticut, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Missouri, officially signed, representing 4,000 members, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on all alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition of 130 citizens of the First and Second Congressional districts of Maryland, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Maryland State Temperance Alliance, officially signed, praying for the passage of a national prohibitory constitutional amendment; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, presented a petition of 104 citizens of the State of Arkansas, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present a petition of the Board of Trade of Portsmouth, N. H., signed by William H. Sise, the president, and Charles W. Gray, the acting secretary, of the International Marine Conference, praying that an international marine conference be held in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. That matter is pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it should be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Maine if he can give any reason why the petition should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE. Only because it looks to an invitation to be extended by the President of the United States to the various nations of the earth calling a convention of the various maritime nations to meet here; and there are more than twenty petitions and memorials and bills relating to the subject, which have been already referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not want to encumber the committee. That was my object in making the inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of William F. C. Nindemann, formerly a seaman on the exploring steamer Jeannette, praying that he may be allowed the difference between the pay of a seaman and that of a carpenter; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of 103 citizens of the Second Vermont Congressional district, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FARWELL presented the petition of Mrs. Josephine Rozell, widow of Robert W. Rozell, late of Company C, One hundred and thirty-fifth Illinois Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FARWELL. On Wednesday last I presented a petition of importers at the port of Chicago, Ill., praying for the passage, with an amendment, of Senate bill 532, which proposes to amend what is known as the immediate-transportation act. That bill is now before the Committee on Commerce, while the petition, upon my request, was referred to the Committee on Finance. I desire to recall the petition from the Finance Committee and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce, where the bill is under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1235) to modify and amend the provisions of the dedication to the public use of the tract of land known as "Dearborn Park," in the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1852) to modify and amend the provisions of the dedication to public use of the tract of land known as "Dearborn Park," in the city of Chicago, State of Illinois; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 16) to set apart from the public domain in the State of Oregon, as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States, townships 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31, in ranges 5 and 6 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1817) to grant to the State of Oregon townships 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31 south, in ranges 5 and 6 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, for a public park, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to say in regard to the bill just reported that the Legislature of Oregon has memorialized for the creation of a public park including the lands mentioned in the bill, and Crater Lake, situated within it, and I have received numerous petitions of citizens of Oregon to the same effect; but the Committee on Public Lands was not disposed to create a national park, and we have reported a substitute proposing to donate the land for the purpose of a park to the State of Oregon, on condition that it shall be forever used for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 539) amending section 3749 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the disposition of property of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 850) granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 832) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1060) to incorporate the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 931) to incorporate the Washington Cable Electric Railway of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Virginia prefers it, the bill just reported by him may stand on the Calendar ahead of the one I have just reported.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I thought that was the understanding.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not remember it at the moment I made the report, or I should have deferred it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the Senator from Virginia will take precedence on the Calendar of the bill reported by the Senator from Tennessee, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1516) to provide for inquests under national authority, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COKE. I desire to say, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, that they will present their views on that bill hereafter.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 64) to authorize the juries of the United States circuit and district courts to be used interchangeably, and to provide for drawing talesmen, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 226) securing the right of a party complainant in the United States courts to file a supplemental bill in equity causes, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. CALL. Let that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 230) for the retirement of judges of the district or circuit courts of the United States on account of disability, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. CALL. Let that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1723) providing for the completion of the public building in the city of Pensacola, Fla., as originally designed, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 607) for the relief of Juliet C. Palmer, widow and administratrix of James C. Palmer, late Surgeon-General United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 250) for the repair of Fort Marion, at St. Augustine, Fla., and the inclosure of the ground attached to said fort, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1681) to amend section 461 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulating fees for exemplification of land patents, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1046) providing for the resurvey of township No. 18 south, of range No. 9 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Kansas, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1378) directing the prosecution of inquiries by the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, in respect to the destruction of oysters in the natural oyster-beds lying within the waters and jurisdiction of the United States by star-fish, etc., and making an appropriation for such purpose, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 1709) to provide for the issue of patents to certain persons for donation claims under the act approved September 27, 1850, commonly known as the Oregon donation law, heretofore reported by him.

SUPPLEMENT TO WHARTON'S DIGEST.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 27) providing for the printing of the supplement to Wharton's Digest of International Law, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed, under the editorial charge of Francis Wharton, the usual number of copies of a supplement to the Digest of International Law, printed under joint resolution of July 28, 1886, and under the same conditions and limitations as are imposed in said resolution, such supplement containing the diplomatic correspondence of the American Revolution, with historical and legal notes; and that there be printed, in addition to said usual number, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of State.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and the Discovery of America, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 19) relating to the celebration of the centennial of the inauguration of the Constitution of the United States, to report it favorably with an amendment. A similar joint resolution has been passed by the Senate heretofore. It does not relate to any of the matters about which there has been any difference of opinion. It has received the unanimous support of the committee as formerly it received the unanimous support of the Senate, and I ask that it may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

That, in addition to such other celebration as may hereafter be provided for, the centennial of the inauguration of the Constitution of the United States be observed by the two Houses of Congress, who shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and that the Chief-Justice of the United States be invited to deliver an oration on the occasion, and that the President of the United States and the executives of the several States and Territories, and such other persons as may hereafter be determined, be invited to attend.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment at the end of the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the committee will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, after the words "United States," it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert the words "the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the members of the Cabinet," so as to read:

And that the President of the United States, the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the executives of the several States and Territories, and such other persons as may hereafter be determined, be invited to attend.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts desires that the amendment be adopted. I do not object to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has asked whether there is objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution. The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the joint resolution, but I ask that the two first lines of it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The two first lines of the joint resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows

That, in addition to such other celebration as may hereafter be provided for—

Mr. HALE. That is sufficient. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts who has reported the joint resolution whether by the words which have just been read either the committee or Congress is to be considered as committing itself in any form to a Government industrial exposition in the city of Washington? I should be glad if the Senator would state the attitude of the committee upon that point.

Mr. HOAR. The committee have not, so far as I am aware, come to any conclusion upon that subject, or even considered it. They have heard some persons in regard to various plans for a large celebration, but have not taken up the subject for action. I am not, therefore, authorized to speak either for the committee or any member of the committee as to the opinion upon any proposed scheme. The members will speak for themselves whenever they choose. But the object of the committee in reporting the joint resolution was carefully to refrain from everything which should commit either the committee or the Senate, or any member of either, to any such plan or to any plan beyond this.

I thought that if those lines were not in the joint resolution it might be taken as a commitment to the contrary, that is a commitment against any further extension of this celebration, and those lines were intended to absolutely guard against any commitment either way. They were put in with that design.

I may, perhaps, say that there are several plans which have been mentioned in the newspapers and which have found advocates before the committee. One is the plan to which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and, if I am not mistaken, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] publicly expressed strong objections at the last Congress. The Senator from Ohio is a member of the present committee and favors this joint resolution. That plan is to have an exposition extending over the period between 1889 and 1892. That plan is a very large one and will require careful investigation, I suppose, before any member of the committee would be able to bring his mind to its favor, and some Senators have expressed very strongly their objection to it.

Then there is another proposition, which does not in the least involve what I have stated, that to the centennial celebration of our Constitution the Presidents and chief justices of the different American countries shall be invited. Of course if they were invited, that would involve a slight expense, necessarily, for receiving them as guests when they arrive in Washington and during their stay in Washington. That expense would be a very small sum, a few thousand dollars, I suppose; but that proposition is entirely disconnected from this joint resolution.

I have stated the object of the joint resolution; and it is entirely unimportant whether the words which have been read are out or not. My reason was to avoid any commitment either way, and that was the general design.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. As I understand this proposition, it is merely an announcement that we will celebrate the centennial of the adoption of our Constitution, outlining somewhat the manner in which it will be done, giving notice to the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court to have a speech to deliver, etc. I had supposed, however, as a member of the committee (and, in fact, I regret very much that I was not able to attend the last meeting), that some step would be taken in regard to our relations with the South American republics or countries generally, and towards extending to them an invitation for the occasion. I did not know but that the Senator from Massachusetts was going to offer an amendment, and an amendment was spoken of to that effect. Do I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts that nothing more is contemplated at this time?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, if I may interrupt him at this time, as he was not present at the meeting of the committee, the committee found when they met that that matter was pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I suppose there is no breach of delicacy in saying that it is before a subcommittee of that committee, of which subcommittee the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is chairman, and as it is well known that the Senator has in mind a desire to have a commercial consultation of the different American countries promoted by this country and held here, we did not want to take any step which would embarrass or interfere with that. Therefore the committee were not prepared even to approach the consideration of that subject without first having some conference with the Committee on Foreign Relations, which I suppose will be had.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a matter of no concern to me how the object is accomplished, and in view of the explanation given by the Senator from Massachusetts it is entirely satisfactory.

I desire simply to say further to Senators who may have some views in regard to establishing a prolonged exposition here, that there is nothing in this measure, as I understand it, committing anybody to that enterprise. Whatever we may do hereafter, this joint resolution does not commit us to any line of action in that regard.

Mr. HALE. I think perhaps Senators would feel easier upon the subject if the initial words were left out of the joint resolution; all the more so, because upon the explanation of the Senator from Massachusetts it is clear that the proposition for the meeting of South American representatives, in the form of a celebration and not of an exposition, is in charge of another committee. The select committee, as I understand, does not propose to deal with the subject of any other celebration. Therefore the words had better be omitted.

Mr. HOAR. No, I did not say that.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator to say that that matter was with the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I said that the Select Committee on the Centennial could not deal with that subject without a conference with the Committee on Foreign Relations, who had the matter in charge. Of course the principal and important matter is the question of commercial relation.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the joint resolution unless there lurks in it something more than is seen. Neither do I object to the other celebration which has been referred to; but the greater question of a long-continued national or international exposition to be held here or elsewhere involves more serious considerations, and it should be approached very carefully. The time should be selected with care, and the place should be selected with care.

However much pride we may have in this city and be glad to see it built up, and dignified, and adorned in ways we are all glad to help in, it is a grave question whether it is the seat of art, or science, or labor, or manufactures of any form sufficient to justify the selection of this city as a place for a great exposition, and for one I do not wish to be committed to anything which looks in that direction. I do not think the committee has any such purpose. It is plain, from the explanation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, that it has no such purpose. If there is any danger that lurks in the phraseology here, it is one that will appear afterwards and is not carried in the intention of the committee. I am free to avow my belief in that, but I think it would rest better if the initial words were stricken out and let the provision be simply for the celebration that is covered by the phrases of the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I believe the joint resolution involves some matter that is a little bit foreign to this country, and in view of the fact that it seems to be impossible to get a resolution considered by the Senate looking to the ratification or rejection of the British treaty, I may be allowed to discuss it just now, because, as I understood the Senator from Maine to say, this is a matter which ought to be considered by a committee which is looking forward to a great international something. I think that puts me in order, sir.

I have asked the Senate to consider a resolution to change Rule XXXVII of the Senate, which would allow us to consider in open session the proposed treaty with Great Britain. I have had a motive beyond that, which has not appeared up to this time, and that motive is to draw from the Committee on Foreign Relations the amendment which they have proposed to the treaty. If we have here a message from the President transmitting a treaty or a stipulation, and it is proposed to be amended by any member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is proper that it should be known which of those committeemen favor the amendment.

I can not state what the amendment is, because I have not the terms of it at my command now, but I do say this: I do not believe there is one single member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who will rise to-day in open session and advocate the amendment which comes from that committee.

I have here the treaty, but I can not discuss it—I can only discuss the joint resolution; but I ask in the light of what has been suggested here, whether I can not have that amendment read to the Senate and to the people of the United States. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who I know upon every occasion has endeavored to bring this treaty before us in executive session, whether he can not rise and tell the people what the amendment is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Being personally appealed to, I feel it my duty to make a point of order against the Senator from Virginia, which I do with great reluctance. He asks me that I, in violation of the rules of the Senate, shall do what I regard to be improper and ungentlemanly in disclosing the secrets of the Senate against its will. When he asks me to answer that question, it is as much as if he should ask me to steal, or rob, or do anything else wrong or forbidden by law. As a matter of course, I can not state what the rules of the Senate prohibit me from saying, and I make the point of order that the Senator from Virginia is himself violating the rules. Whether it should be enforced against him or not, it is for the Senate to say. I simply make the point of order because I can not answer the question of the Senator from Virginia without violating the rules.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, that would come with better grace——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One moment. The Senator from Ohio raises a point of order which the Chair feels called upon to decide.

The Senate in its legislative capacity and the Senate in its executive capacity, are the same body, but their functions are essentially separate and distinct. The proceedings in each capacity are separately journalized; the records are separately kept. The transactions and proceedings in legislative session can not be reached by the Senate in executive session. The proceedings and transactions in executive session being separately recorded and journalized are not the subject of discussion in legislative session. It is a violation of the rules of the Senate to refer in legislative session to any matter upon the Executive Calendar until the injunction of secrecy is removed.

The Chair therefore holds that the Senator from Virginia, in referring to any matters pending in executive session while the Senate is sitting with open doors, is clearly in violation of the rules of the Senate, and he can only be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will suspend one moment. The enforcement of the rules is intrusted to the Chair, and the Chair will endeavor, if supported by the Senate, to see that order is not violated and that the rules are strictly obeyed. The Senator from Virginia will proceed in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir, if I can. I do not think that anything I have said or done in this Senate has justified the observations of the Chair, but still in order to be in order I must accept them.

I did not ask the Senator from Ohio to answer the question that I propounded to him with any hope that he would do it. I was discussing the proposition propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts and trying to keep myself in order considering it, as I understood, within the proper rules of order. I think that I may be in order when I undertake, in reply to the Senator from Ohio's remark that he does not propose to deal with executive matters in legislative hours, to draw his attention back to the point. Whenever I shall violate a rule it will be in the Senate and not outside of it. This is a question that disturbs the people of this country beyond that which was involved in the letter that dismissed some officials sent to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio when he was acting in another capacity.

I will not deal further with the word "gentlemanly," sir. Every man knows for himself what is gentlemanly. If he does not, those who are associated with him can judge.

Now, Mr. President, if it is the ruling of the Chair and the sense of the Senate that I can not, or any other Senator here can not, discuss that resolution in the broad sense that it involves this British treaty, then I must take my seat, as I understand; but from that ruling of the Chair I shall reserve my right to make an appeal whenever the Chair himself shall say that I am out of order.

I have a right to discuss resolutions that are offered. On last Thursday, on this floor, and against an objection that carried a resolution over under the rules, as I understand them, we could not consider the proposition to change Rule XXXVII. I can re-enforce my position on that question by drawing from this desk-drawer a note that was written to me by the then Presiding Officer himself, telling me that I could not accomplish the purpose of considering an extradition treaty unless I employed the language which he gave me then, proposing to change Rule XXXVII.

In all these international matters—for I know I must conform myself to the narrow-gauge rule—I have before me something that is headed "confidential," and it purports to be something that is international, coming entirely within the purview of the resolution that I offered the other day. I might be prepared to treat this before the people of this country who have a right to know what it is; but I do think that we should know in the Senate now before we go into executive session what is meant by the Committee on Foreign Relations——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will not be permitted to proceed to discuss any matters pending in executive session. The Senator from Virginia will proceed in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I am somewhat accustomed to rebuke, but I suppose I can still have it understood that I have a right to proceed in order. Perhaps that is the only right I have. This matter that the President undertakes to rule me down on is not in executive session and will not go there as long as there is a man on this floor to object to it. I say it is before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is in the office of the Secretary or the executive clerk of the Senate, and it has not yet been before the Senate in executive session, except in so far as the Senator from Ohio has been pleased to discuss it himself without getting it before the Senate. I appeal to the sense of justice of the Senate if that is not correct. It should be before us in legislative session.

I was not sent here as a Senator to legislate in executive session. I was sent here to legislate in open session, and I am here now asking to be heard in open session on that which more vitally concerns the people I represent to-day than all that has emanated from the Committee on Foreign Relations during this session, and I am rebuked every time that I refer to this. I understand the rebuke, and I intend to reiterate every time that this is the treaty that the American people will want considered and discussed in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The question recurs, Will the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, agree to the amendment reported by the select committee to the joint resolution which has been read?

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to suggest a further amendment.

Mr. HALE. After the word "that," at the beginning of line 3, I move to strike out "in addition to such other celebration as may hereafter be provided for;" so as to read:

That the centennial of the inauguration of the Constitution of the United States be observed by the two Houses of Congress, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS AT MISSISSIPPI CITY.

Mr. PUGH. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 788) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Mississippi City, to report it favorably without amendment. I am requested to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have that bill considered at this time. It passed both Houses at the last session, and failed to become a law on account of its not reaching the President in time. It is a local bill which will not consume time.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill which I shall be ready to do in a moment. I object for that reason. I inquire of the Senator having the bill in charge if this is not the bill to which the Senate attached last year an amendment fixing the salaries of district judges?

Mr. HOAR. One of the same character.

Mr. PUGH. There is a separate bill now before the Committee on the Judiciary, on which the committee will soon act, providing for the salaries of district judges. I hope the Senator will not incumber this local bill with a general provision raising the salaries of the judges. The committee has the matter before it and will dispose of it, I have no doubt, at the next meeting.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not the subject of discussion until unanimous consent is given for its consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLPH. I hope it will go over, then, for this morning.

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. PUGH. I do not ask for its consideration if there is any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

HENRY H. MARMADUKE.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1754) for the relief of Henry H. Marmaduke, of Missouri, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for its present consideration. It is simply to remove political disabilities.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

CATTLE AND DAIRY FARMING.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 22) providing for the printing of additional copies of Executive Document No. 51, first session Forty-ninth Congress, on the subject of cattle and dairy farming, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MANDERSON. In lieu of that joint resolution, and to comply with the law, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a concurrent resolution and ask for its consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,000 additional copies of Executive Document No. 51, first session Forty-ninth Congress, on the subject of cattle and dairy farming, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the Department of State.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not understand exactly what the resolution is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The resolution was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 120.

Mr. DAWES. Is morning business through?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that after the hour of 1 o'clock any Senator has a right to move to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, or other matter on the Calendar, but it has been customary to receive morning business so long as it is offered.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw the motion until the morning business is completed.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to introduce a bill when that order is reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further reports of committees? If none, that order is closed.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1853) providing for the adjustment of the accounts of laborers and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES. Before the bill is referred I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Education and Labor to some facts in connection with the case which it is desirable should be known.

Ever since the passage of the law making eight hours a day's labor for employés of the Government there has been a very strange persistence in disregard and in evasion of that law. For some time after its passage in some Departments of the Government employés of the Government were compelled to labor for a day's work ten hours without the slightest regard to the enactment of that law, until the President of the United States, President Grant, issued a proclamation forbidding in all the various employments of the Government a further disregard of that law.

Subsequently Congress passed an act making appropriation for the payment of such employés of the Government as had been required to work ten hours for eight hours' pay. A microscopic examination of that law revealed the fact that there were gate-keepers and watchmen and a few others of that kind of employés who were not covered by it, and that therefore the Government could still exact two hours' labor each day out of that class of its employés without paying for it, and that class of employés has been to this time without any compensation under that law.

Subsequently there was invented a form of an agreement, which I have here, which was held up as an alternative to no employment to any one who, under the demand of the Government, required employment, by which he should contract with the Government that that law should be disregarded, and that he would work ten hours a day, if he worked at all, for eight hours' pay. That has continued in some quarters until the present time.

I call the attention of the Committee on Education and Labor to this fact, in the belief that if this bill which I have introduced shall become a law this sort of disregard and evasion of a positive enactment of Congress will cease. It may be said that any one, Government official or private individual, has the right to his private opinion as to the wisdom of such a law, but no Government official, in my judgment, has the right to defy it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not hear the bill read and I do not know its terms, but I know there is no necessity for any further legislation on the subject. The statute now is plain and explicit, and it is a direction to executive officers which they can not escape.

I do not know whether the Senator has correctly stated the practice of the Departments during the time this has been the law. I only rose to say, for myself and those with whom I was connected in the late Administration, that he has not stated it as it then existed. When called upon to pass on that question, as I was, I readily ruled, and there could have been no ruling in any other way consistent with common sense and law, that the Departments had no discretion, and, so far as the Department over which I presided was concerned, the law was faithfully executed, and no man worked more than eight hours.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to be permitted to say that the practice to which I have alluded was not universal and is only in certain quarters, and I have never heard that the Department over which the Senator presided was ever open to that criticism. I do know, however, that at this very hour there are employés of this Government working ten hours for eight hours' pay under the agreement to which I have alluded. The bill which I have introduced proposes to have their accounts adjusted according to law. That is all it requires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1854) to increase the pensions of certain persons who have received more than one wound or injury in the military or naval service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1855) granting a pension to Anna M. Allen; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAULSBURY introduced a bill (S. 1856) to establish a life-saving station on the Atlantic coast between Indian River Inlet, Delaware, and Ocean City, Maryland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1857) for the payment of the claim of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. I offer a resolution to accompany the bill, for reference to the same committee:

Resolved, That the bill providing for the payment of the claim against the United States of Harry I. Todd, of Frankfort, Ky., late keeper of the penitentiary of said State, now pending in the Senate, for a refund of internal-revenue taxes collected from him for slaughtering animals to feed the convicts, and taxes collected from him as a manufacturer, and upon articles manufactured in said prison while he was the keeper thereof, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, under and by virtue of the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1887, to take such action upon the same as is therein authorized by section 14 upon reference by the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1858) for the relief of Anne Lucas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1859) for the relief of Felicitas Salinas and others, heirs of Miguel Salinas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1860) to grant the Boisé Basin Bed Rock Flume Company the right of way to construct a bed-rock flume in Idaho; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1861) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue certificates to certain persons who owned buildings on Hot Springs reservation, for the value thereof, which buildings had been condemned and afterward burned; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PADDOCK introduced a bill (S. 1862) granting a pension to Butler Presson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1863) granting a pension to John A. Beltzer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 1864) to provide for the erection of a public building at San Diego, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1865) granting pensions to the surviving members of the Thirty-seventh Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and to the widows of deceased members of said regiment; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1866) for the relief of Enoch Davis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1867) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary L. Ristine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1868) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 1869) to provide for the establishment and maintenance of an Indian industrial school in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1870) granting certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma for the purposes of a public park; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 1871) to perfect the military record of Warren C. Alden; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1872) for the relief of E. W. Ridgway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1873) increasing the rate of pension of W. A. Shappee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1874) granting a pension to Mrs. E. G. C. Abbott; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 1875) for the relief of L. A. Morris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 1876) for the purchase of a site and erection of a custom-house and post-office at St. Albans, Vt.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1877) granting a pension to Harriet L. Vaughan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 1878) for the relief of Catharine Sullivan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1879) for the relief of Joseph Clancey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1881) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin," approved February 6, 1871; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 1882) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Clinton, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1883) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Muscatine, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 46) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lease to the United States Hotel Company, of New Jersey, certain land in Monmouth County, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 47) for the relief of the widow and children of John W. Judson, late agent of the United States at Oswego, N. Y., for public works on Lake Ontario; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 48) authorizing acceptance by Dr. W. J. Hoffman of certain decorations from foreign powers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EASTERN FRONT OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to examine into and report upon the necessity of extending the eastern front of the Capitol, the same to be constructed of marble.

CHANNEL AT ENTRANCE OF DETROIT RIVER.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish, at the earliest time practicable, for the information of the Senate, an estimate of the expense necessary to make the present channel from Grosse Point, in Lake St. Clair, to the entrance of Detroit River, in the State of Michigan, navigable for a width of 800 feet, and with an average depth of water of 20 feet.

RENTED DISTRICT SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a list of all the buildings rented by the District of Columbia for public-school purposes, giving the following information concerning each: Location, name of owner, number and size of schoolrooms it contains, amount of rent paid per annum, valuation of building as assessed by the District, per cent. on valuation paid for rent; also the number of pupils in each of the rented buildings at the present time.

MISSOURI RIVER NAVIGATION AT SIOUX CITY.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate full information, or such information as may be attainable, respecting the present condition of the Missouri River at and in the neighborhood of Sioux City, Iowa, as will show what improvements are needed in aid of the navigation of said river at Sioux City, or in its vicinity.

INTERNATIONAL COINAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered on a previous day by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 30. I gave notice on Thursday last that I should ask its consideration this morning for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 30) relating to international coinage.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On the 20th of December the President of the United States sent to us the following message:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by the report of Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Massachusetts, who was specially designated by me, under the provisions of successive acts of Congress in that behalf, to visit the financial centers of Europe in order to ascertain the feasibility of establishing, by international arrangement, a fixity of ratio between the two precious metals in free coinage of both.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 20, 1887.

He also sent to us the report on that subject. In that report Mr. Atkinson says:

Under instructions from the Department of State, I have visited London and Manchester, Paris, Berlin, Brussels, and Amsterdam, together with other places as circumstances or the necessity for interviews with persons of importance in this discussion have made it expedient.

I have met and consulted many of the financial ministers, the chief officers of all the national banks in the countries named, except one, namely, that of Holland; many officers of private banks and many bankers of distinction, most of the members of the Royal Gold and Silver Commission of Great Britain, which is now engaged in the examination of the same question, and lastly, many leading economists, statisticians, and legislators.

* * * * * * *

After stating the manner in which he proceeded in discharge of the duties assigned him, he submitted, among others, the following conclusions:

1. There is no prospect of any change in the present monetary system of European states which can modify or influence the financial policy of the United States at the present time.

2. There are no indications of any change in the policy of the financial authorities of the several states visited by me which warrant any expectation that the subject of a bimetallic treaty for a common legal tender, coupled with the free coinage of silver, will be seriously considered at the present time by them.

3. There is no indication that the subject of bimetallism has received any intelligent or serious consideration outside of a small circle in each country named, as a probable or possible remedy for the existing causes of alleged depression in trade.

On receiving the report of Mr. Atkinson I drew up the resolution on which I propose to submit a few remarks this morning. I ask that the joint resolution may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution relating to international coinage.

Whereas unsuccessful efforts have, on several occasions, been made by the United States to secure the co-operation of European governments in establishing such a fixed ratio of value between the precious metals as would permit their free coinage and circulation in the commercial countries of the world; and

Whereas the President of the United States, under authority conferred upon him by acts of Congress, recently designated Mr. Edward Atkinson, a citizen of the United States, to visit commercial centers of Europe in order to ascertain the feasibility of establishing by international arrangements a common ratio of value between gold and silver, who, after making the investigation required by his appointment, reported among other conclusions the following:

"First. There is no prospect of any change in the present monetary system of European states which can modify or influence the financial policy of the United States at the present time.

"Second. There are no indications of any change in the policy of the financial authorities of the several states visited by me which warrant any expectation that the subject of a bimetallic treaty for a common legal tender coupled with the free coinage of silver will be seriously considered at the present time by them:" Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no further effort can properly be made by the United States to obtain the co-operation of European governments in establishing a common ratio of value between silver and gold as money, and the policy of the United States in the coinage of the precious metals should not be influenced by the action, present or prospective, of any foreign government or governments in reference to the relative values of gold and silver as money.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The object proposed by the introduction of this resolution is to elicit some expression on the part of Congress in reference to further effort on the part of the United States to effect an arrangement with European powers on the subject of a common ratio of value between gold and silver and their coinage for international circulation.

Many persons in this country whose opinions are entitled to consideration believe that the proper utilization of silver as one of our coins depends upon the consent of leading European governments to its use as money, and are therefore opposed to the present policy of our Government in its coinage as a legal tender in monetary affairs among our own citizens. They insist that an international arrangement with the principal governments of Europe, especially with England, France, and Germany, for the coinage of silver upon a basis agreed upon, is a condition precedent to the proper use of that metal in this country as money, except as subsidiary coin, and demand that efforts should be made and continued to bring about such an agreement as they conceive to be necessary.

There are other persons, equally numerous and respectable, who do not believe that such an arrangement as has been suggested is either possible or essential, and have no idea that any good can result from any effort in that direction. They have not, however, interposed objections to any attempt heretofore made on the part of the United States to secure the co-operation of foreign governments in an international agreement on the subject, and have been content to leave to those who favor such an undertaking the adoption of such means as they desired to test its feasibility.

Several attempts have been made within the last few years to bring about such an arrangement with European powers without any other result than to demonstrate its impracticability and the futility of further attempts in the same direction. The mission of Mr. Atkinson, brought to our attention by the letter he addressed to the President and sent to Congress for its information, seems to have been as fruitless and barren of promise for the future as those which had preceded it, and if the conclusions at which he arrived and announced to the President are correct, it would be folly to attempt further effort to form an alliance with European governments on the subject.

The known character and reputation of Mr. Atkinson compel the acceptance of his conclusions as the honest judgment he had formed of European thought on the subject of his inquiry, but it will do him no injustice to suggest that our preconceived opinions sometimes shape, imperceptibly to ourselves, the judgments we form on any question we may be called upon to investigate. A doubt might therefore be pardoned of the correctness of the judgment formed by Mr. Atkinson upon the views entertained abroad on the subject of silver coinage without reflecting upon his motives or impeaching the honesty of his opinion.

Nor can I suppose, for an instant, that the persons who have urged the appointment of the men selected to visit the commercial centers of Europe in order to ascertain the views there entertained upon the subject were actuated by a desire to secure unfavorable reports, in the hope thereby of obtaining a suspension of silver coinage in this country. I prefer to credit all concerned with a sincere purpose to secure an agreement with foreign powers for the coinage of the precious metal upon a basis which they supposed to be indispensably necessary.

The failure of every attempt which has been made by this country to obtain co-operative action on the part of European powers, and especially the failure of the late mission of Mr. Atkinson, whose conclusions have been laid before us, justifies me in saying that no further effort in that direction can be made by the United States with any hope of success, or with a proper regard to the respect we owe to ourselves.

For one, sir, I do not believe, and never have believed, that any international arrangement which would include some of the European powers, especially England, and perhaps Germany, has ever been or will be possible, at least for many years to come.

No solicitation on our part will influence their monetary policy, and if ever they return to an unrestricted use of both the precious metals as money, it will not be the result of agreement with us, but the outcome of an urgent necessity enforced by the conditions and demands of their own people.

The connection of France with the Latin Union justifies the belief that if free to act upon her own judgment she would at least be willing to confer with the United States upon the subject of a common ratio of value between gold and silver for coin and to provide for their international circulation upon a recognized basis, if it could be done. But her proximity to Germany and England, both standing aloof and hostile to such an arrangement, deprives her of freedom of volition in the matter, and compels her to accept a condition of things which she may not desire but can not prevent.

Germany demonetized her silver at a time when she was receiving from France the gold she demanded from that country as indemnity for the expenses of the war in which the two governments had been engaged, and was for the time freed from the necessity which had before compelled her to use, without discrimination, both gold and silver as money. The present policy of Germany in limiting the use of silver money in the empire furnishes no proof that the German people are opposed to silver coin, but only that Bismarck, whose will is controlling, has decreed a single standard for that country.

England, as the leading commercial power of Europe, drawing her supplies of gold, as well as other things, from the uttermost parts of the earth, has been enabled for more than seventy years to restrict the use of silver coin in that country, and doubtless the men that control her affairs will continue her policy in that regard for some years to come. Great Britain is not a silver-producing country, but a large purchaser of silver bullion, not only for the purposes of the arts but to meet the demands for coinage for her East India and other colonial possessions, and has no desire to aid any scheme that would be likely to advance its price in the markets of the world. It may therefore be readily supposed that she will not willingly abandon her single standard of values so long as she is able to maintain it without serious prejudice to her own interests. There are doubtless many persons in both England and Germany who would be glad to see a return to bimetallism, but in neither country has public opinion the same influence upon the action of government as in this. Even here, where public opinion is far more potential and commands much greater respect, it is sometimes disregarded, at least for a time, in the interests of monopoly, corporate and associated wealth.

It was believed to be the influence of capitalists and associations of men of wealth that led to the demonetization of silver and dropping it from the coins of the country in 1873 and 1874, and we know that with some exceptions that class of men generally opposed its restoration to use in 1878. The same class of persons in England and Germany would doubtless, from the same interested motives, oppose a return to an unrestricted use of silver as money in those countries, and thwart, as far as they could do so, any international arrangement looking to that result.

It is idle, not to say foolish, for us longer to delude ourselves with the expectation that European governments will seriously consider such a proposition.

If, however, it were possible to obtain the consent of the commercial powers of Europe to such an arrangement as has been suggested, difficulties would be presented that it would be hard, if not impossible, to overcome. If the unification of the coins of the countries agreeing to the arrangement was deemed necessary, it would present at once a bar to further negotiations on the subject. Unification could only take place by a surrender on the part of each country of its present coins and the acceptance of such as should be adopted for universal circulation. We would not be willing to give up our dollar, and France would be as unwilling to part with her franc, and the same reluctance would be manifested by other countries to a surrender of their coins. Impossible as an agreement on a common coin might be found, it is equally as feasible as an adjustment of other questions which would arise, and which it is unnecessary now to suggest, because, as I before remarked, I do not believe an international arrangement on the subject now or hereafter a possibility.

Nor do I believe such an arrangement desirable, and I should regret to see the United States enter into such alliance with any European power, if there were no difficulties in the way. Whatever temporary advantage might accrue to this country therefrom would be more than offset by embarrassments arising from the partnership into which we had entered. The coinage of both gold and silver would be subject to restriction or suspension by the determination of the countries with which we had entered into league. We could not determine our own action in reference to the amount of either of the precious metals which should be struck at our mints, but, like the states of the Latin Union, would be controlled by the determination of the governments with which we had entered into an agreement. The coinage of money is not a subject for international arrangement, but the proper concern of each government for itself, and no free people can afford to surrender this right to the control of others.

The resolution now before the Senate expresses no opinion upon the present policy of this country in the coinage of either gold or silver, and is neither calculated nor designed to elicit debate upon that subject. Its only purpose, in view of the repeated rejection by European powers of overtures on our part to confer with them on the feasibility of an international arrangement for fixing a common ratio of values between silver and gold, is to elicit some expression on the part of Congress in reference to the propriety of further attempts to obtain the co-operation of foreign governments in an extended utilization of silver as money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to allow that to be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. BLAIR. I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware will proceed on the joint resolution introduced by him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The failures experienced in the efforts heretofore made to secure such co-operation should satisfy us that future attempts would prove useless, even if an international arrangement was desirable or possible. The policy of this country in the coinage of the precious metals must be in the future as in the past determined by ourselves, and should not be influenced by the present or prospective action of foreign governments.

We stand in a different relation to the question of silver coinage from that occupied by any European government. Our mines produce more silver than those of all Europe combined, and nearly one-half of all that is produced in the world; and we have a greater interest in its utilization than any other country. Our separation from the Old World renders us free from many of the embarrassments experienced by European governments, not only in regard to their political policies, but also in the adjustment of many of their domestic affairs.

The only interest we have, as I conceive, in European opinion on the subject of silver coinage is the effect which that opinion may have upon the action of the governments of Europe upon their own coinage. If those countries should be induced by the force of opinion among themselves to return to the free coinage of silver it would increase the demand for the products of our mines and enhance the price of bullion in the market; but it would not add one farthing to the value of our standard silver dollar as money in transactions among ourselves. Our coins of both gold and silver as money have in our own country no greater or less value than that which is imparted to them by law. We are therefore not dependent, as some have seemed to suppose, upon the action of foreign governments either to the extent to which silver shall be used in this country as money or the ratio of value it shall bear to gold for that purpose.

I do not know to what extent the conclusions of Mr. Atkinson reflect the sentiments of the people of any European country which he visited on the question he was charged to investigate. They doubtless embody the views of those with whom he conferred upon the subject, and I will not even suggest that his estimate of public opinion on the subject of his inquiry was influenced by his own private opinion on the propriety of silver coinage in this country; but I may be allowed to say that statements have from time to time been made by others that there was a conviction in the minds of many intelligent financiers in England that that country would at no very distant day be compelled to return to the unrestricted use of both the precious metals in monetary affairs, without limitation as to the amount that should be coined of either or discrimination in their use in monetary affairs. Perhaps if some intelligent advocate of a double standard had been designated to make the inquiry with which Mr. Atkinson was charged, he might have discovered a current of thought different from that with which Mr. Atkinson was brought in contact, and submitted conclusions varying essentially from those sent to us by the President.

Whatever may be the condition of public sentiment in England or elsewhere in Europe in reference to the use of silver as money, it is high time that we had ceased all effort to obtain the assent of foreign powers to its coinage or to the functions it shall perform. Such efforts have secured no good results in the past, and it is pretty certain that they would accomplish nothing if continued.

I am not prepared to say that the anxiety heretofore manifested to secure the assent of foreign governments to an international arrangement in the matter has had the effect to retard a return to silver coinage in those countries or to lessen the value of bullion in the market; but the repeated rejection of solicitations on our part for co-operation is calculated to make the impression here and elsewhere that the continuance of our own policy in the coinage of silver depends upon the action of other powers, and as a consequence may lessen the appreciation of silver coins by our own citizens and discourage the use of silver as money in other countries.

I have called the attention of the Senate to this matter in the hope that some action may be taken by Congress that will prevent hereafter any attempt to secure an arrangement such as has been sought, and prevent the injury which may result from further unsuccessful efforts in that direction.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I rise now not to debate this proposition, because I know the Senator from New Hampshire desires to go on with his bill, but to ask the Senator from Delaware not to seek to refer this resolution to the Committee on Finance at present. I desire also to ask him whether there is any objection to allowing it to lie on the table for a few days until some of us who desire to be heard may present our views on the subject to which it relates.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. BECK. As the Senator from Delaware agrees to allow the resolution to lie on the table for the present until I and others can be heard, I only propose now to ask the consent of the Senate to have printed, so that they may accompany the report of Mr. Atkinson to the Finance Committee, the answers given to certain questions proposed by the committee of the English Parliament of which Lord Iddesleigh was president. These responses were made by twenty-seven of the most intelligent financiers, chambers of commerce, and bank officials in that country, and were furnished to me by the American minister to England. They almost unanimously attribute the depression of trade and prices to the demonetization of silver by Germany and the United States in 1873. I desire to append the facts they state to the report of Mr. Atkinson, as he has not seen fit to notice them.

Mr. CHACE. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? I did not understand what report this is to go with.

Mr. BECK. With the report of Mr. Edward Atkinson in regard to silver.

Mr. CHACE. That report has been printed, has it not?

Mr. BECK. That report has been printed, and I desire, as he has seen fit to leave out the statements made before the committee of the English Parliament, and to confine himself to opinions and lectures of his own, to show that he had or could have had before him, and that we ought to have before us, the testimony taken before the parliamentary committee of twenty-one, which was the basis of the present royal commission of eleven, which committee, I believe, will report against the restoration of silver coinage as an equal legal tender with gold. I have no doubt that Mr. Atkinson has contributed somewhat, as Mr. Manton Marble did before, to bring about that result. Be that as it may, I want the testimony that was taken before the Iddesleigh commission printed to go along with Mr. Atkinson's report, so that the Finance Committee and the Senate can have the real views of those people as given before their own commission. If it is printed in that form it will save me from reading it at length on this floor, because it shall be placed before the Senate in some way or other, and I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read it.

Mr. CHACE. I do not rise to make any objection whatever to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. While I, as the Senator well knows, do not agree with the judgment of Mr. Atkinson in regard to this and many other matters, I suppose that the Senator does not intend to cast any reflection of unfairness upon that gentleman in regard to his report.

Mr. BECK. Any reflection upon Mr. Atkinson? Of course not, any more than I would cast a reflection upon the Senator from Rhode Island, because of his what I call very peculiar views on taxation and protection to American industry. Mr. Atkinson was a curious man to select and send abroad as a friend of silver coinage in the face of his well-known record, I must say.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator from Kentucky will remember that he is as much in accord with the gentleman as I am.

Mr. BECK. I would regard the Senator from Rhode Island, for example, no matter how able and honest he may be, as a very unfit man to select to determine or advise how far taxes should be reduced on cotton goods. I make no reflection upon either him or Mr. Atkinson by these statements.

Mr. CHACE. In that case I suppose the Senator would select Edward Atkinson.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky how he proposes to have the document which he holds in his hand printed?

Mr. BECK. I only ask to have it printed as a supplement to the report of Mr. Atkinson, so that we can have it before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the Senator is aware that Mr. Atkinson's report is already printed.

Mr. BECK. It has been printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it not be wise to have this matter so printed that it can be appended in some way to that particular document?

Mr. BECK. I should like very much to have in that form if I could.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like very much to see it attached to the document of Mr. Atkinson.

Mr. STEWART. I think that would be very improper. We should have a little glimpse of both sides.

Mr. BECK. I will not ask any action upon it now. I will consult with the members of the Committee on Finance to-morrow when it meets as to the best way to get it before the Senate. The Senator from Iowa will be there. I do not want to consume time now.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 3) to remove the political disabilities of William W. Mackall, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 4811) for the relief of Robert Johnston, of New York; and

A bill (H. R. 5932) providing for the holding of the terms of the United States courts in the district of Minnesota.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 108) for the relief of John C. Weaver;

A bill (H. R. 439) for the relief of Grovenor A. Curtice;

A bill (H. R. 481) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt;

A bill (H. R. 482) for the relief of Levi Jones;

A bill (H. R. 1387) for the relief of the volunteers of the Fourth Regiment of Iowa Infantry;

A bill (H. R. 2993) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Austin, Tex., a tract of land in said city for educational purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3758) for the relief of the legal heirs of Fidus Livermore, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 3957) for the relief of Peter March, Thomas J. Wright, administrator, and others.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 322) for the relief of B. M. Parish;

A bill (H. R. 611) for the relief of Mrs. P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of the Baptist Female College of Lexington, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 4907) for the relief of John M. Higgins, sr.; and

A bill (H. R. 4908) for the relief of the heirs of A. Gates Lee and heirs of B. P. Lee, deceased.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 120) for the relief of Charlotte Caroline Hackleman;

A bill (H. R. 440) granting a pension to Mary C. Knight; and

A bill (H. R. 880) granting a pension to Mary Everingham Brown.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. 48) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson—to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The bill (H. R. 76) for the relief of L. A. Morris—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 593) for the relief of James Albert Bonsack—to the Committee on Patents.

The bill (H. R. 4327) regulating the construction of bridges over the Muskingum River, in Ohio—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 4556) to confirm New Madrid location, survey No. 2889, and to provide for issue of patent therefor—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 4910) to amend section 14 of the act approved March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," and relating to second-class mail matter—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 647) for the relief of Gottlob Groezinger—to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLATT. I gave notice on Thursday last that I should ask the indulgence of the Senate to-day to make some remarks upon the motion to refer the President's message. That is a matter which ordinarily ought to have come up in the morning hour. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has the floor to-day on the educational bill, and I am about to ask that Senator and also the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to favor me by allowing me to go on at this time, if it does not occasion too much inconvenience. I suppose the Senate will have to endure it sooner or later, and perhaps it might as well do so to-day as at any other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the pending business, being the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, be informally laid aside to enable him to call up for consideration the motion to refer the President's message.

Mr. BLAIR. This bill has been laid aside so much for the accommodation of individual members of the Senate that I have been subjected to a great deal of unpleasant criticism, and if it would answer the Senator's purpose as well to ask that the Senate postpone this bill until the completion of his remarks, the Senate taking the responsibility of doing it, it would gratify me. I have no objection personally to the request of the Senator from Connecticut. Perhaps it is not necessary to make the formal motion I suggest, and I shall make no objection to the request if no other Senator does.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator knows that I could under the rules of the Senate make my remarks on his bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President's annual message be referred to the Committee on Finance.

MAILING OF PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to give way for me to secure the passage of a little bill that will take but a very few moments. It is Order of Business 162.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to yielding for the passage of any measure which will not occasion debate, but of course I do not wish to yield for anything which will occasion debate.

Mr. SAWYER. This can not occasion any debate. The substance of the whole bill I will state. The law now is that all residents of a county may receive one copy of a newspaper published in the county through the mail free of charge. This is to allow men to get their paper mail free within the county though they may live a little outside the county line. That is all there is in the bill; I ask for its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. Reserving my right to object if it occasions debate, I give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 162, being Senate bill 1627.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1627) to amend section 25 of the act of March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes."

The bill proposes to amend section 25 of the act of March 3, 1879, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 25. That publications of the second class, one copy to each actual subscriber residing in the county where the same are printed, in whole or in part, and published, or to each such subscriber who, though residing in another county, may receive one copy of such publication at a post-office within the county of publication, shall go free through the mails; but the same shall not be delivered at letter-carrier offices, or distributed by carriers, unless postage is paid thereon at the rate prescribed in section 13 of this act: Provided, That the rate of postage on newspapers, excepting weeklies and periodicals not exceeding 2 ounces in weight, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, shall be uniform at 1 cent each; periodicals weighing more than 2 ounces shall be subject, when delivered by such carriers, to a postage of 2 cents each, and these rates shall be prepaid by stamps affixed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTRADITION TREATY.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator to allow me to make a brief statement.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator propose to take up some time?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Not a minute. I have here a copy of an agreement between Prussia and Russia "concerning the reciprocal extradition of malefactors" that I have no idea the chairman of Foreign Relations will allow me to put on the record, but I think it would come in very well in connection with the printing of the document which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] proposed awhile ago, and in presenting it I ask that it be understood that the remarks in the document are not mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand what disposition the Senator from Virginia desires made of the document which he has sent to the desk.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am not particular about it. It comes to me in that form. I want it to go in the RECORD and go before the people. They will get it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand what disposition the Senator desired to have made of it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The disposition I propose to make of it is to get it before the Senate, and then I know where it will go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will lie on the table.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN December 19, 1887, to refer the annual message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, is the President of the United States a free-trader? That is the pertinent question; a question which interests not only the Nation, but every individual citizen of the Nation; a question which touches the future welfare and prosperity not only of our Nation, but of all its citizens; and I do not propose to be deterred from asking and, if I can, from answering this question, because the President suggests that "to dwell upon the theories of protection and free trade savors too much of bandying epithets." I am a protectionist, and I consider it no epithet when I am called so. If the President of the United States is a free-trader, he ought to be willing to be called so, and not consider it an epithet if that word is used to define his position.

He sent to Congress at its opening the most remarkable paper ever submitted to Congress by the chief executive officer of the Nation. He did it, I suppose, in what he thought was the discharge of his constitutional duty to communicate to Congress from time to time "information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." But no President preceding him ever omitted to give Congress full information as to the state of the Union. No other President has ignored all questions but one. In our darkest days, in all our wars, in the war of 1812, and in our recent war of the rebellion, a President of the United States never hesitated and never failed to communicate to Congress full information relating to all the departments of government such as he thought Congress needed to receive.

We call this paper by courtesy "the President's annual message;" and I shall call it the President's annual message. In that we were told that there was an accumulation of money in the Treasury, that the laws raised more money annually than the Treasury under law could expend annually, and that this condition of things must be remedied in one way, and one way only—that was the practical, substantial recommendation of the message—and that method was by reducing the duties upon manufactured goods, passing by every other method. Some of the other methods he directly intimated were improper methods of reduction, and others he indirectly intimated were improper methods of reduction. Passing by all other methods, he insists that the reduction shall be made by reducing our tariff duties upon manufactured goods; in other words, that there is no reduction of this surplus in the Treasury and no reduction of the yearly annual surplus under our taxation which meets his approval, and I think I may say which will meet his approval, unless that method strikes down the protective system of the United States. That is the President's message.

It was hailed with acclamations of joy by every free-trader in whatever land he resided; and I want to say right here that free-traders know each other. They never make any mistake; there is some bond of union and sympathy between them so that they know each other on sight, and know each other when they speak, either to one another or to the people. They require no freemason's grip and sign in order to recognize each other. They never make a mistake in that respect. Wherever there was a free-trader upon the broad globe this message was hailed with acclamations of joy. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] a few days ago quoted from the English free-trade journals the most fulsome commendations of President Cleveland and his utterance. It was accepted at first by the whole Democratic party of the land, and its papers in this country rang with commendations of the President because he had forced this issue of free trade to the front and made it the issue of the next Presidential campaign.

I think no man will dispute me when I say that perhaps there is no more distinguished representative of free trade in this country than Mr. Frank Hurd, of Ohio. Let us see how he regarded the message, for as I do not wish to duplicate the extracts from English journals I will confine myself to some extracts from the utterances of leading free-traders in America. Mr. Hurd, in an interview, which was first published, I believe, in the Chicago Tribune, in relation to an appeal that had been made to him by the Cobden Club for a contribution, to which he responded by giving $50, had his attention called to the message, and he was asked whether the Cobden Club would take any part in the coming campaign, and he said:

We have no need of allies since the President sent his message to Congress. I shall never be able to describe the joy with which I read that message. I was in New York. I was standing at the corner of Wall street and Broadway. I took the paper mechanically from a newsboy, expecting nothing but a repetition of former messages. When my eyes fell on the pages I grew suddenly intent. The great crowd swept by me, but I did not see it. People jostled me, but I did not feel them. All I felt was that the issue of free trade was now decisively brought before the American people, and that its cause was more than half won.

The interviewer then said, "How do you suppose the President arrived at his present views?" and Mr. Hurd replied:

He came to Washington predisposed to free trade. There he met CARLISLE; he met Morrison; he was in daily intercourse with the opponents of protection. He saw his duty clearly ahead of him, and when duty beckons to President Cleveland no power on earth can turn him aside from it.

He was then asked:

Do you feel certain that he has raised the issue of the coming campaign? Absolutely certain. Congress will do nothing about the matter.

And eight weeks having passed since that message was sent to us and not a whisper having been heard from any friend of the President in Congress looking to doing anything, I assume that Mr. Hurd was right.

Congress will do nothing about the matter. We shall enter into the Presidential contest with the issue precisely as it stands to-day. And when the Presidential contest is ended the issue will be definitely ended.

Perhaps the next most conspicuous representative of free-trade sentiment in the country outside of Congress may be said to be Mr. Henry Watterson. He spoke only so lately as January 21, in New York, and the toast to which he spoke was, "The platform and the outlook." He said:

The platform is the message—the President's message.

The outlook is most encouraging. Considering how the painted harlot of protection is whistling to keep her courage up as she stalks across the graveyard of false vows and broken promises she has made mainly to the work-people, I should call it assured.

For more than a year my fear has been that we might not be able in advance of our national convention to close ranks and move in a solid column against the enemy on distinct lines of our own deliberate choosing—

And anybody knows what the lines of Mr. Watterson's choosing are—and as I believe that nothing clears the political atmosphere like plain speaking right out in meeting, I have given the Administration and the country the best the shop has afforded in the way of a disagreeable persistency and the sincerest candor. It was obvious to my mind that unless we could agree in Congress we should not agree in convention. The tariff plank in the last national Democratic platform was not intended to be a straddle, because although the platform committee had been adroitly packed in the interest of protection, the revenue reformers were still strong enough to hold their ground and to carry all their points. But it was made to seem a straddle. Hence nothing short of a declaration which might not bear two constructions would satisfy the demands of reform in the next national platform, and any one could see that this could not be obtained without a fight and possibly a split. Just in nick of time the President came to the rescue with the wisdom of an impetuous courage and the craft of a common sense deriving its strength from its integrity. This brave and honest man, this puzzle to the politicians and contradiction of all experience, with a single stroke of his pen, did what might for years have baffled the efforts of the greatest statesmen and philosophers. By that act he has reversed the situation from one of cowardly indecision to one of enthusiasm and confidence. He has forced the enemy back behind his earthworks and warned stragglers to come into camp. Upon the lines of that message I would rather be beaten than win upon those of a lying substitute.

I think I make no mistake when I call our late minister to London a free-trader. In the days of the holiday season, when everybody was full of peace and good-will, the tariff reformers, as they call themselves, the tariff anarchists, as I call them, because they have no conception of reform except through the methods of destruction—the tariff anarchists held a banquet in Boston at which Mr. James Russell Lowell presided, and after the cloth had been removed, at that period of the banquet when people are very apt to express their real and true sentiments, he made use of this language:

Personally I confess that I feel myself strongly attached to Mr. Cleveland as the best representative of the higher type of Americanism that we have seen since Lincoln was snatched from us.

I do not know whether Mr. Lowell intended to include in his comparison all representative Americans, all the men of America outside of the Presidential office. If he did, there are names which rise at once to the lips, which might be spoken, which all the people would hail as great, noble representatives of true Americanism.

But I will assume that he intended to confine his comparisons to the ranks of Presidents. He has held office under three of them, and it seems to me that fidelity and loyalty to his chiefs at least ought to have prompted the remembrance of them. There were two of those Presidents whom it seems to me no man whose ears have not been stopped and whose eyes have not been blinded by free trade could have overlooked.

One there was who led the embattled hosts of the Union to victory over rebellion, a rebellion the most causeless and the most detestable which this world has ever seen. He laid down his sword with the simple words, now immortal, "Let us have peace," and twice the people, the plain people of this land, who have not been dazzled by the splendors of foreign courts and whose heads have not been turned by the flattery of foreign aristocracy, raised him to the highest place in the gift of the people. At the end of the discharge of that trust he laid down his Presidential honors as simply as he laid down his sword, and then the whole world rose and competed to do him honor. Later, when he was struck by the dart of the Destroyer, how an anxious, waiting people stood with bated breath that they might hear the tidings from Mount McGregor; and at last, when he who on earth knew no surrender was forced to unconditional surrender, and that mournful, mighty funeral procession moved up Broadway to Riverside, every American citizen stood with uncovered head, feeling that we had lost the greatest and noblest type of true Americanism that there was in the land.

Another there was, Mr. President, born in humblest life, battling with and conquering adverse fortune at every turn, lifted by these same plain people to the highest office in his district, his State, and in the Nation. He was recognized as a true, noble type of the highest Americanism, with a heart full of sympathy for the common people, one that beat responsive and quick to the popular will. He stood forth by general consent the man who well represented the people. Stricken down by an assassin; how we all mourned! And as at Elberon the sad sea waves moaned his requiem, every American citizen felt that we must lay again in the "soil" of which Mr. Lowell speaks one of the noblest types of true Americanism.

But Grant and Garfield are dead. In the temple of fame which America raises to her best beloved and her greatest, they are to have no position; or if any position at all is to be accorded to them by this English-loving free-trader, it is to be subordinate to Cleveland. Grant and Garfield are dead, but they were not free-traders, and in the opinion of the ex-minister to the English court their luster is eclipsed by the sudden brilliancy of Grover Cleveland.

Mr. President, I think there will be no question made but that Henry George is a free-trader, the only person in the land, so far as I know, who uses the term "free trade" in its most radical and absolute sense. He not only believes that all custom-houses should be abolished, of course including the abolition of all taxes upon imports, but that all taxes should be abolished except those which he calls taxes upon ostentation and upon land values, and he says that that is the only logical tendency and consequence of free trade. He thinks the President's message was a free-trade message. Only so short a time ago as Saturday evening, in an interview, published in this city, he is represented as writing a telegram when he was found by the interviewer, and he said:

"I think Mr. Cleveland's last message strengthened him," he said to a Star reporter. Then he handed his dispatch to the operator and resumed: "If the Democrats fight on the plain issue of free trade, and make it strong, I think they will win. But they must go into it boldly. It won't do to be 'man 'fraid of his horse.' If Mr. Cleveland sticks to his message he will be elected."

He turned to translate his dispatch to the operator, and then added:

"They must make the issue free trade."

"You look upon the President's message as a free-trade document?" suggested the Star.

"Certainly," was the reply. "Don't you? If they stand by that it will be all right."

Not only Democrats but Republicans took it in that sense. They accepted it; they welcomed the contest; they have been looking for it—a contest which was to come, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] said, with "closed ranks," in which the Republicans should represent the system and principle of protection, and in which the Democrats should boldly avow the sentiment which nine-tenths of them profess—free trade. We thought that for once we were going to have a fair fight, in which there was to be no evasion; which was not to be made to serve two purposes; which was in no sense to resemble that god of ancient mythology, Janus; that we were not to have a Janus-faced party to contend with any longer; that we were not to have a campaign in which the Democratic party looking south was to wear a free-trade face, and looking north to New York and New Jersey and Connecticut was to wear a protection face; and we welcomed that contest, and whenever we can have it I welcome it as a member of the Republican party, and if we fail in it we will go down, and I know that when we fail on that issue we shall go down in the common disaster and disgrace of our country.

Democrats and Republicans looked upon this message as they thought they had a right to look upon it—as the ante-convention acceptance of a nomination for a second term "wrung" from a reluctant party; at least that appeared then to be as good as wrung from a reluctant party.

But eight weeks have passed, and this universal exultation seems to be somewhat tempered by sadness. The few protection Democrats, after the first gush of admiration for the President, began to realize that something had hit them. They did not know exactly what it was. They were in the condition of the man who is hit by some unseen blow—a sort of dazed condition for a while, and then it occurred to them suddenly that there was a Presidential election approaching in New York, and in New Jersey, and in Connecticut, and it would never do to have it understood in those States that the President was a free-trader. And so the old game was set on foot again.

Free-traders know each other, as I have remarked. There was no doubt as to how this message would be understood and what the President would be understood to be in the Southern and Western States; but it was seen to be necessary again to convince the Democratic protectionists of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut that, after all, the President's message was not a free-trade message, but a pretty good protection document. So up went the waterpots onto each shoulder, and the Democratic party evidently is to essay again the feat of carrying water upon both shoulders without spilling a drop. The message is to be made a "straddle" notwithstanding Mr. Henry Watterson.

The present incumbent of the Presidential chair could never have been elected if he had written that message previous to the last Presidential election. He can not be elected now, unless it can be explained away to the Democrats in Connecticut and New York and New Jersey, who believe and know that the best interests of this country are to be subserved by a continuance of its protective policy. The past and present attitude of the Democratic party upon this subject reminds me of nothing so much in the world as the relatives and acquaintances of a person in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Mr. By-ends, of the town of Fair-speech. When Christian and Hopeful had escaped the persecutions of the town of Vanity Fair, where Faithful lost his life, they met on the way this Mr. By-ends, and Christian soon discovered who he was, and proceeded to interrogate him. He asked him who his kindred were. Mr. By-ends replied:

Almost the whole town, and in particular my Lord Turn-about, my Lord Time-server, my Lord Fair-speech, from whose ancestors that town first took its name; also Mr. Smoothman, Mr. Facing-both-ways, Mr. Anything, and the parson of our parish, Mr. Two-tongues, was my mother's own brother by my father's side; and to tell you the truth I am become a gentleman of good quality. Yet my grandfather was but a waterman, looking one way and rowing another, and I got most of my estate by the same occupation.

Then, after a little, he said, referring to his wife:

My wife is a very virtuous woman—the daughter of a very virtuous woman. She was my Lady Feigning's daughter; therefore, she came of a very honorable family, and is arrived to such a pitch of breeding that she knows how to carry it to all—even to prince and peasant.

Nothing could more accurately describe the Democratic party in past campaigns and the Democratic party as I am convinced it is to be in the coming campaign, than this extract from Pilgrim's Progress. Tammany Hall, indeed, was so disturbed lest somebody should suspect that the President was a free-trader, that its cohorts gravely resolved in convention that—

We believe that free trade is a myth as long as the Government expenditures require the raising of a revenue, and we believe that such revenue should be raised by such a tariff as will protect American industry and insure the highest wages and make the necessaries of life as cheap as possible for the workingman.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] waxes indignant. He says that the President's message "is falsely and foolishly stigmatized as a free-trade document," and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]

quotes the sop which the President flung to the laboring man, and says:

So we see that the cry of the demagogue the country over that the President and his policy are aiming at the lessening of a just reward of the labor of the country is as indecent as it is false.

These Senators are moved to the use of pretty expressive language, to say the least. It strikes me that there may be a shiver of apprehension in the minds of both of them, which accounts for this strong language; but the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], shivering lest the internal-revenue taxes should not be abolished, comes to the relief of the President, and he suggests a plan, novel upon that side, yet full of truth and significance. He would repeal the internal-revenue taxes that he might reach free trade through the reduction of revenue duties, knowing that any lowering of tariff duties must inevitably raise the revenue—at least any lowering of such duties to the extent of destroying their protective character. He would reduce taxation by the repeal of internal-revenue taxes below the actual needs of Government, and then to meet the deficiency would increase our income by the reduction of tariff duties.

We have seen what free-traders thought of the message, what protectionists thought of the message. Now let us judge it by the record.

What is free trade? There is but one answer. Nowhere where the English language is spoken has the term "free trade," as used in reference to the operations of government, as used in reference to taxation, any other significance than that of anti-protection. These two great systems stand with their policies clearly defined and marked out. On the one side is protection, on the other side is free trade. Has it any other meaning in that land from which so many of the arguments come for free trade? Has it any other meaning in the land of the Cobden Club? Not at all. Everybody knows that the English system is the free-trade system and that the American system is the protective system. These words are simply the opposites of each other, and that system which does not recognize protection is universally called and rightly called the free-trade system.

Let us look at the English system for a minute. But before I come to that, perhaps I should quote the definition of a distinguished free-trader as to what free trade is. I quote from Professor Sumner in his recent work on Protectionism, and I will ask the Secretary to read what I have marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

What, then, is a protective tax? In order to join issue as directly as possible I will quote the definition given by a leading protectionist journal of both free trade and protection:

"The term 'free trade,' although much discussed, is seldom rightly defined. It does not mean the abolition of custom-houses, nor does it mean the substitution of direct for indirect taxation, as a few American disciples of the school have supposed. It means such an adjustment of taxes on imports as will cause no diversion of capital, from any channel into which it would otherwise flow, into any channel opened or favored by the legislation which enacts the customs. A country may collect its entire revenue by duties on imports, and yet be an entirely free-trade country, so long as it does not lay those duties in such a way as to lead any one to undertake any employment or make any investment he would avoid in the absence of such duties. Thus, the customs duties levied by England, with a very few exceptions, are not inconsistent with her profession of being a country which believes in free trade. They either are duties on articles not produced in England or they are exactly equivalent to the excise duties levied on the same articles if made at home. They do not lead any one to put his money into the home prodution of an article, because they do not discriminate in favor of the home producer.

"A protective duty, on the other hand, has for its object to effect the diversion of a part of the capital and labor of the people out of the channels in which it would run otherwise into channels favored or created by law."

I know of no definitions of these two things which have ever been made by anybody which are more correct than these. I accept them and join issue on them.

Mr. PLATT. What is the English free-trade system? Let me quote from Consul Dockery in his report from Leeds, September 1, 1881. He says:

Comparatively to population more revenue is annually collected at English custom-houses than at those of any other country in the world, excepting the United States, the total amount during the past year having reached $96,000,000, while the United States, with nearly twice as large a population, collected $186,000,000 in the same period. Germany, with a much larger population than England, collected from customs $78,000,000.

The chief items of receipt under the head of customs duties during the past year were from—

|---|---|
| Chicory | $360,000 |
| Cocoa | 230,000 |
| Coffee | 1,025,000 |
| Currants | 1,380,000 |
| Figs | 130,000 |
| Raisins | 775,000 |
| Rum | 11,510,000 |
| Brandy | 7,935,000 |
| Tea | 18,500,000 |
| Tobacco and snuff | 43,000,000 |
| Wine | 7,000,000 |

The following is a list of dutiable articles, namely: Alcohol, ale, beer, brandy, playing-cards, chicory, chloroform, chloral hydrate, cigars and cigarettes, cocoa, coffee, collodion, cologne-water, cordials, currants, essence of spruce, ether, iodide of ethyl, figs, fig-cake, preserved fruit (in spirits), naphtha, pickles, gold and silver plate, plums and prunes, raisins, soap, tea, gin, rum, whisky, all other spirits, wine, and varnish; and besides these there are about ninety or one hundred articles, chiefly from America, and principally patent medicines, which are held to be liable to a duty of $3.36 per gallon.

There are in Great Britain and Ireland no less than thirty-three customs districts, each with a collector or superintendent and subordinates. In London alone the number of customs officers exceeds 1,550, while in Liverpool about 650 are employed, aggregating for the two ports 2,220 officials. These facts and figures do not look well as regards the much vaunted idea of a free and untrammeled trade.

Again he says:

They—

affect great repugnance to any country that has a tariff of 50 or 100 per cent. ad valorem on any article. In their own country on one article a duty of nearly 2,000 per cent. is charged and collected; this article yields them their largest item of customs revenue, and it comes chiefly from the United States. Tobacco is the article. It is classed in their own tariff list as an article subject to "ordinary import duty," in contradistinction to a "countervailing duty," such, for instance, as the customs duty on spirits and everything else subject to internal-revenue duty. On tobacco (which is in very general use by the laboring classes in England, and which is consequently of the cheapest kind) the duty ranges, according to moisture, from 84 to 92 cents per pound for the raw or unmanufactured article, and if manufactured it pays a duty of from $1.01 to $1.16 per pound. This is called (in England) a revenue duty. I can not see it in that light, as the manipulated article is distinctly charged, say, 20 cents per pound more than the raw article. As a matter of fact, it is so strongly protective that it prevents Americans from successfully competing with the English manufacturers in England, owing to their being handicapped with an additional 20 cents per pound on the manufactured article.

This is an enormous protection. A great part of the tobacco consumed in England is of an inferior quality, its original cost at the American shipping port having been not more than 6 cents per pound. It pays, if not manipulated, say a 92-cent revenue duty on entering England, and if made into smoking or plug tobacco it pays $1.16, or an additional 24 cents per pound duty. Here we have a revenue duty of, say, 1,530 per cent., and a further strictly protective duty of 400 per cent., making in all a duty of 1,930 per cent.

Cigars pay a duty of $1.32 per pound. I do not give undue prominence to this one article, since it is one from which the large amount of $43,000,000 of duty was collected last year.

I will refer to one portion of the English tariff in detail, and that is the tariff upon tobacco, on which they lay a duty of about 1,500 per cent. as a revenue duty and about 400 per cent. as a protective duty, making about 1,900 per cent. in all. I take this from the English tariff, as reported by Consul-General Waller very recently:

| Tobacco: | |
|---|---|
| Unmanufactured, per pound | $0.85 |
| Containing less than 10 per cent. of moisture, per pound | .93 |
| Cigars, per pound | 1.34 |
| "Cavendish" or "Negro-head," per pound | 1.17 |
| Same, manufactured in bond, per pound | 1.65 |
| Snuff, per pound | .99 |
| Snuff, not more than 13 pounds (in 100 pounds) moisture, per pound | 1.17 |
| Other, manufactured, per pound | 1.65 |

So it will be seen that England, with all its free-trade pretensions, does not hesitate to lay a protective tax, a duty to protect its manufactures, upon some of its imports. With these exceptions, however, the English system consists of the imposition of purely revenue duties, and nobody will deny that the system in England, which is called free trade there, is what the Democratic party of this country means to adopt. England, with its thirty-three customs districts, is still acknowledged to be a free-trade country.

Do not juggle with words any longer. Do not go to the people of the United States and say to them the Democratic party is not a free-trade party because it does not intend to abolish the custom-houses, because it intends to keep up a revenue tax, but just let us have this issue boldly made, Does or does not the Democratic party propose to take off the protective feature from our import duties? If so, I contend, and the whole world bears me out in the definition, that it is for free trade.

So, then, I come to this question, Does the President of the United States, as judged by his message, intend the destruction of the protective system? The honest and bold and avowed free-traders, who are not ashamed to be called free-traders, as I have shown, think that he does. He certainly argues their case for them. I call Senators to witness that no free-trader in this country or England would more boldly argue in book or pamphlet or in newspaper, or on platform would more boldly speak than the President has in his message. Listen to these words:

But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended.

Is that aimed at irregularities in the system, or is it aimed at the system itself? Does that mean that if there are inequalities in the system, if one article has too high a rate of duty and another too low, if the different interests of the country are not fairly treated, revision and amendment should be made, or does it mean that the whole system which he denounces as vicious, illogical, and unjust shall be done away with? Let me read the rest of that paragraph:

These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty. So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people who never use and never saw any of the foreign products purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles. Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer. This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction—

I should think not—

but in order that we may be constantly reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume domestic products as well as those who consume imported articles, and thus create a tax upon all our people.

Mr. President, is that the language of a protectionist or of a free-trader? There is not a free-trade club in the United States or in England where that would not be adopted and accepted as the language of a free-trader. As I said, it is not aimed at irregularities, it is not aimed at inequalities, but it is aimed at what the President assumes to be the protective tax, and it is that which is to be stricken down.

Will some Democrat who insists that the President is a protectionist rise to explain this language? Nay, more; there are 37 Democrats sitting on that side of the Chamber. Will any one of them rise in his place and say the President of the United States is in his judgment a protectionist? They dare not go to the country on any such issue. They are like the animal that is between the two bundles of hay.

I wish to look a little more particularly and carefully at what the fundamental propositions of the free-traders are, and see whether the President stands with them or whether he stands with the protectionists. The first fundamental proposition of the free-trader may be stated thus: "The price of the home-made article is enhanced approximately by the amount of the duty on the foreign-made article, and such enhancement is a tax which the consumer pays to the home manufacturer." I have stated that proposition in almost identically the language which I have read from the President's message, and it will be recognized as the fundamental proposition of even doctrinaire free-traders, professors of free trade and of political economy in our colleges. Perhaps it was stated a little more strongly by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] the other day in some remarks upon the educational bill.

The Senator from Maryland said:

> The best-informed statisticians declare, and I fully believe, that, so far as it is raised from duties on imports, for every dollar that goes into the Treasury at least three will go into the pockets of the manufacturers; so that if $200,000,000 are collected upon importations under the tariff, some $600,000,000 at least will annually go into the hands of this favored class. This becomes apparent when you remember that our last census reports, with a moderate allowance for the increment since 1880, show the annual value of our home manufactures to be $6,000,000,000, and that if we put at only 10 per cent. the average increase of the cost of these home products caused by our war tariff it will make the people of this country pay to the producers of these manufactures at least $600,000,000 per annum, which is just three times as much as goes into the people's Treasury.

Mr. FRYE. Who said that?

Mr. PLATT. That was said by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] in his speech upon the educational bill the other day. I speak of it merely for the purpose of showing what the free-traders' proposition is, and although it is not stated perhaps so boldly in the President's message, that is the tone of the extract which I have read from his message.

If the manufacturers of this country could be assured that they were making 10 per cent. profit upon the value of their goods manufactured, I do not think they would care very much what Congress did about the tariff or anything else. It is not true, Mr. President. The truth is that 5 per cent., or 3 per cent., or 2½ per cent., or 2 per cent. average profit upon the goods produced in this country by manufacturers would be a satisfactory profit to the manufacturers, if they could be assured of it.

Upon this proposition of the free-trader where does the President stand? Let me repeat, at the risk of wearying the Senate, what the President says:

> So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people, who never use and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles.

I wish the rules permitted me to italicise those words in the RECORD, but they do not:

> Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public treasury—

Just what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] said—> but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer.

Then on page 8 he speaks of our system as "a scheme which permits a tax to be laid upon every consumer in the land for the benefit of our manufacturers."

Mr. President, the protectionist denies this doctrine of the free-trader and the President alike. The protectionist insists that whenever a duty is laid which protects the American manufacturer, competition among home producers always has and always will bring down the price of the domestic article "approximately, at least," to use the President's language, to the price of the foreign article on which duty is laid, less the duty. The President ought to have known this, as it seems to me. Did he or his "better-half" ever buy calico? If he did he must know that while the tax, as he calls it, the duty, as the protectionist calls it, is 6 cents per square yard upon calico, he can buy the American article for less than that at retail stores here in the city of Washington.

Has he ever heard of the manufacture of steel rails in this country and the price of steel rails here and abroad? Does he know that the tariff upon steel rails is $17 a ton, and that they have been sold in this country as low as $28.50, and that if you deduct the tariff duty of $17 from $28.50 the price would be $11.50 a ton, when steel rails can not be bought abroad for less than double that money? The statement is not true with regard to any single home-made article which has been so protected by tariff duties that has been manufactured here to any considerable extent, unless it be the single article of sugar as was suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] the other day. Woolen clothing which seems so much to trouble the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], he repeats over and over again to the Senate, bears a tax of about 80 per cent. Notwithstanding that duty, woolen clothing can be bought in this country, style, quality, and durability considered, as cheaply as it can be bought in London. Even in the case of blankets—which seem to be the bugbear and nightmare of the free-trader—all medium-quality blankets can be bought in this country, notwithstanding the onerous duty which it is said we lay upon the foreign article, as cheaply as anywhere in the world. So with regard to cotton clothing.

I like to have a free-trade witness once in awhile. Here is Consul Schoenhof, consul at Tunstall, who was sent abroad with a roving commission to see if he could not undo what some of our consuls had been doing to enlighten the people of this country as to the cheapness of the necessaries of life here as compared to their cheapness abroad, and as to the wages paid in this country as compared to the wages paid abroad. This in one of his recent reports. I quote it from a newspaper article, but I have verified it so that I know the quotation is correct. Writing from Tunstall, he says:

> So far as clothing and dry goods in general are concerned, I find cotton goods fully as cheap in the United States as here.

If you will not take the testimony of protectionists, if you will not take the testimony of the Senator from Maine, who speaks of what he has seen, and speaks from personal observation, I beg you to take the testimony of this free-trade consul:

> I find cotton goods fully as cheap in the United States as here. Shirtings and sheetings, if anything, are superior in quality for the same price. Articles of underwear for women are superior in workmanship and cheaper in price in the United States. Nor are men's shirts, when chiefly of cotton, any cheaper here. Of boots and shoes, factory-made, the same may be said. Articles made to order are cheaper in England, owing to the lower prices of hand labor, but the difference in prices of ready-made things is not so marked. In workmanship and finish I find the corresponding articles of wholesale manufacture superior in the United States. This is true of clothing, as well as collars, cuffs, and like articles.

There is a standing challenge in the office of a protection newspaper in the city of New York (with the samples ready to be shown to any free-trader) to show that clothing in this country is not as cheap as it is in England. The truth is that everybody, except the dude and millionaire, can be clothed cheaper in this country than in England, and in woolen clothing, too; and I apprehend that we are not very anxious to reduce the tariff duties for the purpose of benefiting the dude and the millionaire.

Take another article which has just occurred to me. Before the tariff of 1861 there was no duty on saws by name, and all the saws used in this country were imported. To-day under a duty of 8 cents per linear foot upon crosscut-saws and 45 per cent. ad valorem upon hand-saws, buck-saws, etc.—the saw-makers of the United States hold all the saw market of the United States and export towards a million dollars' worth of saws at the same time. They must be as cheap here as in the foreign free-trade country or they could not be exported.

Now, take the second proposition of the free-trader. The next most favorite proposition of the free-trader is this: He asserts, and it is mere assertion, that the workingman is compelled under the protective system to pay so much more than he otherwise would for the necessaries of life that the higher wages he obtains under the protective system are thus offset, and so free trade would be equally good for the workingman. American wages are the free-traders' stumbling-block. The demand of labor in this country compels his attention, if it does not his respect; and therefore it is industriously sought to be indoctrinated into the mind of the laboring man that although wages are higher in this country than they are in any of the countries of Europe, or anywhere else in the civilized world, yet really things cost so much more here that it is not of much advantage to the laboring man to have the higher wages in this country. I have partially alluded to this in what I have been saying upon the first proposition, but I want to see where the President stands on this. I take an extract from his recent message, on page 9:

> Nor can the worker in manufactures fail to understand that while a high tariff is claimed to be necessary to allow the payment of remunerative wages, it certainly results in a very large increase in the price of nearly all sorts of manufactures, which, in almost countless forms, he needs for the use of himself and his family. He receives—

Now listen to this remarkable passage—

> He receives at the desk of his employer his wages, and perhaps before he reaches his home is obliged, in a purchase for family use of an article which embraces his own labor, to return in the payment of the increase in price which the tariff permits the hard-earned compensation of many days of toil.

I wish the President had told us what that article was, of family use, and the worker's own manufacture, which, as he went from his shop, where he had received his wages, compelled him to pay, in addition to what he would pay under free trade, "many days' wages." Mr. President, if anybody but the President of the United States had made a statement of that sort, I should apply a word and a term characteristic of it which it is not proper for me to do in regard to him.

He makes the same argument with regard to the wool grower or the wool producer.

Above all, when it must be conceded that the increase of the cost of living caused by such tariff, becomes a burden upon those with moderate means and the poor, the employed and unemployed, the sick and well, and the young and old, and that it constitutes a tax which, with relentless grasp, is fastened upon the clothing of every man, woman, and child in the land, reasons are suggested why the removal or reduction of this duty should be included in a revision of our tariff laws.

The only trouble about this reasoning is that it is not founded on fact. I assert once more in my place in the Senate that there is no one article of domestic production which is manufactured to any considerable extent in this country in which the price is approximately the same as the foreign article with the duty added.

But I am reading these passages from the President's message to show that he stands with the free-traders. These arguments of the President come down at last to the proposition that the laborer here is no better off than elsewhere. It is the favorite argument of the free-trader, and although you may six days in the week refute that argument in the newspapers, upon the platform, wherever you meet laboring men, it will be reiterated again and again by the free-trader.

Mr. President, the laborer of this country is better off than he ever was before. With wages higher on the average, with the price of living lower on the average, he is in this respect immensely better off than anywhere else in the whole world. The wage-earners in this country own more property than all the other wage-earners of the world put together. Nay, more, I think I would not overstate the matter if I made it stronger. I see my friend, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], sitting by me. The wage-earners in Connecticut and Rhode Island own more property than the wage-earners of the whole world outside of the United States. This effort to make the laboring man believe that he could live as well and as cheaply here under a system of free trade as he lives now under a system of protection is not worthy of even a free-trader, in view of all the statistics and the refutations which have been made.

I wish to read a word from the last Consular Report. I should like to incorporate in my remarks all that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said the other day from personal observation, but that is protection authority, and this is the way the free-trader, in appealing to the laboring man, answers it. "Oh," he says, "the Senator from Maine is a protectionist; you can not believe what he says." Now I want to see what free-traders say. I take this same Consul Schoenhof, because he is an avowed free-trader. Writing from Ireland, in the very last number of the Consular Reports, No. 86, November, 1887, on page 307, he says:

It is useless for me to dwell much on the linen industry of Ulster. It is well known that in Ulster they are foremost in this branch in the whole world. Still I find that the earnings of the people employed in the linen mills in Ulster are far below those of any class employed in the textile branches in England. Mill regulations and working of time of course are the same for the whole Kingdom. Flax-breakers, men who have to do very exhausting work, earn from 15s. to 20s. per week; hacklers, from 18s. to 23s.; spinners and girls, from 8s. to 10s.; half-timers, boys 5s. and girls 4s.; and weavers, mostly women tending 2 looms, from 12s. to 15s. By others I was told that the earnings were only, for weavers, 8s. to 10s., and up to 15s. only for the finer goods.

A shilling is 25 cents. At 10 shillings they have $2.50 a week, or practically that. Then he comes to the woolen mills of Ireland, and says:

The wages I have noted down are: For men, from 12s. to 14s., 14s. being about the limit of the best men.

Three dollars and a half per week for the best men in the woolen mills of Ireland!

Spinner girls, 8s. to 10s.; children, 5s. to 6s.; and weavers earn from 10s. to 12s. The mill—

And I commend this to free-traders—

The mill, employing about 750 hands, pays out about £400 per week in wages. This includes overseers, etc., which is a trifle over 10s. per head.

There might be some occasion to attack the manufacturers of the country if they were paying these wages in the United States. But I go along a little further. I want to come to their method of living. He found a man who was a hand-loom weaver, and he says:

He was a cheery old fellow; in fact, like most of the poor people of Ireland whom I met. In his younger years he was a bricklayer in England; now he has returned to Ireland, and is well satisfied if he can ply his old trade and earn enough to keep him in bodily repair. Work, however, only lasts for him from summer until after Christmas, and very little work can be found for the first six months of the year, which is the case with all hand-loom weavers. Most of them, however, as said above, have a little land to keep them supplied with the merest necessities for these dull months in the weaving trade, and don't entirely depend on their looms for a living, as this old man does. I asked about his diet, and he gave me a piece of bread made of yellow meal, which I have been shown by nearly all the poor people and small farmers whom I visited.

Then he quotes from him:

"As to tea, coffee, or beer, and meat [he said], we know nothing at all of that. Cold water is what we drink and yellow meal we eat. If I have 2 ounces of tobacco a week I am very happy."

He pays no rent, as his neighbors, also very poor people, gave him the little shed which he occupies free of charge.

I must not detain the Senate to read longer these interesting extracts, but I wish especially to call attention to the report of Consul Neuer, at Gera, in Germany.

Mr. FRYE. Is that a Democratic appointee?

Mr. PLATT. There are no consular agents I know of now who are not Democrats, so I assume that he is a Democratic appointee. Gera is a very large manufacturing center in Germany. Consul Neuer says:

Though the city of Gera has only 35,000 inhabitants, it is one of the most prominent manufacturing places in Germany. Of its industries, the manufacture of worsted goods stands in the front rank, embracing about thirty factories, some employing as many as 1,000 steam looms.

There is where our worsted goods come from.

Besides, it contains 5 dyeing and finishing establishments, 3 worsted-yarn spinning mills, 7 carpet factories, 4 tobacco mills, 7 accordion factories, 5 iron foundries and engine works, 3 horse-hair-spinning mills, 4 piano factories, 31 tanneries, aside from a considerable number of manufacturing establishments of smaller importance.

It may fairly be taken, then, to be a representative manufacturing center. Then he says:

Under these circumstances it is extremely difficult for the workingman to make both ends meet, and there is no question that the position of the American workman is eminently superior in all that pertains to the happiness and well-being of himself and family and in his ability to save for the future.

I like to get this kind of testimony once in a while from Democratic sources, which as I understand the term is synonymous with free-trade sources.

The fare of the factory hands in this region is of a simple kind. Their principal food consists of bread and potatoes. On rising in the morning they will have a cup of common coffee and some white or black bread and butter or cheese; their dinner will consist of some cheap vegetables, mostly potatoes, and a small piece of meat, but very often without the latter; at 4 o'clock they have one or two cups of poor coffee again, with some black bread and butter, and in the evening a supper of cheese or sausage with black bread and a glass of beer. There may be a change to this diet in some cases, but they are to be considered as exceptional.

The married workman takes his meals partly in the factory and partly at home; the single one either with the family of a fellow-laborer or in a cheap restaurant. For the support of a family the wages of the husband are generally inadequate, and therefore the wife and elder children have to contribute a share to their sustenance.

The lodgings of the laboring classes are of a very poor kind. In most cases they are two or three comfortless rooms. Owing to the large and constant increase of the population rents are steadily rising, and range from 150 marks ($35.70) to 180 marks ($42.84) per year, according to location and condition of the premises.

I will put into the RECORD a table which Consul Neuer furnishes, giving the amount of the weekly factory wages and the corresponding hours of labor at Gera. It embraces the employment in weaving mills, dye-houses, finishing works, accordion factories, iron foundries and engine works, tanneries, tobacco mills, flour mills, carpet factories, chinaware, horse-hair-spinning mills, and worsted-yarn-spinning mills.

Rate of the weekly wages and the corresponding hours of labor at Gera.

It will be seen that the hours of labor are generally eleven hours per day, and the highest average weekly wage is $5.76.

Mr. FRYE. For a man?

Mr. PLATT. For a man, and from that down for other men and for women and children. As to the cost of living Consul Neuer says:

As to the cost of living, I can give no better statement than to quote the retail prices of the principal articles usually classed among the necessaries of life:

Retail prices of necessaries of life.

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Bread: | | | | |
| White | per pound | | | $0.03 |
| Black | do | | | .02½ |
| Beef: | | | | |
| Steaks | do | $0.20 | to | .24 |
| Roast | do | .17 | to | .20 |
| Common | do | | | .14½ |
| Chickens | each | .36 | to | .60 |
| Mutton | per pound | | | .14½ |
| Pork | do | | | .15½ |
| Veal | do | | | .13 |
| Eggs | per dozen | .14½ | to | .20 |
| Butter | per pound | .24 | to | .36 |
| Cheese, Swiss | do | .24 | to | .28 |
| Coffee | do | .30 | to | .48 |
| Tea | do | .96 | to | 1.20 |
| Sugar | do | .07 | to | .10 |
| Potatoes | per 100 pounds | | | .72 |
| Cabbages | apiece | .02½ | to | .05 |
| Flour | per pound | .04½ | to | .05½ |
| Kerosene oil | per liter | | | .06 |
| Milk | do | | | .05 |

Can anybody find that the necessaries of life where the highest average weekly wage is $5.76 are not fully up to the net price of the necessaries of life in America? I have quoted this somewhat, I fear, to the weariness of the Senate, because I wanted to put on record this Democratic free-trade testimony upon this question.

Oh, but the free-trader says protection does not make higher wages. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] the other day, when the Senator from Maine was making his speech, interrupted him to ask the Senator from Maine if he claimed that protection made higher wages. No, sir; no protectionist claims that protection of itself makes higher wages; but it does this: it makes it possible for the manufacturer to pay higher wages than can be paid under a system of free trade. Strike down these protective duties and it would become impossible for the manufacturer to pay the rate of American wages now paid. If he is to have no protection he must stop or meet foreign competition by paying foreign wages. That is so plain that "he who runs may read."

The question of wage between the laboring man and the employer is one which must be settled between them. If the wage-earner does not get all that he ought as his share of production, then I hail every honorable, wise, honest effort for him to get a greater share of production; but he is not to be helped by striking down the ability of the manufacturer to pay him the American rate of wages, and that is just what the removal of the protective duties does.

Protection does another thing—it saves us our own market. It makes a demand for labor in this country, and that is, after all, the real thing which results in high wages. Strike down the protective duty, open our ports to foreign manufacturers upon the ground that we should buy where we can buy the cheapest, and by so much you have destroyed the home market and lessened the demand for labor, and made it impossible for high wages to prevail in this country.

Let me group two favorite claims of the free-trader. One is that the manufacturer of protected articles is a robber on general principles; that he robs everybody, and has grown immensely rich by robbery. The other is that he is growing rich by the robbery of a particular class, namely, the agriculturist. It is the favorite theme of the free-trader to hold out this idea, that the protective tariff is all for the benefit of the manufacturer and to the disadvantage of everybody else, and especially of the agriculturist.

Professor Sumner, who does not hesitate, as he says, to take blows when they are given, called a protected factory a nuisance. Somebody took him to task for it, and he replied. Now I want to read a word and see what such a free-trader as he thinks of a protected factory. He says:

I have called such a factory a "nuisance." The word has been objected to. The word is of no consequence. He who, when he goes into a debate, begins to whine and cry as soon as the blows get sharp, should learn to keep out. What I meant was this: A "nuisance" is something which, by its existence and presence in society, works "loss and" damage to the society—works against the general interest, not for it. A factory which gets in the way and hinders us from attaining the comforts which we are all trying to get, which makes harder the terms of acquisition when we are all the time struggling by our arts and sciences to make those terms easier, is a harmful thing, and noxious to the common interest.

Now, what says the President along this line? If I may use the expression, he fairly rolls as a sweet morsel under his tongue what he says about the "immense profits" of the manufacturer:

Relief from the hardships and dangers of our present tariff laws should be devised with especial precaution against imperiling the existence of our manufacturing interests.

I will see by and by whether the relief proposed by him imperils the existence of our manufacturing interests:

But this existence should not mean a condition which, without regard to the public welfare or a national exigency, must always insure the realization of immense profits instead of moderately profitable returns.

Then he goes on to talk about the manufacturer. He says:

So stubbornly have all efforts to reform the present condition been resisted by those of our fellow-citizens thus engaged, that they can hardly complain of the suspicion, entertained to a certain extent, that there exists an organized combination all along the line to maintain their advantage.

* * * * * * *

Yet when an attempt is made to justify a scheme which permits a tax to be laid upon every consumer in the land for the benefit of our manufacturers, quite beyond a reasonable demand for governmental regard, etc.

I will read what he says in speaking of competition. He is talking about the manufacturers who are robbing the people, as the free-traders say:

But it is notorious that this competition is too often strangled by combinations quite prevalent at this time, and frequently called trusts, which have for their object the regulation of the supply and price of commodities made and sold by members of the combination. The people can hardly hope for any consideration in the operation of these selfish schemes.

Then, on page 12, he sounds a note of warning, in which he says:

Opportunity for safe, careful, and deliberate reform is now offered; and none of us should be unmindful of a time when an abused and irritated people, heedless of those who have resisted timely and reasonable relief, may insist upon a radical and sweeping rectification of their wrongs.

Did I use the right word when I said "warning," or ought I to have used the word "inciting," or "threatening"? What free-trader could have written this portion of the President's message better? This attack upon the manufacturers of the country is too open, too plain, too direct, and too severe to be allowed to pass without a word or two.

Are the manufacturers of this country realizing "immense profits"? Are they the millionaires of the land? You can count upon your fingers and thumbs, and without counting them many times over, all the manufacturers of this country who in manufacturing have accumulated a fortune equal to a million dollars, and in nine cases out of ten either those men or their fathers have struggled from the bottom, where poverty pinched the hardest and where privation was the greatest, up to their success. They have been workmen at the bench, at the loom, in the factory, in the shop, in the mill, and what they have got they have obtained in a manner which the common judgment of mankind says is honest and fair. There is not a laboring man in this country who when he comes to think of it levels his claim that men are obtaining the rewards of investment without the rendition of a fair equivalent therefor against the manufacturer. No, they are not the millionaires. Who ever heard a manufacturer called a "king"? We hear of "cattle kings," and "wheat kings," and "iron kings," and "cotton kings," and "railroad kings," but you never hear that word applied to a manufacturer.

We hear of trusts, as the President reminds us. Are they manufacturing trusts? There is the Standard Oil trust, and the great Gogebic iron trust, and the coal trust. There is not a dollar of protection on anthracite coal, or oil, and no protection on iron ore which leads to the formation of any trust. We hear of a foreign syndicate purchasing all the copper interests of the world. We hear, indeed, of a sugar trust, and if that be a manufacturers' trust, it is the only one in the United States.

That there have been combinations sometimes among manufacturers to maintain prices at a point which would keep them from absolute destruction is indeed true, but whenever they have gone above a fair price some competitor has come in and broken it up. The great trusts about which the country is now not unduly exercised are not to be found in the ranks of the manufacturers. Go to New York. Try to raise money in the city of New York for a manufacturing enterprise, and how many of the money kings do you think you will find to invest their money in that way? That is not the way manufactories are developed. They are developed from the humblest beginnings by hard, persistent labor, and by enterprise such as the world has never seen in any other occupation of life.

Our manufacturers make no more money than English manufacturers. They make less than any other class of business men. I speak for the manufacturers of Connecticut, about whom I know. Their enterprises have been wrecked over and over again. Most of those who are making any money at all are making it in enterprises where capital has been sunk time after time, and now they are making less than would be considered a fair profit in any other business or occupation of life. They make less than the merchants of this country. The profit to the manufacturer upon manufactured goods has been less than the profits of the middlemen or merchants of the country.

There is another thing which they have done. Not they alone, for when I speak of the manufacturer, I want to speak of that great body of men who have been the right hand of manufacturers in this country, and those are the skilled mechanics, the honest, intelligent artisans who have stood by the manufacturers. They have made other business profitable. They more than any other men support other business in this country. I do not know how the Senators from those States will vote, but there are States to-day that would not be represented by a star on the flag if it had not been for the manufacturers of the country. Here is Dakota, with its 600,000 people knocking at the doors of Congress for admission, that would be a barren waste, and, as General Hazen reported only a few years ago, an uninhabitable desert if it had not been for the protected manufactures of this country.

Let us see about these "immense profits." I quote from Bradstreet's of Saturday, January 14, the dividends for fifteen years of the cotton mills in Maine, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, possibly in Rhode Island, I am not sure:

For the last three years the average is 5½ per cent. upon the nominal capital, and that is not a fair way to estimate it.

I asked a question of a gentleman in New York as to what the profits of our cotton and woolen manufacturers were, and he sent me a letter from Henry F. Coe, of Boston, dated January 16, 1888, than whom no man in my judgment is better able to speak. He says:

BOSTON, January 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 14th instant received. I know no better test of the general result of cotton manufacture than amount of dividend paid. While it may be true that the mills have earned more than dividends paid, yet it is true that they divide the greater part of their earnings. Martin's tables are authority upon this subject, and I find upon making a careful computation that he reports the names of seventy corporations working cotton, upon his list, located in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts. The companies represent a capital stock of $61,158,000. The amount of dividends paid by them for three years past amounts to $9,786,740. This is 15½ per cent. on the capital stock, or at the rate of 5.17 per cent. per annum. This hardly tells the story, however. It would be fair to say that the average indebtedness of these corporations is 40 per cent. of their capital stock, at least. So that they employ their own capital plus borrowed capital:

|---|---|
| Capital owned | $63,158,000 |
| Capital borrowed | 25,263,200 |
| Total capital used | 88,421,200 |
| Dividends | 9,786,740 |

This would only be at the rate of 3.69 per cent.

He might have said that if they have accumulated a surplus they pay no interest upon that, although it is really capital invested.

However considered, the results do not indicate that manufacturers of cotton are coining money. I have excluded from above figures all corporations which work any wool. The average of woolen mills are doing very much poorer than cotton mills. The tariff of 1883 was a bad one for manufacturers of wool. I have spent the evening in arriving at above results, and they may be depended upon as a true statement of facts. Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York are not probably doing any better than corporations named above.

Yours, very truly,

HENRY F. COE.

A. M. GARLAND,
Secretary, New York.

And right here, Mr. President, that I may get a little more Democratic testimony, I want to refer to what the Secretary of the Treasury says about the woolen and worsted manufacturing business in this country in his annual report submitted to the present Congress:

I am, however, so convinced of the imminent danger to large industries engaged in the manufacture of worsted and woolen goods, unless a change is soon made in the duties on wool and manufactures thereof, that I deem it proper to depart from my general practice in thus calling your attention to this particular provision of the tariff.

Notwithstanding his free-trade sentiment and argument he does think that the tariff on worsted and woolen goods ought to be raised to save them from immediate destruction; yet the President is talking about the immense profits of the manufacturers!

But especially I want to speak of New England manufacturers, and I do not want anybody to fall into the error of supposing that this protective system is especially or mainly for the benefit of New England manufacturers. There was a time, indeed, when New England, perhaps, might have been said to monopolize the manufacturing industries of the country. It was a monopoly born of the genius and skill of its sons. That day has passed. Manufactures have extended all over the country, and if this system of protection was such a benefit to manufacturers as the President and the free-traders would have us believe, it would not be New England particularly that was interested in its preservation. Manufactures have passed the barrier of the Alleghanies away out to the Pacific coast, in the prairie towns of the West, far down in the South, in North Carolina and West Virginia and Georgia and Alabama—diffused all over the country.

By the census returns of 1880 less than 20 per cent. of the manufactured products of the United States were produced in New England. More were manufactured west of the State of New York, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] well suggests to me, than in 1860 were manufactured in all the United States. Let us look at these facts a little because it is such a familiar thing to hear that tariff protection is for the benefit of New England manufacturers. You may create a prejudice, if you please, against New England, a prejudice against its manufactures and its manufacturers, but if you are going to tear down the protective system, I want it understood that we are not by any means the principal sufferers.

California, Illinois, New Jersey, and Ohio manufactured in 1880 more goods than all New England. Indiana, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa manufactured nearly as much as New England. New York and Pennsylvania manufactured nearly half more than New England. This has increased. If manufactures are not increasing in New England, they are rushing forward with phenomenal rapidity in other sections of the country, and when the census of 1890 comes to be taken not more than 15 per cent. of the manufacturing in this country will be done in New England. Let me give the exact figures.

The total annual product of manufactures in the United States was, by the census of 1880, $5,369,579,191.

In the New England States it was as follows:

|---|---|
| Connecticut | $185,697,211 |
| Maine | 79,829,793 |
| Massachusetts | 631,135,284 |
| New Hampshire | 73,978,028 |
| Rhode Island | 104,163,621 |
| Vermont | 31,354,366 |
| Total | 1,076,158,303 |

In the following States it was:

|---|---|
| California | $116,218,792 |
| Illinois | 414,864,673 |
| New Jersey | 254,380,236 |
| Ohio | 348,298,390 |
| Total | 1,133,762,091 |

In these States as follows:

|---|---|
| Indiana | $148,096,411 |
| Maryland | 106,780,563 |
| Michigan | 150,715,025 |
| Missouri | 165,386,265 |
| Wisconsin | 128,255,480 |
| Minnesota | 76,065,198 |
| Iowa | 71,045,926 |
| Total | 846,304,808 |

In New York and Pennsylvania:

|---|---|
| New York | $1,080,696,595 |
| Pennsylvania | 744,818,445 |
| Total | 1,825,515,040 |

No, I tell the men who are seeking to destroy the protective tariff that they must not delude themselves with the idea that they are aiming their blows against New England. The New England manufacturer is the man who has least interest of all other classes of men in the preservation of the protective system. He is interested in it, indeed, but others, and all others, are interested more. If I were to name the order in which the different classes are interested in the maintenance of a protective tariff, I would say, first, the laborers everywhere, in whatever field they wipe the sweat from their brow; more than any manufacturers are the wage-receiving men of this country interested in its preservation. The blow hits them first, and it may as well be understood, and they are coming to understand it all over the land. First, the men who work in manufactories, the artisans, are hit; next, agriculturists and the men who work on farms; next, manufacturers in other sections of the country where they are not as well established and where the industries may indeed be said even now to be infant industries; next, those engaged in transportation; next, those engaged in merchandise; and last, and least, if you please, the manufacturers of New England.

If the policy of free trade is to prevail, if our progress is to be arrested and our development hindered, and if the inevitable results of it are to follow, and we are to have disaster and ruin, the first men who will emerge from the ruin will be the manufacturers of New England, the first who will adjust themselves to the new order of things and go on once more as they have in the past, endeavoring to build up and develop and make a strong, powerful, glorious Nation. The interest of the New England manufacturer is more that he may have a market in which he can sell his goods than anything else. That is what he wants. That is where free trade hits him hardest—the surrender of our market to the foreigner.

But perhaps as favorite a method of attack upon the tariff by the free-trader as any is the claim that raw materials should be free, and why? Because the free-trader knows that the protection of raw materials is the keystone of the protective arch; that when you have once ceased to protect the production of what are called raw materials in the country, there is no logical ground upon which any article can be protected here. If that kind of production which employs the greatest percentage of labor in this country can not receive protection, then nothing should receive protection; and it is, therefore, that the assault upon protection is made upon what are called raw materials.

It is more than that; it is an appeal to the supposed selfishness of manufacturers. The manufacturers are told—told by the President in his message—that they can cheapen the cost of production if they can have free raw materials. Sir, the manufacturer that seeks to obtain raw materials free and demands a tariff upon his product is a selfish man, and selfish almost to the point of criminality; and the manufacturers of New England, as a class, spurn that bribe. When in the preparation of the bill advised by the leading free-traders out of Congress in this country, the proposition is made to purchase the support of New England manufacturers by free wool, by free iron, by free coal, I tell you that they mistake the manufacturers of Connecticut and the rest of New England. They know that this is a system or it is nothing. They know that every industry must be protected to thrive, and they know that protection alone can make us generally prosperous as a nation. They are not to be diverted from this issue.

What are raw materials? I have not time to speak on this subject as I would wish, but the only raw materials there are are those which grow out of the earth or those which repose beneath its surface. The moment you dig out the iron, and the coal, and the copper, and the marble, and the salt, and the clay, that moment human labor is added to the natural product, and from that moment it is no longer raw material. When you cut down the tree and begin to saw it into timber or into boards it is no longer raw material.

When the farmer raises or buys his flock of sheep and produces his wool by means of his labor, that is no longer raw material. Human labor, the great energizing, civilizing force of the world and of humanity, has entered into that product. I would not put it too strongly if I were to say the soul of man has entered into and transformed that natural product. It is no longer raw material. Go into any one of the manufacturing establishments of this country; look at one that I have in my mind in my own State. In that factory they take copper in the ingot as it comes from the mine into the front door. When it goes out again it goes out in the shape of copper wire of $\frac{1}{400}$ of an inch in diameter. Into that crude copper ingot has passed the highest thought of man; his brain is in the wire, his soul is there.

Oh, I dislike, Mr. President, to hear work-people talk about the sale of their wages. Labor has that in it that can not be bought and sold. The labor of man is civilization; it is advancement; it is the upward trend of humanity. No matter whether man with hand and brain transforms the natural product into the finished product, or whether by pure brain labor he teaches in college or school, preaches in pulpit or speaks in the Senate, he works, he labors, he molds, he creates, he develops. In whatever field labor may be exercised it is and must be the grandest material human force.

There is no raw material which should be made free if labor is to be protected.

But here the President leaves the field of argument and fallacy and comes to the field of practical recommendation. There is no mistaking his recommendation on this subject; there is no mistaking his position side by side with the practical free-trader and doctrinaire free-trader on this subject. Let me read a little:

> The radical reduction of the duties imposed upon raw material used in manufactures, or its free importation, is of course an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these necessaries.
> It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufacturers. On the contrary, it would appear to give them a better chance in foreign markets with the manufacturers of other countries, who cheapen their wares by free material.

I will not go on to read his long argument to show that wool ought to be put on the free-list, and subject to no duty. There is no mistaking his recommendation in that respect. He particularly specifies wool as one of the materials that should go upon the free-list.

Let us look at this matter a little. I said that protection is a system. Every industry which can be successfully carried on within our boundaries must feel the benefit of this protection, or the system is destroyed. The protectionist says that whenever and wherever an industry can be profitably carried on in this country it should feel the benefit of the protecting power and force of the Government, and the labor which carries it on should be held above and aloof from the cheap labor by which the manufacture is carried on in foreign lands.

When he comes to consider raw material the President has no reference to any inequalities in the tariff; in this respect he does not propose to correct, he proposes to destroy. His only conception of tariff reform, so far as raw materials are concerned, is by tariff destruction.

Wool, the President says, is raw material; but raw material just as truly includes iron ore, and copper ore, and bituminous coal, and lead, and zinc, and lumber, and a number of other things, as it does wool. Take all these things that are classed as raw materials and put them on the free-list, and what have you done? You have reduced governmental income by the beggarly sum of $12,000,000—beggarly in comparison with the amount which we are recommended to reduce. What else have you done? You have wiped out as with a brush at least $300,000,000 of capital in the United States. Will you purchase the free-list for raw materials at any such expense as that? Have you contemplated what it is, for the purpose of reducing our taxation $12,000,000, that nobody feels, to destroy at one fell swoop at least $300,000,000 of capital?

The time was when Chicago was said to be in flames. The whole country felt it an impending and existing calamity. That fire did not destroy $300,000,000 of capital. It would take two Chicago fires to be as great a calamity to the country as putting raw materials on the free-list would be.

More than that, the only mitigation of the great Chicago fire was that it opened a new field for labor; but this destruction of capital by putting raw materials on the free-list destroys also the opportunities for labor. It throws laborers out of employment. I have made the calculation pretty carefully, having corresponded with people who are producing what are called raw materials, and I do not overstate it when I say that to put raw materials on the free-list will throw out of employment permanently not less than 200,000 and probably 350,000 laborers, and all because by striking down protection on what are called raw materials taxation can be reduced $12,000,000, and the internal-revenue tax must not be touched.

The situation changes when compared with that of a great devastating fire. That makes a demand for labor; but the wiping out of capital by inviting raw materials free to our shores from the pauper-stricken countries of Europe makes it impossible for this labor to continue or to find any opportunity for just and adequate reward.

I have said that into the production of these materials which are called raw materials the greatest percentage of labor enters; more than into any other production. Why is it, I ask, if the President of the United States is not a free-trader, that he selects for the free-list those particular productions into which the greatest percentage of labor enters? It is a question that may not be answered here, but it will be asked in the coming months, and it must find an answer.

If the manufacturer were the selfish being that he is supposed to be, enlightened selfishness would insist on protection. He knows that to put raw materials on the free-list at the price of destroying $300,000,000 of productive capital, and throwing out of employment from 200,000 to 350,000 laborers, immediately makes such a condition of things in this country that he can not sell his wares. That means disaster. Free trade in raw materials means no trade for the manufacturer, and if he were the selfish being that the President of the United States and the free-traders generally suppose him to be, he would still be in favor of a system which insures him the best market in the world, the best market that mankind has ever known.

I want to call attention to the utterance of one of our manufacturers. When the President's message first went out to the public and was hailed, as I have said, with acclamations of joy, and the whole Democratic party seemed to unite in one choral song to the praise of the President, they sent around a man who, I am informed, and I believe correctly, was in Government employ, holding a clerical position under the Government, to interview New England manufacturers to see if he could not obtain indorsements from them of the President's message. Among others he called on a manufacturer in New Haven, a manufacturer who makes steam-boilers, and who exports them, and he thought he had found a man to give in his adhesion to this scheme of free raw materials. The interviewer did the talking and then published an interview in a metropolitan journal, in which he said that the firm of which Mr. Bigelow, recently Governor of the State of Connecticut, was a leading member, was in favor of free raw materials. It did not take long for Mr. Bigelow to write a letter disavowing any such statement. I want to read what a manufacturer thinks about raw materials.

It is perfectly true that free raw materials would tend to increase our export trade. But the increase would be, as Mr. Barnum—

That was the man with whom the reporter talked—told the reporter (though the latter omitted to mention it), at the expense of our home trade. Why? Because free trade would kill off many of our manufacturers here, who could not compete with foreign manufacturers in their line, and thus the demand for engines and boilers for use in this country would be greatly decreased. We might sell a few more boilers abroad; we should sell a great many less at home.

In order to successfully compete with foreign countries in this matter we must have not only free raw materials, such as they have, but cheap labor, such as they also have. Give us free raw materials and cheap labor and we can meet the world in the manufacture of engines and boilers. But I for one do not want to compete with the world on any such terms. I began life at the bench, working at my trade for $1.50 a day. I know this question from the side of the wage-worker as well as from the side of the employer. And I never want to see the day when the workmen in my mills or in any other mills in America shall be compelled to work for the same wages and live in the same manner as the workmen of Europe.

I am a firm protectionist in everything relating to my own business, to the interests of my employés, and to the prosperity of the country. I want to be counted, every time, on the side of American industries, American wages, and American homes.

A good deal of misrepresentation about the manufacturers of New England being in favor of free raw material is manufactured just as was the report that ex-Governor Bigelow was in favor of it.

I have gone over—and at more length than I intended, and yet I do not know that I ought to apologize for it, because this is the most important topic which we shall discuss here this winter—I have gone over the facts showing that the free-traders claim the President. I have shown that every principal argument, theoretical or practical, used by the avowed free-traders is sustained by the President, by the language and the tone of his message.

But we come now to another thing, and I say with an understanding of what I utter that either the President intended free trade, or he was not dealing fairly with the American people, for the method of reduction proposed by the President means the absolute and final destruction of the protective system. It means absolute free trade and nothing less than that; so the spirit of the message and the inevitable result of its recommendations lead us to the same conclusion.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will make a motion for an executive session if it meets the approval of the Senator from Connecticut. I notice that his voice is getting husky, and he has not completed his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield for that purpose?

Mr. PLATT. I have come now to where I must spend some time upon the question of the reduction of the surplus, and, of course, I can not conclude to-night. I regret it very much; but if I can have the floor to go on and conclude to-morrow I am perfectly willing to yield. I can conclude to-night if the Senate will stay and hear me.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is so evident that the voice of the Senator from Connecticut is becoming quite husky that I think the Senate had better relieve him.

Mr. BLAIR. Will it be agreeable to the Senator to take the floor during the morning business to-morrow? He must be aware that there are other interests which are being delayed.

Mr. PLATT. I will endeavor to seek the floor at the conclusion of the transaction of the routine business to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 7, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 6, 1888.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

A. H. Longino, of Mississippi, to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi.

POSTMASTER.

Calvin M. Wherry, to be postmaster at North Platte, in the county of Lincoln and State of Nebraska.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 6, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEHLBACH, for three days, on account of illness.

To Mr. COTHRAN, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BLOUNT, for one week, on account of sickness.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington News of Friday, February 3, 1888.]

The New York Tribune's Washington correspondent thus writes of "Deacon" White: "In the deep recess of one of the windows in the corridor of the House of Representatives is a telegraph instrument fenced off from the thoroughfare by an iron railing. A rather stout woman sits there constantly, from about 11 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, with her hand on the key. Occasionally she gets a message, which she writes out and tucks in a little drawer in the table. Every few moments a short, chunky man, with spectacles on his nose, and a brown beard sprinkled with gray, comes out from the center door of the House, and goes to the iron railing with a spry step. The operator takes the messages from the drawer, hands them to him, and he writes the answers on the reverse side of the same sheet of paper. Then he goes back into the House again, and takes his seat in the front row of desks, immediately under the Speaker's eye. The short, chunky man is 'Deacon' White, the famous broker, and the other end of that wire is in his office in Wall street, New York. He leases the wire from the Western Union and knows what is going on in his office in New York just as well as if he sat at his desk there, instead of being in the House. It costs him a good many thousand dollars a year for his wire alone, and no one knows how much more for the privilege of sitting in the House of Representatives."

[Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, as there is in that publication something which, to a hyperæsthetic mind, might be construed as a reflection upon my character as a member of this House, I now read a special dispatch which I have sent to the Brooklyn papers, circulating among my constituents, as my answer to this publication:

To the Editors of the Brooklyn Times, Eagle, Citizen, and Standard-Union:

On Sunday, January 29, a highly entertaining lie appeared in the New York Tribune, to the effect that I had a private telegraph wire with one end in the vestibule of the House and the other end in my New York office; that it cost me a good many thousand dollars a year for my wire alone, and no one knows how much more for the privilege of sitting in the House of Representatives. From this last clause I suppose that it is a legitimate deduction that the sittings of other members of Congress are at a fixed rental, while mine is presumably of a speculative character, and possibly carried on a margin.

[Laughter.]

It was to be expected that a festive lie of this character would reproduce itself many times, but neither the New York nor Brooklyn papers seemed willing to copy it from their esteemed contemporary, the Tribune. In the fullness of time, however, the Louisville Courier-Journal printed the same romance as original matter, and as it seemed like a free-trade indorsement of a highly protected lie—the Sun and World, of New York, and the Eagle, of Brooklyn, copied it. When the Tribune falsehood stood alone, it seemed like a waste of ammunition to contradict it, as there was a moral certainty that a brood of such lies would be hatched and full fledged in a week. Hence I have waited for the flock, and now make the following shot at the entire covey: It is not true that I have an operator at the Capitol, or any wire to Washington, or to New York, or any correspondent or customer in Washington, or that I ever had any of these things, or that there was ever the slightest foundation for one word contained in the romance outside of the imaginings of a sensational paragraphist. Is not this a case where, if the revered founder of the Tribune were alive, he would interview that paragraphist, and say to him, in the classic United States tongue of which he was the great master, "You lie, villain! you lie!"

[Laughter]—

And now, will the original Jacob Townsend of this story, and the copyists who have copied, and the moralists who have moralized, will they each and all be as prompt to contradict as they were to cull this efflorescence of mendacity? We can tell by waiting.

S. V. WHITE.

P. S.—Since writing the foregoing, my attention has been called to the fact that the Tribune of yesterday made a prompt contradiction of the canard of its paragraphist. Many thanks for this act of justice. Now, will the free-trade wing be as just, and see if the whole party combined can overtake this lie which they have given one week's start?

S. V. WHITE.

FEES IN PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by unanimous consent, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4982) prohibiting the allowance of fee in any claim for increase of pension on account of the increase of disability for which the pension was allowed; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL MESSENGER AND PAGE FOR THE HOUSE.

Mr. O'DONNELL, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back adversely the following resolutions, with the recommendation that they be laid on the table:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 16, 1888.

Resolved, That Matt Stratton, jr., of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, appointed a messenger during the present Congress, at the same rate of compensation received by him during the Forty-ninth Congress, said compensation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 16, 1888.

Resolved, That E. T. Benton, jr., be, and is hereby, appointed an additional page on the floor of the House of Representatives, and to receive the same rate of compensation as those now acting in that capacity, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The report accompanying the resolutions was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, having had under consideration the resolution submitted by Mr. WASHINGTON, January 16, 1888, providing for the appointment of Matt Stratton, jr., of Tennessee, as a messenger during the present Congress, report the same adversely, and recommend that it lie on the table.

The Committee on Accounts also, having had under consideration the resolution offered by Mr. TARSNEY, submitted January 30, 1888, providing for the appointment of E. T. Benton, jr., as an additional page on the floor of the House of Representatives, they report the same adversely, and recommend that it lie on the table.

The committee make this recommendation in each of the above resolutions for the reason that the two additional employés therein provided for are not needed, and their appointment would only create two unnecessary officers. The House is now abundantly supplied with appointees.

In this connection the Committee on Accounts deem it proper to call the attention of the House of Representatives to the fact that at the opening of the present session there were 308 clerks, messengers, and employés on the rolls of this body. To pay the salaries of the above enumeration there was appropriated at the last session the sum of $396,468.30, which amount will be nearly exhausted at the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1888.

Since the assembling of Congress, by direction of the House of Representatives, the number on the rolls has been increased 12. At the present time the list of persons in the employ of this branch of the Government aggregates 320, while the membership comprises 325, with 8 delegates in addition.

The contingent-fund appropriation at the opening of the session was $30,000. The expenditures from that fund in two months has amounted to $7,116.23, while the salaries of the 12 additional employés will aggregate $9,230 by the end of the fiscal year. The contingent fund has been drawn upon by the above to the extent of $16,346.23; leaving a balance of $13,653.77, which sum must suffice for the remaining five months of the session. The four investigations ordered by direction of the House will undoubtedly greatly deplete the balance now remaining. In this calculation the current expenses for the remainder of the fiscal year are not included, and your committee are fearful that a deficiency will exist in the contingent fund. There will be no surplus there.

Your committee think it proper to submit these facts for the consideration of the House, and, while reporting adversely upon the House resolutions 18 and 25, respectively, on the ground that additional messengers and pages are not needed, as this body is amply furnished with assistants in that line, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matter of the two resolutions aforesaid.

The report was agreed to, and the resolutions were laid on the table.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I desire to present resolutions of the Detroit Board of Trade in favor of the postal-telegraph system. I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions be read and be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman call up the election case?

Mr. CRISP. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of States for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. OATES introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIV of the House of Representatives be so amended as to admit to the privileges of the floor the Interstate Commerce Commissioners and the Commissioners of Agriculture, Pensions, Indian Affairs, Patents, Railroads, Education, Printing and Engraving, and the Public Printer.

EXCHANGE OF MUTILATED SILVER COIN.

Mr. MORROW introduced a bill (H. R. 6631) providing for the exchange of the worn, defaced, clipped, punched, or otherwise mutilated silver coins of the United States, of smaller denominations than $1, for new or unworn subsidiary silver coins, at designated places and under certain conditions; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

DESTRUCTION OF OYSTERS BY STAR-FISH, ETC.

Mr. GRANGER introduced a bill (H. R. 6632) directing the prosecution of inquiries by the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries in respect to the destruction of oysters in the natural oyster-beds lying within the waters and jurisdiction of the United States by star-fish, etc., and making an appropriation for such purpose; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

ASSAY OFFICE, GAINESVILLE, GA.

Mr. CANDLER introduced a bill (H. R. 6633) to establish an assay office at Gainesville, in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF 4 PER CENT. UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. CANDLER also introduced a bill (H. R. 6634) to refund all outstanding 4 per cent. bonds of the United States at 2½ per cent.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, OLNEY, ILL.

Mr. LANDES introduced a bill (H. R. 6635) for the erection of a public building at the city of Olney, Ill.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

FUND FOR REDEMPTION OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. LANDES (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 6636) providing that the fund held for the redemption of United States notes shall be composed of gold and silver, half in gold coin and gold bullion, and half in silver bullion, equal in value to the gold half; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, submitted a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the special Committee on Printing appointed by the Speaker under a resolution adopted by the House January 30 to make a thorough investigation of the administration of the Government Printing Office during the incumbency of the present occupant and that of his predecessor be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered, in conducting said investigation, to employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, examine witnesses, and to call for and examine all books, papers, records, and documents bearing upon the subject of said investigation; and that any expense incurred in conducting the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask the present consideration of this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order during this hour.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to entertain the request for unanimous consent during this hour.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Then I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

BUTTER.

Mr. LAWLER introduced a bill (H. R. 6637) to protect the consumers of butter; which was read a first and second time (the second reading being in full, upon the request of Mr. LAWLER), referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF REVENUE.

Mr. LAWLER also introduced a bill (H. R. 6638) to reduce revenue; which was read a first and second time (the second reading being in full, upon the request of Mr. LAWLER).

Mr. LAWLER. I ask the reference of this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As under this bill the only article left upon which there would be an internal-revenue tax would be, as I understand, oleomargarine, I ask whether the bill should not be referred to the Committee on Agriculture instead of the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kansas make that motion?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all internal-revenue or domestic taxes, with the exception of those taxes levied upon spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, and licenses, wholesale and retail, be, and the same are hereby, abrogated and repealed, to take effect upon the passage of this act.

Mr. HERBERT. I think this bill ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas moves to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The only article which would be left subject to internal taxation by this bill is oleomargarine, a matter of which the Committee on Agriculture has always had charge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LAWLER. As this bill provides for a reduction of taxes, I ask its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The question being taken on the motion to refer to the Committee on Ways and Means,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said, The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether under the rules the bill just introduced would not go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the motion pending, and therefore the Chair does not wish to decide the question.

Mr. McMILLIN. In the absence of a motion, would not that order be made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are two motions pending——

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand; but in the absence of any motion would not the rules carry the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of any motion the Chair would so refer it.

Mr. PHELAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BURROWS. Read the bill again, so we may know just exactly what it is.

Mr. HATCH. It merely excepts oleomargarine.

Mr. PHELAN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that under the rules of this House this bill goes, as a matter of course, to the Committee on Ways and Means. By Rule XXVIII it is provided:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

Now, Rule XI, in reference to the powers and duties of committees, provides as follows:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating,

* * * * * * *

2. to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States: to the Committee on Ways and Means.

I hold, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules of the House this bill should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means; and that to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture, as is proposed, is a change of the rules, for which one day's notice must be given.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That point has already been decided.

Mr. LAWLER. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But that was already taken.

Mr. LAWLER. I ask for a division, and I insist on a division.

Mr. MILLS. Let the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My friend can have the yeas and nays on the next vote.

Mr. WILKINS. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois, does this except bank taxes?

Mr. LAWLER. It does except bank taxes. I so understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to refer to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 143.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It should go to the Committee on Agriculture or to the Committee on Banking, because the bank tax is excepted. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make any motion? The bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

PENSIONS.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (H. R. 6639) to regulate the granting of pensions to soldiers for wounds received in the military service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE EMPLOYÉS BUREAU ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. TAULBEE introduced a bill (H. R. 6640) to extend the annual leave of absence of the employés of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to thirty days per annum; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF EMPLOYÉS OF THE NEW ORLEANS CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. WILKINSON introduced a bill (H. R. 6641) to increase the salaries of certain employés of the New Orleans custom-house, so as to make the said salaries equivalent to those paid in similar departments in the different cities of this country; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE.

Mr. MILLIKEN introduced a bill (H. R. 6642) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 380, of the city of Washington, to provide an eligible site for a city post-office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

SUGAR TRUSTS.

Mr. MILLIKEN also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to make a thorough investigation of the so-called sugar trusts in the city of New York, and that he direct the collector of the port of New York and Mr. Joseph Treloar, in charge of the correspondence bureau in the New York customs district under the said collector, to formulate the information in his or their possession relating thereto to this House.

LICENSE TAX PAID BY NON-RESIDENTS.

Mr. RAYNER introduced a bill (H. R. 6643) for the relief of non-residents who have paid license taxes to the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ANNAPOLIS, MD.

Mr. COMPTON introduced a bill (H. R. 6644) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Annapolis, Md.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

SEIZURE OF FORFEITABLE IMPORTED BOOKS.

Mr. LONG introduced a bill (H. R. 6645) for the seizure and destruction of forfeitable imported books; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF LAWS AND DECISIONS FOR CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

Mr. COLLINS introduced a bill (H. R. 6646) to furnish officers of the customs with the tariff laws of the United States, and the rulings and decisions thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. COLLINS also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6647) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost the use of an arm or leg; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL, MICHIGAN.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, introduced a bill (H. R. 6648) for the establishment and maintenance of an Indian industrial school in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. CUTCHEON submitted the following proposed amendment to the rules; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule XXVIII, clause 1, be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Whenever application in writing, signed by a majority of all the members of the House, shall be presented to the Speaker requesting him to recognize any member therein named to move a suspension of the rules and pass a bill, to be named by him, upon the first Monday of the next ensuing month, it shall be the duty of the Speaker to recognize the member so named in such written request upon the said first Monday of the next ensuing month; and when more than one such written request is presented in any one month, the members therein named shall be recognized in the order in which they are presented to the Speaker."

REGISTER OF CERTAIN FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced a bill (H. R. 6649) directing the Commissioner of Navigation to register certain foreign-built vessels as American vessels; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a concurrent resolution relative to the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

MOORHEAD, LEECH LAKE, DULUTH AND NORTHERN RAILROAD.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (H. R. 6650) granting the right of way to the Moorhead, Leech Lake, Duluth and Northern Railroad Company through certain Indian lands in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL ACCOMMODATIONS, HOUSE DOCUMENT-ROOM.

Mr. BARRY submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be directed to inquire into the propriety of providing additional accommodations for the House document-room.

FEES, ETC., EXAMINING SURGEONS.

Mr. WALKER introduced a bill (H. R. 6651) establishing the fees and expenses of examining surgeons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MAPS OF UNITED STATES.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (H. R. 6652) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be printed maps of the United States in book form; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

FEES OF UNITED STATES COURT OFFICERS.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL introduced a bill (H. R. 6653) to amend the first section of an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSFER OF UNOCCUPIED ROOMS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. 6654) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

Mr. WEST introduced a bill (H. R. 6655) to provide for a public building at Schenectady, N. Y.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF FAIRBANKS COIN SCALES.

Mr. MAHONEY introduced a bill (H. R. 6656) making an appropriation for the purchase of the scale known as "Fairbanks' infallible American gold and silver coin scale and counterfeit-coin detector" for use in the post-offices throughout the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

RESTRICTION OF OWNERSHIP OF REAL ESTATE IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. FITCH introduced a bill (H. R. 6657) to amend an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens, etc.," approved March 3, 1887; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

EASTERN AND WESTERN BANDS, CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6658) to refer the claims of the Eastern and Western bands of Cherokee Indians to the Court of Claims for investigation and final judgment; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SURPLUS MONEY FOR COMMON-SCHOOL PURPOSES.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. 6659) to divide the surplus money in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of July, 1888, among the several States and Territories, to be used for purposes of common-school education; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON STATE BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6660) to repeal the tax of 10 per cent. on notes of State banks used as circulation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 1225, REVISED STATUTES.

SALARY OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (H. R. 6662) to amend section 3866 of the Revised Statutes in regard to the salary of letter-carriers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF REVENUE.

Mr. OUTHWAITE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6663) to reduce revenue; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TRACT OF LAND IN CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. FORAN introduced a bill (H. R. 6664) donating to the city of Cleveland, Ohio, a certain tract of land for street and park purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 566, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. FORAN also introduced a bill (H. R. 6665) to amend section 566 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WATCHMEN IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. FORAN also introduced a bill (H. R. 6666) to regulate the compensation of watchmen in the Executive Departments of the Government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6667) to create a board of education for the District of Columbia, and to prescribe its powers and duties; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

RECIPROCITY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH also introduced a bill (H. R. 6668) to extend the trade and commerce of the United States, and to provide for full reciprocity between the United States and the Dominion of Canada; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not know to which committee this bill should properly be referred, whether to the Committee on Ways and Means or to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] asks for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I raise the point of order that under the rules this bill ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, as it is a bill that relates entirely to revenue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky make a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I make the point of order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have no objection to the bill going there.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR introduced a bill (H. R. 6669) granting pensions for service in the Army and Navy or Marine Corps of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE-ESCAPES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ROMEIS submitted a resolution requesting the Committee on the District of Columbia to ascertain whether the law providing for fire-escapes in the District of Columbia is complied with; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WATERS OF ALASKA AND BERING SEA.

Mr. HERMANN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, what has been done by the Department of State in asserting the authority and dominion of this Government over the waters of Alaska and Bering Sea embraced in the treaty of 1867 between the United States and Russia; and whether any legislation is necessary on behalf of the United States to assert and maintain such authority and dominion, or for the protection of our fur-seal and other fisheries in said waters, and whether vessels, both foreign and domestic, adjudged by the courts of the United States to be confiscated, as well as their cargoes, for fishing unlawfully in said waters, have been released, and, if so, by what authority.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DINGLEY. The resolution refers to fisheries of the United States. Should it not go to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine make that motion?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

MINERAL LANDS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. HERMANN also introduced a bill (H. R. 6670) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit miners and companies and corporations organized for mining purposes to prospect, develop, lease, and own the mineral portion of any Indian reservation, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the Indians on any such reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LOT OF LAND IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. HARMER introduced a bill (H. R. 6671) to authorize the sale to the Schuylkill River East Side Railroad Company of a lot of ground belonging to the United States Naval Asylum in the city of Philadelphia, and providing that the amount of moneys received shall be expended in the improvement of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. OSBORNE introduced a bill (H. R. 6672) to define the necessary and proper expenses incident to the nomination and election or appointment of Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and to authorize the payment thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES.

BOND PURCHASES FOR SINKING FUND.

Mr. WEAVER submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas it appears from a letter of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 13, 1888, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and printed in Executive Document No. 78, first session Fiftieth Congress, that an additional appropriation of $2,000 is made necessary to meet an anticipated deficiency in telegraphic expenses of the Treasury Department, caused by the regulations recently adopted relating to deposits of Government funds in national-bank depositories; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report to Congress says, "The Government has purchased some bonds during the present fiscal year for the sinking fund, and has been obliged to pay such a price for them that the annual saving in interest upon the purchases is only about 2½ per cent.; that the price of the same class of bonds has materially advanced since these purchases, and that the premium paid on said purchases amounted to $2,852,015.88;" and

Whereas the policy of purchasing bonds with surplus money in the Treasury, as aforesaid, has ceased, and the policy of depositing the public funds in a large number of national banks has been substituted in lieu thereof; and

Whereas the statute authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to designate national banks as United States depositories provides that the Secretary shall prescribe the regulations by which said depositories of public funds shall be governed: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to report to this House at the earliest possible moment all the facts bearing upon the following inquiries:

First. At what dates were the propositions made by the Treasury Department to buy said bonds; and if any person or association was employed to purchase said bonds, give name of said person, persons, or association. Give dates of purchase, name of seller, kinds of bonds purchased, amounts paid, and current rates at which said bonds were quoted at the time the proposition to purchase was made by the Department.

Second. State when the policy relating to deposits in national-bank depositories was adopted which created the deficiency spoken of in the letter aforesaid of the Secretary of the Treasury, and whether after the purchase spoken of on the eleventh page of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1887; give also reasons for changing policy first adopted, to wit, the purchase of bonds.

Third. State if the deficiency spoken of in the aforesaid letter of the Secretary was caused by the large increase in the number of national-bank depositories. Append to your answer a statement showing the per cent. of deposits on bonds deposited to secure the same under present regulations of the Treasury Department; also append copy of said regulations. State what per cent. of deposits has been allowed by the Department on United States bonds deposited for this purpose for the past twelve years, and whether the rate has been uniform, and whether below or above the par value of the bonds previous to the adoption of the present policy, and what was the rate percentage at the date of change of policy.

Fourth. Has said new policy of the Department concerning United States depositories, the number thereof, and the increased percentage of deposits allowed had any effect to either increase or diminish the circulation of national-bank notes, and to what extent, and whether said policy has resulted in the increase or diminution of the money supply of the country?

Fifth. State the number of national banks which have been designated as depositories of public funds since the adoption of the present policy, the number formerly designated that have availed themselves of the increased rate, and where said banks have been designated since the adoption of the present policy and rates of deposits, state when the bonds deposited in the Treasury by said designated depositories were transferred to said associations, and by whom.

BILLS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. HERBERT submitted the following resolution, and moved its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask that these resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

They are as follows:

[House Joint Resolution No. 4.]

Requesting our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to oppose any reduction of the wool tariff.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, First. That we recognize in sheep husbandry one of the most important industries of our State and country, and one that almost every farmer is directly interested in, and without which our country can not be independent; and that we do therefore view with apprehension and alarm all propositions and measures to abolish or reduce the tariff duties now levied for its protection, and respectfully request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to oppose the same.

Second. That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and to each of the members of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States from Ohio.

ELBERT L. LAMPSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WM. C. LYON,

Adopted January 25, 1888.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 25th day of January, A. D. 1888, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888.

JAMES S. ROBINSON,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Columbus, Ohio, January 27, 1888.

In compliance with the request contained in the resolution above set forth, I have the honor to transmit a certified copy of the same herewith.

J. B. FORAKER, Governor.

[House Joint Resolution No. 5.]

Requesting our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to oppose certain measures which were suggested in the President's recent message.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, First. That we believe in a protective tariff for the sake of protection, to the end that we may have a diversity of employment, domestic commerce, home markets for our farmers, good wages for our laborers, and such development of all our material resources as will make it possible for us to supply all our wants in both peace and war, and thus be independent as a nation among the nations of the earth.

Second. Under this wise and patriotic policy, inaugurated and steadily upheld and enforced by the Republican party since its advent to power in 1861, we have prospered as no other nation ever did.

Third. We regard the views expressed by His Excellency the President of the United States, in his recent message to Congress, in opposition to this policy, as unwise, unjust, and unpatriotic, and as calculated, if formulated into law and given effect, to not only dissipate our surplus revenue, but also paralyze our industries, stop the development of our resources, degrade labor, stagnate and demoralize business, and reduce us to that weak and dependent condition to which the country had been brought by a Democratic free-trade policy when the Republican party was placed in power in 1861.

Fourth. That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to oppose all measures that may be offered for the purpose of giving effect to these views and recommendations of the President.

Fifth. That the governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives from Ohio in the Congress of the United States.

ELBERT L. LAMPSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WM. C. LYON,

Adopted January 26, 1888.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1888, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888.

JAMES S. ROBINSON,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Columbus, Ohio, January 27, 1888.

In accordance with the request contained in the resolutions above set forth, I have the honor to transmit a certified copy of the same herewith.

J. B. FORAKER, Governor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This completes the call of the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills.

[Speaker CARLISLE here resumed the chair, his appearance being greeted with loud and prolonged applause.]

THANKS TO SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE COX.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution for present consideration, and I know that after it is read every gentleman in this House will take pleasure in voting for it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be granted to Hon. SAMUEL S. COX for the courteous, just, and impartial manner in which he presided over its deliberations as Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker, and for his expeditious and satisfactory dispatch of public business.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, during your regrettable absence it pleased the gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber to make me for a time your locum tenens. I thank gentlemen on both sides for their uniform good temper and for their forbearance towards one who was called fresh from the floor for the exacting and perplexing duties of the Chair. I had not the opportunity to thank gentlemen at the time I was elected to that place; but I do so now, and I tender my heartiest acknowledgments. [Applause.]

CONTESTED ELECTION—LOWRY VS. WHITE.

Mr. CRISP. I call up for consideration, as a question of privilege, the contested-election case of Lowry vs. White, Twelfth district, Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, First. That James B. White, not having been a citizen of the United States for seven years previous to the 4th of March, 1887, is not entitled to retain his seat in the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana.

Resolved, Second. That Robert Lowry, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

Mr. CRISP. There is also pending a substitute offered by the minority. Under the arrangement gentlemen on the other side will now use the time which remains to them.

Mr. ROWELL. I yield forty-five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. In some respects this is a very remarkable contested-election case. In the fall of 1886 there was an election held in the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana at which there were 34,589 votes cast. Of that number James B. White, the sitting member, got 17,900, and Robert Lowry 15,416 votes; making a plurality for Mr. White of 2,484, and a majority of 1,214 votes. Upon this record Mr. White's election is contested by his competitor, Robert Lowry.

The majority of the committee—in fact, I might say all of the committee but one—decided that Robert Lowry, the contestee, has no rights in court. The minority of your committee concede that Mr. Lowry, as a citizen of the Twelfth Congressional district, has a right to petition and raise the question of the eligibility of his competitor, James B. White. Then, as this record appears before this House to-day, Mr. Lowry stands here simply as an elector of the Twelfth Congressional district, saying that because James B. White is not a citizen of the United States he is not eligible to hold the seat to which the people have elected him. Out of nearly 35,000 voters, Mr. Speaker, he is the only elector in that district who is here contesting the right of James B. White. Out of 34,500 voters, 34,499 of them concede the right of this man to his seat upon this floor.

Then we are brought face to face with the proposition whether or not he is entitled to hold the seat that he has been elected to by 2,500 majority over his competitor.

The majority of the committee say that, as he is unable to show by the records of the court in which he was naturalized that he is a naturalized citizen, he is therefore barred of the right of proving it. The minority of your committee say that if he is a naturalized citizen it is a fact, and he has the right to prove that fact.

The majority of the committee quote authorities on their side to show that certain courts have held that naturalization can only be proved by the record of it. The minority of the committee quote authorities equally strong to show that where the record fails to exhibit the fact it may be proved by parol evidence. Then we are brought here with one side contending that these authorities show one thing; the other side contending that they show another; and we come back then to the great fundamental principles that govern this body.

It is an old and well-settled principle in law that no court can construe an act of the legislative branch of the Government as well as the power that makes it. In nearly every State of this Union at every session of the Legislature it is called upon to pass acts to construe this or that act of the Legislature. We are then called upon in this case—not conceding the position taken by the majority—we are called upon in this case to decide what the act of Congress providing for naturalization means.

I for one would rather hold with the judge that decided the Coleman case, that whenever the man who seeks his naturalization has done all the law compels him to do he becomes a citizen of the United States; that the mere act of omission of the clerk shall not deprive him of his naturalization. And that is in accordance with our ideas of republican institutions; it is in accordance with our ideas of the right of men to be naturalized. I would rather hold with the supreme court of California, where they passed upon the question of the right of a citizen to vote; they say that wherever the act says the voter shall do certain things it is mandatory, but where it says the clerk shall do certain things it is directory; and if the clerk fails to perform his duty that failure of his shall not deprive the man of his right to vote and his right to citizenship.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] the other day said that he honored Captain White for his military record.

Mr. O'FERRALL. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him a moment, I do not think that I said that I honored Captain White for his military record. I said that I honored any brave and gallant Union soldier for his military record. I did not apply that to Captain White.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will take the gentleman's statement as he makes it, that he honors any brave Union soldier for his military record. Coupled with that he said the other day that he himself had served four years on the other side, and I can readily conceive how he can honor a brave man against whom he fought; but did it ever occur to the honorable gentleman that while he was engaged in that conflict on the one side and Captain White on the other, they were really appealing from the courts to settle a disputed question as to the construction of the organic act of the Government—the construction of the Constitution of the United States? That question was appealed from the courts to a higher tribunal, and when we find the courts differing in their decisions we stand here to settle the rights of an American citizen under the acts of Congress authorizing him to be naturalized, and we are a court unto ourselves, because the Constitution says that this House is the sole judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members.

We could make no rule here that would bind a future Congress, and as this question is is to be settled by Congress, I believe, with the minority of this committee, that it is right to let Captain White come in and prove his citizenship in any way he can that is known to the law of evidence. This brings us to the simple isolated question of fact, Was Captain White ever naturalized? Did he become a naturalized citizen of the United States seven years before he took his seat in this Congress as a member from the Twelfth district of Indiana? Captain White came to this country in 1854, a beardless boy, before he had reached the years of manhood. They say Captain White has admitted that in 1856 he voted for John C. Frémont. I am not here to dispute that proposition, and I think that if every man upon the opposite side of this Chamber would go to Captain White and ask him if he voted for John C. Frémont in 1856, he would tell them very frankly that he thinks he did; that he came here a minor and believed then, and until 1858, that having come here as a minor, he had a right to vote when he attained his majority without being naturalized.

In 1858 he took out his first papers in Allen County, Indiana. In 1861 Captain White enlisted in defense of a country of which he was not yet a citizen. He had left the home of his fathers and come to cast his fortunes with this growing nation of ours, and when its perpetuity was threatened, he, like a man who loved liberty and loved our free institutions, enlisted in their defense. He came out of the service in 1863 or 1864. In 1865 he thought he would go and visit the land of his nativity, that he would go back and see his father and mother. Then it was that he was told by relatives and by citizens of his town that he had better take out his second papers. Captain White swears that in February, 1865, he went into the clerk's office of Allen County and took out his second papers, and started on his contemplated visit, but when he got to the city of New York he received information by telegraph that his wife was lying dangerously ill, whereupon he abandoned the trip, came home to Indiana, and has ever since been a citizen of Fort Wayne. He has been elected to office after office; he has been honored by the people of his own city; he has been voted for time and again; and this question of his naturalization was never raised until 1886.

Now, then, as to the facts and the proof whether or not Captain White was ever a naturalized citizen. A few days before the election he was confronted by Mr. Bell, of Fort Wayne, and Mr. Moynihan, agents of the contestant, Mr. Lowry. Then, for the first time in his life, he was charged with not being a naturalized citizen. What did White say upon that occasion? He said, "I am a citizen; I was naturalized in this Allen County, and Isaac Jenkinson was with me when I was naturalized. I was naturalized in the court-house." "Well, but Captain White, have you got your papers?" "I do not know whether I have got my papers or not. I do not know whether I can find my commission in the Army or not. I do not know whether I can find my marriage certificate; but still I know I was married." What was the object of Mr. Bell's interview with Captain White? To prepare a publication that was to drive consternation into the ranks of Captain White's followers.

Now, let us go one step farther and see whether or not Captain White is corroborated by the circumstances surrounding this case. Upon Thursday, the 28th day of October, there came out a publication in the papers of Fort Wayne charging that Captain White was not a naturalized citizen, and Isaac Jenkinson, living a hundred miles away, sitting in his office the next day reads that statement, and what does he say? Why, he says, "That is impossible! I certainly was with Captain White and saw him naturalized." No man can contend, no man who reads the evidence can contend that there was any understanding or communication between Captain White and Mr. Jenkinson.

Can there be any doubt that Mr. Jenkinson is to be believed? If any man on the other side of the Chamber doubts it for one moment, let him take up the report of the committee, written by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARRY], and he will find it conceded that Isaac Jenkinson is a man worthy of belief, having long been a citizen of high standing in his own State, and having for six years represented our nation in a foreign land. He stands before you, then, unimpeached. And what does he say on this question? He says, "I was with Captain White just after the war closed, and I think he was naturalized in Allen County, in the city of Fort Wayne."

I admit that, as gentlemen on the other side have pointed out, the evidence of Mr. Jenkinson in his examination-in-chief was not so strong and pointed as it might have been. But there sat Mr. Lowry, the contestant, a sharp, shrewd practitioner, who commenced upon cross-examination to press the witness with questions. "Where was this man naturalized? Was it in the clerk's office or in the court-house?" "It was in the court-house," says Mr. Jenkinson. "Who were present?" "There were myself, Mr. White, Mr. Brown, I think, and perhaps others, and possibly Mr. Chittenden." Then Mr. Lowry puts the question, "Did you sit down or were you standing up?" "Captain White and I were standing up in front of the court, a little to the right and in front of the court." "But," asks the contestant, "was not the clerk's desk there?" "The clerk's desk was there; but we stood to the right and in front of the court." He was driven on still further by this kind of cross-examination until he said, "There is one fact which convinces me that I was there and that it was after the war." "What is that, Mr. Jenkinson?" "Why," says he, "it was remarked there that it was a strange thing that a Union soldier should have to swear allegiance to the United States Government."

Mr. BARRY. Let me interrupt the gentleman a moment. He says, "It was remarked." Who "remarked" it?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Jenkinson says it was remarked at that time.

Mr. BARRY. Where does Mr. Jenkinson say that?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. If you will turn to the record——

Mr. BARRY. Read it and see.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. If the gentleman will turn to the re-examination of Mr. Jenkinson, question 4, he will find that is what he says—that it was remarked as strange that a Union soldier must swear allegiance to the United States Government and renounce allegiance to Queen Victoria.

What happened next? He is asked, "To whom did you first make that remark?" He answers, "The first man I talked about it was Colonel Robinson, of Fort Wayne, a few days after the election. I said to him, 'I see that they are raising the question that Captain White has not been naturalized; that can not be possible; I was present when he was naturalized;' and Colonel Robinson spoke up and said, 'That is just what Jim White says about it.'"

Here are these two persons, a hundred miles apart, who, without opportunity to consult with each other, agree thus in their statements.

Now, I want to put it to the majority of the committee, Do you believe that if Captain White were trying to show a naturalization which did not take place, he would, when confronted with the question, have referred to a high-toned, honorable gentleman like Mr. Jenkinson, and said that that gentleman was present at the time of the naturalization? Would he have selected a man a hundred miles away and said he was there, basing his whole case upon this statement without knowing how that other man would testify? This fact alone does away with the idea that James B. White was stating anything but what he really and absolutely believed. If he had been undertaking to prove that he was naturalized when he knew that he was not, he would have selected two of his followers in the city of Fort Wayne and said that they were present as his witnesses. But instead of this he names a man whom he has not seen for years, a man 100 miles away, and a man who, as all agree, is an honorable, high-toned gentleman.

Now, I wish to call attention to one very astounding fact; and I want gentlemen representing the majority of the committee, when they come to make their closing argument, to state the reason for what I am about to bring to the attention of members. We find that in the report of the majority, where the interview between Mr. White, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Moynihan is referred to, the evidence of Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan is set out nearly in full; and the majority of the committee, making a great show of fairness, then say, "It is but fair to set out the evidence of Mr. White," attempting to leave the impression upon this House that the evidence of Mr. White and the evidence of Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan constitute the whole evidence of what transpired at that interview. Why, gentlemen of the majority of the committee, if you wanted to treat Mr. White fairly in this report, why did you not set out also the evidence of John W. White as to that interview, thus giving the evidence of the four witnesses to the transaction? But instead of that, you rely upon the evidence of two witnesses on your side and one upon ours. How does that record stand? Mr. Moynihan and Mr. Bell swear to one version of that interview; James B. White and his son, John W. White, swear to another and entirely different version. Captain White swears that he never gave any date as to when these papers were taken out. His son, John W. White, comes in and corroborates him. Therefore, as to what took place at that interview this record stands with Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan on one side, and Mr. James B. White and Mr. John W. White on the other.

Now, then, if it was the mere preponderance of evidence on that point your case would have to fall.

But let us look for a few moments as to how the witnesses stand before this House; how the witnesses stand in this evidence. Who is Robert C. Bell, of Fort Wayne? A politician, as shown by this record, who has been the worker of the contestant in this case; who, as the record shows, was in the convention that nominated him, and the chairman of the committee on credentials, with power to throw out delegates for one man and to seat delegates for another.

He goes down on the 28th of October to Captain White with a falsehood in his mouth. Turn to the record, page 155. He had Captain White telegraphed for on the 27th. He leaves the heat and turmoil of a political campaign. He goes to Fort Wayne to answer the telegram sent to him at the instance of Robert C. Bell, who was acting as the agent of Robert Lowry; when Mr. Bell meets him, he says, "Captain White, I have always been a friend of yours; they are going to spring something on you in the contest, and that is you are not a naturalized citizen of the United States. I heard it but yesterday."

Turn to the record and you will find he admits that he told Captain White that fact. But when did he learn it? By his own evidence he had known it fourteen days before. But he tells Captain White, to mislead him and throw him off his guard, that he had merely learned it the day before.

One step further. I ask the majority of this committee if they are here to defend the record of Robert C. Bell in this evidence. If it shows anything, it shows that on a certain Saturday John D. Sardinghausen, a naturalized German, a member of the Indiana State senate, was met by Mr. Lowry, and told by him that he could put him out of the State senate sooner than he got in, because he was not a naturalized citizen. But, said Mr. Sardinghausen, "I am a naturalized citizen, and was naturalized before you, Judge Lowry."

Let us go one step farther in this investigation. John D. Sardinghausen the next day, on Sunday, showed his naturalization papers to Robert C. Bell. On Monday Robert C. Bell went to the clerk's office to investigate the fact, whether there was a record there or not, and on the next day he brought back the record showing that he had been naturalized. That puts Judge Lowry, the contestant in this case, in the position of charging, as in this case, that the record in the case of J. D. Sardinghausen was a forgery.

Then what have you got? You have got the fact that Robert C. Bell went to the court-house in the city of Fort Wayne, as the attorney of John D. Sardinghausen, and forged a record of naturalization, or Mr. Lowry has testified falsely in this case. They ask you to believe, in the trial of this cause, a man who, as shown by Lowry's own evidence, has tampered with and forged the records of Allen County; upon such evidence as that you are asked to say that James B. White has perjured himself! That is just where this case lies. You bring a man as witness who, according to your evidence, tampered with the records—made records which never existed—and then ask us to turn this man out on such evidence as that.

Still one step further. The majority of this committee seek to make some capital out of the fact that James B. White took out his third papers in Kosciusko County. Does not the evidence show that he had taken out his second papers in Allen County? Does not the evidence of Mr. Colerick and Mr. Purman show that they advised him, as lawyers, to go and take them out? They testify, sir, the court was not in session in Allen County, and they told him it would do no harm, and it might do him some good; and on their advice he went and took out his papers. Is that to be used against him in weighing his right to a seat on this floor?

I want to call your attention to some other evidence—the evidence of William T. Pratt, a man who was sheriff of Allen County for four years, who has been justice of the peace, and honored by his State on the board of supervisors and the board of trustees of the northern penitentiary. Mr. Pratt swears that he was in court, that he saw Mr. Jenkinson and Mr. White in court holding up their hands and testifying, and that he thinks they were going through the operation of naturalization.

Now, I want to call the attention of my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE], as he is the only man in this discussion who has sought to drag politics into it in any way, to some of the testimony given here, and I am certain that my friend could never have read this evidence on the part of Mr. Pratt, or he would not have been willing to sit here in his place and deny his Democracy. I ask my friend to turn to page 207 of the record, at the bottom of the page, and read these words:

142. Q. You have been asked and answered concerning your past political affiliations. Is it not a fact that for some years past, in consequence of the disappointments you have unfortunately met with politically, been generally about election time considerably given to grumbling and enrolled usually in the ranks of those known as political kickers?—A. No, sir; I vote the Democratic ticket straight and take my whisky straight and don't belong to kickers.

Is he a Democrat after that? Can you doubt his Democracy on reading such testimony? [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Not from your point of view.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I simply quote that for the benefit of my honored friend from Ohio, who seeks to cast a doubt upon Mr. Pratt's testimony on political grounds.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will yield for a question. How long a time do you want?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Only for a moment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. All right.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask the gentleman if it is not true that Mr. Pratt testified that he was bitterly hostile to Mr. Lowry during the whole of that contest?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That may be true, I will answer the gentleman; but that is no reason for discrediting his testimony, for there are 2,500 or 3,000 of the best Democrats in the world that were hostile to him at the same time. If you are going to brand this man as a liar and a perjurer because he did not stand under the party lash of Mr. Lowry, why then you will necessarily discredit 3,000 of the best Democrats in Indiana. [Applause.] If they are perjurers simply because they did not bow the knee and bend their backs to the crack of Judge Lowry's party whip, why of course in view of the fact that they did not bow the knee they come under the ban of your denunciation.

Now, then, another point. I want to appeal to this House for fair play and fair dealing. I also appeal to the majority of this committee. You quote here the evidence of a Mr. Spencer, who swears that he was at a party and had a conversation after the election with contestee. If you had been judges upon the bench during the trial of this case you would have stricken out that testimony upon the motion of James B. White. But what do you do? You produce it here to impeach him, when he never had a chance to deny the conversation, for when he offered, after the evidence in the case was closed, to prove to the contrary, you denied him the right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if James B. White is not a citizen of the United States, to what country on earth does he belong? He has renounced his allegiance to Queen Victoria. You say he is not a citizen of this country; then it follows that he is a man without a country. If, after taking out his papers here, he had gone to Scotland, and when he got there the Queen had called him as her own, James B. White could have stood up in the face of the British Government and said, "I am an American citizen; here is my certificate of naturalization." "Oh!" but the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Virginia say, "unless you can show the record of the court in which you were naturalized you are not entitled to the protection of the flag you fought to perpetuate."

Then James B. White would open his coat and exhibit the scar upon his manly bosom and say, "Gentlemen, here is my certificate; here are the wounds I received fighting for the perpetuity of a republican form of government in the United States." "Oh!" but say the majority of the committee again, "that all goes for naught; that amounts to nothing; you must show the record." But I ask you, sir, what would the American Congress have said in the face of these facts? It would have declared war if necessary against Great Britain and demanded the release of this man as an American citizen.

If we are to establish this rule, that every foreigner who lands upon our shores is compelled to stand over the county clerk and see that he makes a proper record of his naturalization, and does his duty before he can safely claim that he has been naturalized, I would not give much for the rights you confer upon him as an American citizen. Is the life of a man to go for naught on this kind of evidence and on such a ruling? Why, since 1854, for over thirty years, this man has been an honored citizen of the United States, an honored citizen of the State of Indiana. He has shown his devotion to his country by defending her flag and her Constitution upon many a well-fought field; cemented it with his blood, and is here now to ask you to give him the right of an American citizen, because he has performed every single act and deed that he has been called upon to perform.

Mr. Speaker, I should hate to go back to my constituency and face any honest foreigner, and take him by the hand and say I have voted that he, as an adopted American citizen, must carry a copy of the court record with him to prove his citizenship; and if he loses the paper, and the clerk of the court failed to do his duty, that he must be deprived of the right of American citizenship. I do not believe it is the law; I do not believe it is in accordance with right; I do not believe it is in accordance with the principles of common justice, and hence I shall vote to retain Mr. White in his seat. [Applause.]

Mr. ROWELL. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CRISP. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. O'NEALL].

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I was taught when I was a boy to do what I believed to be my duty, and then not to apologize on account of having so done. I took more interest in the case which is now pending before the House for the reason probably that it comes from the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor.

I heard the able arguments of counsel on both sides, and I may say that they were made by able and fair men. I read the briefs in the case and I looked through all this evidence and tried to eliminate all that part of the evidence which I regarded as unquestionably irrelevant. I undertook to reconcile the relevant testimony in order to determine, if I could, where the truth lay. I did that with some degree of care and painstaking, and I came to the conclusion at which a majority of the committee arrived so far as the eligibility of James B. White to a seat on this floor is concerned; and for having arrived at that conclusion I have no apology to make.

But why should we discuss matters not connected with this case?

Why should we bring into the record in this case things that belong not to it? The fact that Mr. White was a soldier is paraded here with some pomp and circumstance. If we were called upon to vote a pension to the contestee; if we were voting a resolution of thanks to the contestee; if we were voting to give him a medal for gallant and meritorious conduct on the field of battle, then such arguments as that might be brought into this case. But why should that be brought into this case when it has nothing to do with the question at issue at all?

What is the question at issue? The question in this case is whether James B. White is and was prior to the 4th day of March, 1887, for a period of seven years a citizen of this country? That is the question and that is the sole question. If we were to sit upon the question as to whether Mr. White received enough votes to give him the privileges of this floor, we should look to the popular voice of the district from whence he came. But that is not the question. The question in this case is this, is the contestee eligible to sit in his place on this floor? And that is the sole question.

I hope I have as much respect and as high a regard for the expression of public opinion as any man upon this floor. And when gentlemen who have never been engaged in the study of the law books of the country rise in their places here and undertake to discuss questions of that kind I am not at all surprised that they are disposed to be influenced by the vox populi. But when gentlemen who have grown gray in the practice of the legal profession; when lawyers who have sat upon the bench, lawyers who have drank at the fountains of Blackstone, of Kent, and of Story, judges who have adorned the bench and by their wisdom enriched the literature of our jurisprudence—it does surprise me when such men come here and discuss the questions as to whether James B. White was a soldier in the Army, or whether he had 2,500 majority, and parade that fact as testimonial to his popularity.

If that is the argument, might it not be answered that the expression of the popular will is simply an evidence of the want of popularity in the other man. The voice of the people is sometimes wavering, often uncertain, and not unfrequently a fickle guide; but that voice should be heeded when expressed in a legitimate way.

If the fact that Mr. White was a soldier is to be considered, why not inquire what manner of service he performed to the country. Did he enlist as a private, or did he take the place of a commissioned officer, a place which he could easily resign, and a place which he did resign. Why not inquire if he did not make himself so unpleasant to his superior officers as to demand that his resignation be given for the good of the service. Why not inquire if he did not thus make himself unpleasant and insubordinate in order to get a pretext to resign; all to the end that he obtain a sutler's position in another quarter, where he could sell to the boys sardines, bologna, skimmed milk, watered whisky, and Kentucky lug at a dollar a plug. Upon full inquiry all of these facts would be found to be true, and would be equally pertinent.

All such facts and arguments are the most arrant demagogy and the thinnest and cheapest kind of political clap-trap, and lugged into the case to distract the attention of the House from the real controversy. The conduct of contestee and his friends in keeping such rubbish prominent in the case reminds one of the mother bird that when incubating her eggs, or caring for her young brood, at the approach of an enemy or antagonist leaves her nest or her young ones, and starts off, making the most pitiful cries, until she has lured the supposed enemy from her nest and her young offspring. So in the matter before the House.

Let us get down to this case as we find it. Let us strip it of all that verbiage and irrelevant matter which belongs not to it. When we have done that, when we have cleaned away the rubbish, when we have cleared away the mist thrown about it for the purpose of preventing us from seeing the points involved—when that is done let us examine those points, because those are the points upon which this House wants to be enlightened.

What is the issue? A question of fact? Yes, a question of fact. What fact? Is contestee eligible to a seat on this floor? To be eligible he must be a citizen for the full term of seven years before March 4, 1887. He was born in a foreign land; this being admitted, the burthen is upon him to show his naturalization. Has he done that? If so, by what evidence? I maintain he has not proven that fact by any sort of evidence. His friends claim he has proven it by parol. If he has, is that testimony admissible and competent? These are the important inquiries. They ought to be determined from a legal standpoint. The law and the Constitution is our safety. The police-court lawyer may pettifog his case and be excused.

Such practice on the part of the matured, trained, and respectable lawyer would be intolerable. While those upon this floor may resort to such methods and be excusable, I trust that all who have respect for the law will not allow themselves to be swerved from the line of duty by such cheap talk. Such arguments should influence the votes of no one. The law, with its safeguards, has come down to us tested in the crucible of years. I think I have as high respect and as much consideration for public opinion as any other gentleman. While such is the case, I want to say that I venerate the Constitution and the law. It is to the broad ægis of that Constitution and those laws that we must look for our safety. That Constitution and those laws, like a flaming sword, is our protection by day and by night, the protection of the dear ones at home.

Shall we be governed by considerations of law, or go off at a tangent and lose sight of these safeguards? If we are to lose sight of these safeguards, then why inquire into the question of eligibility? Because it is the merest folly to have constitutional provisions prescribing qualifications if the fact that an individual has been a soldier or that he comes here indorsed by a popular majority is to control our conduct in passing upon the question of eligibility.

If the fact that contestee was a soldier, that he did good service or disgraced himself, is to and can cut no figure in determining the question of eligibility, if the fact that contestee had 2,500 majority has nothing to do with the question of qualification, then we come to inquire of the facts.

Admitting that parol testimony under the circumstances in this case is admissible to prove the fact of naturalization, does that proof establish the fact? If the parol evidence in this case does not establish that fact, then all will admit that contestee can not retain his seat. What does the parol testimony prove? We are told that contestee has testified, and that his testimony is indisputed, that he was naturalized. We are told that contestee stands unimpeached. And we were asked, why were not witnesses produced to impeach him, to call in question his general reputation for truth? The failure to do this is paraded with some degree of pomp and circumstance. Sirs, there are other ways known to the law by which witnesses may be impeached. Impeachment by proving general bad character is one of the poorest ways of impeachment.

A witness's testimony can be impeached by showing that at different times and places he made statements which are contradictory of those to which he testifies. When he testifies, you take the circumstances surrounding the case and the circumstance to which he testifies, and when you sift out the facts which from his testimony and the testimony of others appear to be clearly proven, then if the point for which he contends is found to be inconsistent with those facts which are clearly and indisputably proven, you have a right to reject that part of his testimony which you thus find to be untrue. Is that the law?

I need not read to lawyers upon this floor or to gentlemen who have sat upon the bench authorities to show that such is the law, but from some of the speeches made upon the other side of this Chamber, and some made even upon this, it would appear that there are members upon this floor who are not lawyers, and for their benefit I desire to read from a recent decision which shows that a man's testimony must be consistent with the established facts in the transaction that he claims he is testifying about. This is a decision rendered by the United States Supreme Court on the 5th day of December last. On the very day upon which this House was organized the Supreme Court promulgated this decision. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Blatchford, the same man who delivered the opinion in the Coleman case, so frequently referred to in this argument. I hope that the decision from which I am about to read will lose none of its force with the House when I state that one of the parties to the case decided was James B. White. The title of the case is James B. White against George M. Barber. What James B. White it may be asked? I answer, the same James B. White, the identical man who is the contestee upon this floor. He was the plaintiff in the case in the court below, and that court decided against him. He was the appellant; he took the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court above affirmed the decision of the lower court.

Now, what are the facts of this case, and what principle of law does the Supreme Court there lay down? Let us see. James B. White sued this man, Barber, for $15,000 upon the face of his complaint. He filed therewith a bill of particulars, and that bill of particulars set forth items which when summed up made eleven thousand and some odd dollars. The court referred to the testimony of White in the case. Here is what he testified to in the court below:

James B. White, the plaintiff, testified that now and during the time in question he resided at Fort Wayne, Ind., engaged in the business of dealing in general merchandise; that in 1879 and prior thereto, one A. S. Maltman, of Chicago, acted as his agent in purchasing and forwarding merchandise of various kinds; that about September, 1879, "desiring to do some trading on the Board of Trade of Chicago, I got Maltman to recommend some good, responsible broker on the Board of Trade through whom I could do business; that Maltman recommended the defendant, who then and during the time in question was a broker residing in Chicago and doing business on the Board of Trade; that thereupon I commenced trading on the Board of Trade, sending my orders at first to Maltman, who communicated them to the defendant; that about December, 1879, I came to Chicago and made the acquaintance of the defendant, and thereafter did business directly with him; that I continued to do business with the defendant during the years 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882, buying and selling on the board, through the defendant as a broker, corn, wheat, oats, pork, and other commodities, and that about April 19, 1882, I had a settlement with the defendant in which all previous dealings were adjusted; that up to this time the transactions which I had made through defendant on the board amounted to $105,000 in 1879, $1,718,000 in 1880, $540,000 in the year 1881, and $672,000 in 1882; that in November or December, 1879, and at other times prior to the settlement in April, 1882, I had conversations with the defendant in which I told the defendant that I was a merchant in Fort Wayne, Ind., and did not want it known that I was engaged in speculating on the Board of Trade in Chicago, as it might affect my credit, and that the account could be kept in the name of A. S. Maltman; that I considered it a hazardous business, but was willing to gamble provided that I could have a fair show; that I wanted my deals placed with responsible parties, so that I could get my money when I made it; that I did not want any of the property, but meant simply to do a gambling business," etc.

Now, the testimony goes on in that way. The opinion of the Supreme Court upon this case was delivered by Mr. Justice Blatchford, who gave the celebrated opinion in the Coleman case, to which so much reference has been made here. Justice Blatchford, referring to the testimony of the appellant in that case, the contestee on this floor in the present case, says:

White testifies that such was his understanding, communicated to Barber before Barber made the contracts of sale. Barber testifies that he has no recollection of anything of the kind. The evidence as to what White did in connection with the transactions is inconsistent with White's version, and it clearly appears that Barber had no such understanding.

Now, why should we be required to bring witnesses to impeach a man here because of want of reputation among his neighbors? The shrewdest men who undertake to deceive when they go upon the stand you can never reach in that way. But sometimes even a shrewd man leaves his tracks, and when you undertake to go and find where he has been along the highways and byways you find a track here and a track there which fail not to impress themselves upon your mind. And then the tracks of other individuals that have gone with him are sometimes found pointing in the same direction; and when the man sets up a story inconsistent with the existence of those facts you determine at once that his testimony is not reliable. Let us take Mr. White's testimony in this case and weigh it in that scale. Let us see where he stands. What are the facts in this case?

Mr. NUTTING. Will the gentleman allow me ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Not at all. I would take great pleasure in answering any question, but I have not time to do so; and I do not intend to be annoyed or diverted from the line of my argument by questions which I have not time to answer.

I say, let us examine the testimony of James B. White. As I said awhile ago, we may be able to show that he made contradictory statements on other occasions. We may be able to show facts the existence of which is inconsistent with Mr. White's claim in this case. We have the right to take what we find and what is asserted but not found. Let us test the testimony of White in this case by that rule of reason and of law.

What is Mr. White's claim? He admits that he has no certificate; and that circumstance, so far as it goes, tends to sustain the claim that he never had one. Mr. White admits that there is no record, no trace of a record, no scratch of a pen, showing that he ever had any naturalization papers. These are two very strong circumstances. But they are not the only ones to be considered. What are the other circumstances? The next circumstance is this: On the 28th of October, 1886, he was for the first time confronted with the question whether he was a naturalized citizen, and we have his statements made upon that occasion to the men who confronted him, Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan.

To be sure, the record in this case shows that Mr. White himself undertook to contradict to some extent the testimony of those two witnesses. But it must be remembered that in this case he is the contestee, as in the case to which I have just referred he was the plaintiff, having in each case some interest in the result. A few years ago, in all the States of this Union, such an interest would have made a man incompetent to testify before a court of justice. It is only within the last few years that the law has broken down the barrier and allowed a man to testify in his own behalf. Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan, in their testimony, state what Mr. White said—that he voted for Frémont, that he took out his papers to vote for Frémont. Mr. White himself does not deny that part of his conversation in any of the printed testimony in this case. He said, "I know I am all right;" he did not say, "I am a naturalized citizen." The record does not show anything of that kind. He did say, "I am all right; I took out my second papers in 1857 or 1858, and Isaac Jenkinson was with me." Never, at no time, did he, until served with notice of contest, claim that he took them out in 1865.

Now let us digress for a few minutes and examine the testimony of Mr. Jenkinson to see how it dovetails in and corresponds with other facts proven along the line of this testimony and about which there is no controversy. Mr. Jenkinson testifies that in 1851 he was admitted to the bar; that he was a practitioner from that time until 1863; that in 1863 he retired from practice—possibly the practice may have retired from him; but after that time there is no pretense here that he was a lawyer or attorney in any court of the State. During the time that J. D. G. Nelson was clerk of the circuit court of Allen County Mr. Chittenden was deputy clerk. Mr. Nelson's term of office expired in 1862; Mr. Chittenden went out of that office in 1862, and in 1863 Mr. Jenkinson retired from the practice of the law. Now, the evidence in this case does show that Mr. White took out his first papers in 1858. That is when he said to Bell and Moynihan that he had made the thing all right. It was in 1858. At that time Jenkinson was about the court-house. At that time Chittenden was about the court-house. Sir, day after day and week after week these men were about the court-house until they retired. It was natural to find these men there. What is the conclusion? The conclusion which I have reached is this: Mr. White wanted his first papers and he needed a little assistance, which he secured in the person of Jenkinson, who at that time—but not in 1865—was an attorney and willing to render him that assistance. They went to Chittenden, and the evidence is that the first papers are in the handwriting of Mr. Chittenden.

In his conversation with Bell and Moynihan he made no claim of taking out papers at any other time. In his own testimony he claims that in said conversation he referred to no time. Bell and Moynihan testify that he did, that he was all right, that he took out his papers—the papers that made him all right—in 1858. The statement here made is contradictory of his claim afterward made that he took out his papers in 1865. It is easy to reconcile Jenkinson's testimony upon the theory that it was 1858 that he assisted White.

At that time, 1858, Jenkinson was a practicing lawyer. In 1865 he was not; he had quit in 1863. Jenkinson's testimony is very muddy, and this is not surprising after the lapse of nearly a quarter of a century. Jenkinson in his testimony-in-chief says he does not know whether he was at the court-house as a spectator, a witness, or a lawyer. Singular that the court should be in session in 1865, after Chittenden had been out of the court-house nearly three years; after Jenkinson had been away about two years; and that these individuals should be there keeping the judge company and no other lawyer there, no court officer there except Pratt, and no other individual there except those taken there by White. In 1858, when the first papers were taken out, which could be effected in vacation, the parties named would much more likely have been there than in 1865.

White's first effort to make himself eligible by reason of his service as a soldier is inconsistent with the fact of naturalization in 1865. His conversations with his lawyers, in consultation with them, and his failure to claim naturalization in 1865, which failure to so claim, when Bell and Moynihan asked him, October 28, if it were not possible that he took out his second papers to enable him to obtain a passport, and his denial thereof, tend to contradict his after claim. Long after these conversations, in which nothing is said about a passport by him, in face of the fact that his attention was called thereto, he begins placing the procurement of his second papers upon the ground that he needed them to secure a passport.

Accordingly, February 28, 1865, he secures his second papers and a few days thereafter boards a train for New York, passes by the city of Washington, gets to New York, is ready to sail for the haunts of his boyhood, and yet he procures no passport, which a thorough examination of the passport records develops. No certificate of second papers, no record of second papers, no passport. What manner of man is this? Can any reasonable man persuade himself that all these things could take place and not a trace of evidence remain of record anywhere of any of them?

White's testimony and Jenkinson's testimony can be reconciled on the theory that what they testify about is connected with the taking out of first papers in 1858, but not with the taking out of second papers. Much has been said about the records of Allen County—that they are pigeon-tracked all over with forgery and fraud. No evidence can be found anywhere in the record to substantiate any such assertion.

The clerk of Allen County, whose testimony is in the record and from which we learn that he became clerk in 1878 and that his term expired in 1882, when he came into office found that all naturalizations were recorded on the order-book of the court as required by the laws of the State of Indiana, and who for that reason seems to have thought, if we are to believe his testimony, that unless placed on the order-book that all naturalizations were illegal and of no avail, and so testifies. He forgets that in the naturalization of foreigners the courts of Indiana derive jurisdiction from the Federal law and not from the State law, and that such records need not go on the order-book prescribed by the laws of Indiana for the recording of all court proceedings.

An examination of his evidence, if the cross-examination is left out, would lead one to believe that from January 16, 1860, to August 20, 1870, when a reform was instituted, no record whatever was made of naturalization cases. And he gives one hundred and seventy-eight cases about which he swears there is no record. But on cross-examination he tells us, and so the record shows, that every one of these one hundred and seventy-eight cases is recorded at full length on the record of final oaths.

One case, to be sure, jumped on in 1865, which is coram non judice, and had it not been it would have been placed there in 1854. That is the case of Gotlieb Laemle, whose case shows that he took out his first papers November 19, 1853, and his second December 9, 1854, a lapse of only one year and twenty days intervening. But who put that case on record in 1865? J. D. G. Nelson, an ex-clerk, whose term expired in 1862. From 1862 to 1870 William Fleming was the clerk. This covered the period—1865—when contestee claims he got his second papers.

During this period, from 1862 to 1870, not a fault can be pointed out in the records of Allen County. To be sure gentlemen refer to forged decrees of divorce. But what are the facts about these divorce decrees? Nothing is more common. Simply this, and nothing more; they appear properly entered on the order-book, where all such decrees, by provision of statute, which is mandatory, require that they should go. But no minute of the cases appears on the issue docket, sometimes called the judge's.

There is not a county in the State where just such omissions do not occur. Because while the statute provides that an issue docket should be kept, still it is directory. And the judge, instead of making a minute on the issue docket, from which minute the clerk writes up, elaborates, and enters upon the order-book the proper decree, often says to counsel interested, "Prepare the order and give it to the clerk." This the lawyer does. The decree or order goes on the order-book. And yet gentlemen say these decrees of divorce are forged, and in this way the endeavor is made to bring these records of Allen County into disrepute.

If, as is insisted upon this floor, the uniform custom is to issue the papers of naturalization in duplicate, leave one of record and give the other to the person naturalized, that the judge need not sign them, is the naturalization of individuals in Allen County in the usual form except the one isolated case of James B. White? Even the case of John D. Sardinghausen par excellence a good record. His naturalization appears on the order-book in 1868, but the order is not signed by the judge, and for this reason, although Sardinghausen had been given a certificate, he, Sardinghausen, went again in 1885, and took out papers again.

Can parol testimony be introduced to prove naturalization? My idea of a record is that it speaks for itself and can not be proven by parol until lost or destroyed. An exemplified copy, though not the best evidence, is admissible to prove the record. But when this copy is lost, the best evidence of its contents is the original; and you can not prove its contents by parol, because that is not the best evidence, but you must prove its contents by the original or by another copy. If the original is destroyed, you may prove by parol its contents; but you must first show that it once existed and has been destroyed.

Gentlemen, however, tell us that the certificate given is an original record of itself, and for that reason you may prove its contents by parol when once destroyed. They cite no law and give no reason to show that it is original evidence, but say because of universal custom these naturalization papers issue in duplicates, and because of that custom each is original. It is admitted, however, that a duplicate exists, that the custom does not extend further than to authorize their issuance in duplicate. Then, if one is lost, the best evidence thereof would be the other; but if the other never existed, then there were no duplicates. It takes two to make duplicates. And in that case your right to resort to parol is gone.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Indiana who has last spoken, I too in my early days was taught to do right without fear or favor, and instead of making an apology for so doing, I was taught to do right fearlessly and regardless of consequences. I propose to do that now according to the best of my lights in this case.

I know, sir, that it is regarded very often as somewhat ungracious to cross the purpose or the judgment of a committee who have carefully considered a subject referred to them and reported their conclusions to the House; and I do it here with all the more reluctance because the contestant is a personal, political, and professional friend of mine, and, in addition to that, he and I were born in the same distant land; while on the other hand the sitting member is a perfect stranger to me, and in all probability, in the ages gone by, his people and mine were continually at war. [Laughter and applause.]

But, Mr. Speaker, this question is to be decided not on the grounds of personal friendship or party ties, nor on any other consideration than the honor and the dignity of this House and the law that should fit the case in hand. I have the highest possible respect for the honor, the integrity, and the intelligence of the committee and belief in their endeavor to reach a just conclusion. But I am constrained to believe that in their consideration of this case the law applicable to it has been misunderstood. The committee seem to have confounded the judgment itself with the record of the judgment, and have confounded the certificate which indicated that a judicial act had been done with the judicial act itself.

The law of Congress passed in 1802, to be found in Title XXX, Revised Statutes, section 2165, in its third paragraph prescribes the terms on which an alien shall be naturalized finally as a citizen of the United States:

> 3. It shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court admitting such alien that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the State or Territory where such court is at the time held one year at least; and that during that time he has behaved as a man of a good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same. * * *

That is all the statute requires the postulant for citizenship to make to appear to the satisfaction of the court; and when he has done that and satisfies the court, he has done all that the law requires and all that he can possibly do to become a citizen.

The law further requires that when the court is satisfied (not the clerk, but the presiding judge) that the man is a fit and proper person to become a citizen of the United States, the judge shall administer the oath in the prescribed form. What is the effect? Judge Washington, in the case of Campbell vs. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 171, says:

> The oath, when taken, confers upon him the rights of a citizen, and amounts to a judgment of the court for his admission to these rights.

The man—the applicant for citizenship—performs his duty, all the law requires—all he can do—and when the court is satisfied, the man becomes a citizen of the United States, whether anybody else does his duty or fails to do his duty. The clerk of the court may or may not record the fact. The duty of the clerk is a ministerial duty, not a judicial act. He may or he may not grant the certificate of the fact; but that does not alter the fact. It exists in spite of his negligence or his contumacy. The certificate or the record is merely evidence which is to be used here and there of the fact when called in question.

Suppose, as in my own State, in the old dark days when Knownothingism was a dominant craze, an alien, having the requisite qualifications, went before a just magistrate who sat in the serene atmosphere of the law and made his application for citizenship, and a declaration was made by the judge that the alien should become a citizen of the United States; but the clerk of the court, crazed with the prevalent Knownothing mania, declined to record the judgment and declined to grant the certificate. I ask, would the man not still be a citizen of the United States by a judgment of the court? [Applause.] The majority of the committee say not, and I challenge their conclusions, and say it is not the law now nor has it ever been the law in this country. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in 1871 the homes of eighty thousand citizens and all the records of the courts in the great city of Chicago were burnt in a dreadful night. Did the fact that they were destroyed and the certificates showing their citizenship burnt in their homes deprive these men of their citizenship? Does it make any difference whether the record was destroyed or that it never existed? The judgment of the court can be proved in another way. It is indeed the law that you must prove a judicial act or fact by the highest attainable evidence; but if the highest attainable evidence be lost, or if it never existed, the next available evidence can be used and in any court in the country to sustain any proposition which may be made or which may be necessary in the absence of the record.

Another example: Suppose in the city of Washington, or elsewhere, a man or woman who has a perfect legal right to have the bonds of matrimony dissolved, comes before a court of competent jurisdiction, and by its judgment and decree the divorce is granted, but by some mischance there is no record of that judgment, or it has been destroyed and no certificate issues, and the man or woman marries again. Does that state of facts constitute him or her a bigamist, and subject him or her to the penalties of the law? If you take the reasoning of the majority it leads straight to that.

I say that parol evidence is perfectly competent to prove a judgment in the absence or loss of a record, and if not competent a statute should be passed for the protection of every honest man in the community who does all he can, and for the protection of a court who do all they can. There are careless clerks, and there will be careless clerks in this country to the end of time. Records in some instances do not exist and in others may be destroyed. But the judicial act stands, and stands forever. If the record evidence of it does not exist, the best available evidence is competent to prove it.

Now, sir, the effect of carrying into a decision of this House the conclusions of the majority of the committee would be that if James B. White, according to the law of the land, were a citizen of the United States to-day, provided there was a record, and is not a citizen if there is not a record, all he has done is vain; that deprives him of citizenship. You can not deprive him of his citizenship in that way, if he ever had it.

This being the law the only thing that remains in this case for the House to consider, not as a judicial question but as a question of fact, is whether Mr. White, the sitting member, has told the truth. I am loath to believe that a gentleman with his honorable record in this country is here under false pretenses; that having declared his intention to become a citizen in 1858—a matter of record—he did not perfect his naturalization as he says he did He has sworn to his naturalization, and if there were any doubt of it in my mind I would give him and his constituents the benefit of that doubt. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. I should like a few moments more.

Mr. ROWELL. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes more.

Mr. COLLINS. The statement of Mr. White is re-enforced substantially by the testimony of the two witnesses whose names are mentioned in the report. If these witnesses had testified with too much particularity; if they were altogether too exact in their recitals of time, place, and circumstances, I should begin to distrust their veracity. But they testify so naturally as to this transaction, in which they were not immediately concerned, that I am bound to believe them honest witnesses and satisfactory in corroboration of the testimony of the sitting member. It will not do to say that gentlemen on the other side of the House have disgraced the records of previous Congresses by doing injustice in election cases. The Democratic party can afford to set bad men a good example. [Laughter and applause.] We have set them more than one good example here and elsewhere, and if they have not conscience enough to do right, the conscience of the Democratic party will set them right.

Now, we make a record to-day which will not be lost or destroyed by time, it will stand forever; whether it be a record of wisdom or of folly; whether it be a record of justice or of wrong—it stands for or against us. I do not believe that we set a decent or an honorable precedent in refusing the sitting member his seat. The law is plain to those who read it intelligently and who apply it to the facts in the case and the circumstances surrounding it without prejudice and without favor; and I, for one, believe that if the report of the committee should be adopted it would be an error; if the report of the minority be adopted it will be a sound precedent for future Congresses to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. LONG. Before the gentleman resumes his seat, will he allow me a question?

Mr. COLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. You have read the testimony. There is evidence which goes to show that Mr. White was naturalized. Is there the slightest evidence that goes to show he was not naturalized except the lack of a record?

Mr. COLLINS. I thank the Lord I did not read the testimony. [Laughter.] But I have read the reports of both the majority and minority of the committee upon the testimony. There is not of course the slightest evidence in the world that he was not naturalized; that would be an impossible negative to prove. But all the positive evidence in the case goes to show he was naturalized. He may have acted very foolishly and talked with little discretion throughout the contest, and I think he did, but it must be remembered that they do not always elect a Solomon from the Twelfth district of Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance, respecting them as I do, that I rise to speak against the majority report of this committee. I am asked by the majority of the committee to annul the will of the majority of the people of this district in Indiana by unseating the sitting member, who received 2,500 plurality of its votes. I am asked, as I consider the case, to imperil and cast a shadow over the rights of hundreds of thousands of the naturalized citizens of the United States by my vote in this case.

It is therefore, Mr. Speaker, a vote to me of the very highest and gravest importance, and one which demands the exercise of my best reason and careful consideration and in which I am to be swayed alone by my conscience and my sense of honor as a man and a Representative.

If I had any doubt as to the legal status of this case, it was removed on Saturday last when the keen, analytical mind of my friend, the distinguished jurist of Minnesota [Mr. WILSON], expounded what to me seemed a correct view of the law in this case. Coming to this House from the most elevated judicial position of that State, breathing its impartial atmosphere, with a mind unbiased by prejudice and unswayed by partisanship, and giving to this case the consideration which he was accustomed to give to cases while on the supreme bench of his State, his judgment of the law of the case has with me great weight. It is no fault of mine, or of his, that in that fierce crucible of conscience and judgment the case of the majority of the committee is turned to dross and ashes. The case in 6 Cranch, United States Reports, and the decision of Justice Blatchford need not be gone over again. Who would be safe as a naturalized citizen if the neglected record of a stupid or forgetful clerk determined his holiest of rights?

I agree entirely with what the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] said on Saturday, and with what the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] has reiterated here to-day—that this is simply a question of fact. Now, as to that fact we have the positive, sworn testimony of Captain White and his witnesses, and his credibility has not been attacked nor his statements denied except by insinuation and innuendo. If his character for veracity is bad, it should be shown positively and affirmatively on the record of this case. It has been attempted here to-day to show that he was mixed up with the Chicago trade speculators. The fact that he was taken in by that incorporation of swindlers is to me very good evidence of his excellent character. [Laughter.]

We have been told that in the past the party on the other side of this House has set us a very bad example. I am willing to admit it. I thank Heaven that my conscience is not in the keeping of the other side of this Chamber; I will take care of that myself. But it is no argument to say that we are bound to follow a line of prejudiced and partisan decisions. When the question is narrowed down, as it is in this case, to a matter of conscience and reason, I for one wish to state that there is no power in this land, whether it be of party or of press, that can swerve me for one instant from doing my duty as I conceive it. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe what the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] so eloquently asserted on Saturday, that the highest partisan advantage that can be reaped will be gained by the Democrats of this House doing justice according to the evidence and the law. I believe that we will avert the danger of any possible partisan disadvantage by an honorable, open, frank course of conduct in this case, even to our seeming injury for the present, and that at the polls the honest yeomanry of this land, and more especially the hundreds and thousands of our naturalized citizens, will appreciate the votes of the Democratic party which are cast to give sanctity to the naturalization papers of James B. White.

Mr. Speaker, one word more and I close. Living just across the river from the great metropolis of New York, I remember very well when a small partisan United States marshal, seeking to wrest a party advantage, put into a cage in the New York post-office, like so many wild animals, hundreds of naturalized citizens, simply because they were voting the Democratic ticket, and I remember how the heart of that great metropolitan community went out to that distinguished jurist, Judge Blatchford, now on the United States bench, when by his decision this petty act, instigated by the rat intellect of the Federal satrap, was done away with, and those citizens whose cases were no stronger than that of Capt. James B. White were liberated and allowed to exercise their right of suffrage in voting the Democratic ticket. [Applause.]

Mr. ROWELL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, while this debate has been very interesting and able, I must think that a very large part of the discussion has been wholly irrelevant. We have heard decisions cited from West Virginia, from other States, and from the Federal courts, and those decisions appear to be relied on as governing this case, as though this was some sort of inferior tribunal trying a case under the common law and bound by the precedents of the courts and the rigid rules of testimony. Mr. Speaker, the power we are acting under—the only power under which we can act in a contested-election case—grows out of one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

Section 5 of Article I declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members." In that provision of the Constitution is found the entire power which we are to exercise here, and I care not what any court may have decided, I care not what any inferior or superior tribunal may have decided, the entire and supreme power over this question is vested in us by the Constitution, and we can accept what we please as testimony. This House is bound by no technical rules of the common law, nor by judicial construction. Why, sir, if any one should have made a pilgrimage to Washington for the purpose of seeing the American Congress, and should have come into our gallery and looked down upon us during the time we have been debating this case, and heard gentlemen discussing critical points of the law of evidence, he would naturally suppose that he had made a mistake, and that, instead of being in the House of Representatives of the great American Congress, he had wandered into some inferior court, where the judge was required to pass upon some ordinary question of evidence. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that under the provision of the Constitution we are not required to ask or to consider what any court has decided.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if Congress itself were to attempt to pass a law governing the proceedings of this body in a contested-election case, it would be absolutely null and void, and how much less the decision of a court over in Virginia. The Constitution provides that we, this House of Representatives, shall be the exclusive judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of our members. Whatever testimony satisfies us, whether it comes under the rigid rules of evidence or not, whether it is handed down by some distinguished jurist, or whether we adopt some other mode of ascertaining the facts here—whatever evidence satisfies the consciences of the members of this House is legal testimony under that provision of the Constitution.

If I had the time this proposition could be elaborated, illustrated, and exemplified in many forms, and to the satisfaction of every legal mind at least.

Were we so disposed, Mr. Speaker, we might decide this case on a telephonic message. Why? Because it is to be decided according to the conscience, the judgment, and the conviction of members of this House; we, the Representatives of the people, are the exclusive judges in this matter.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not made these remarks in order to avoid anything that has been said in favor of these legal technicalities. Apply the most rigid principles of the rules of evidence, and still Captain White is entitled to his seat, unless he is a perjured man, and that I do not believe, nor does any one else believe it.

Now, taking the view that I have stated of the Constitution—that no law book, no report, no outside authority of any character is entitled to influence our judgment here unless we see cause to yield and listen to it—taking this view, or any view in which it has been presented, let us see whether Captain White has been naturalized or not. Upon his examination this question is put to him: "You may state whether or not you at any subsequent time procured a final certificate of admission to citizenship." His answer to that question is, "Yes, sir; I did;" and he proceeds to give detailed circumstances of time and place, as follows:

In the year 1865, in the latter part of February, about the 28th of that month, I had determined to make a trip to Europe, and had talked with some of my friends in relation to it, amongst them Mr. John Brown, who advised me before doing so to take out my second papers in order to get a passport. I went with Mr. John Brown, accompanied with Mr. Alexander Muirhead, for that purpose. I told them to go to the court-house, and I would get the Hon. Isaac Jenkinson as my other witness. I went there with Mr. Jenkinson, and Mr. Chittenden was there in the court-house, and Mr. David H. Colerick was there. Judge Borden was in the court, on the bench, and I told him I wanted to get my second papers. He asked me who my witnesses were. I said they were here. Mr. John Brown and Mr. Jenkinson were then sworn as my witnesses. I then took the oath, so prescribed for that purpose, to become a citizen of the United States. It was in the court of common pleas. The oath of allegiance was administered to me in open court by Judge Borden, the then presiding judge of the court of common pleas. The principal fact in connection therewith was the fact th t I was going to Europe.

I therefore insist that if we believe Captain White has told the truth—and we may follow if we please the ordinary rules of law, but there is no obligation upon the House to observe any of these technical principles of legal practice—when we are satisfied that Captain White has told the truth, whether we reach that decision according to the principles laid down in Greenleaf and by regular judicial decisions, or whether we reach the conclusion in any other way, if we believe Captain White, we are bound to believe he was a naturalized citizen at the time he states, and is eligible to a seat here, and we are bound to vote to give him that seat.

There is an attempt made to show that Mr. Jenkinson, one of the witnesses who, Captain White says, was present at the time of his naturalization, does not corroborate Captain White as to that fact occurring in 1865. Yet Mr. Jenkinson does recall one all-important and forcible circumstance that occurred that day. When the naturalization was taking place it was remarked, as Mr. Jenkinson swears, that it seemed strange that a Federal soldier who had fought during the war should, after the close of that struggle, be obliged to go into court and renounce his allegiance to Queen Victoria. The following questions and answers occurring in Mr. Jenkinson's testimony overwhelmingly corroborate Captain White. Responding to a question he says:

From the time he was first naturalized the matter had passed out of my mind for years until the Friday or Saturday evening before the last November election. I noticed the fact that it was questioned in the Fort Wayne Gazette, which I was reading in my office that evening. Reading that statement revived in my mind instantly that I had been present at the time he was naturalized.

Q. 4. To whom, if any one, did you communicate your knowledge of said naturalization? State when and precisely what was said on the subject as near as you can recollect.

A. The first person I spoke to on the subject was Colonel Robertson; that was on the Thursday after the last November election. I was on my way to Bloomington that day and met Colonel Robertson at Greencastle Junction; in the conversation I had with him there I referred to the statement that Captain White had not been naturalized, and said, "It must be a mistake, because I felt sure I was present when he was naturalized." Robertson immediately replied, "That is just what Jim White says."

Q. 5. On your cross-examination, in your answer to question 41, you speak of some incident in these words: "There is one incident connected with the occasion which satisfies me that the purpose was not a mere declaration of intention." Please state what that incident was.

A. It was a remark as to the strangeness of a Union soldier having to renounce his allegiance to Queen Victoria and swearing allegiance to the United States.

Now, I believe this testimony, and if the House believes it, then it should vote unanimously to give him a clear title to his seat, in defiance of that little court over in West Virginia.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUK. I hope I may be allowed a minute or a minute and a half more.

Mr. ROWELL. All right.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, the position I take on this case is no new position with me. Ever since I have been a member of this House I have in every contested-election case stood on this clause of the Constitution which I have quoted, and voted according to my judgment and conscience. When it was attempted, and gentlemen on the other side will remember the case, to repel Mr. Cook, of Iowa, from this House under a cold-blooded statutory provision of that State, when that effort was led by the distinguished Mr. Ranney, of Massachusetts, then a member of this body, for the purpose of keeping Mr. Cutts in and keeping Mr. Cook out, I took then the same position that I take to-day, holding that no statutes of Iowa or any other State and no technical law of any description should prevent me from standing on this clause of the Constitution; and I, with sixteen other Southern Republicans, joined with the Democrats on that occasion and seated Mr. Cook in opposition to the vote of the Republican majority in this House in the Forty-seventh Congress. I vote upon the same principle to-day, and I appeal to my friends on the other side to imitate my good example and the good example of the Southern Republicans set on that occasion and pursue a similar course in the present case by voting to do equal and exact justice to a Republican according to the law and the testimony and in obedience to the fundamental provisions of the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, at the last Congressional election in the Twelfth district of Indiana Mr. Lowry was the Democratic candidate and Captain White was the Republican candidate, and was elected over Lowry. The latter contested White's election. The majority, including every Democratic member, of the Committee on Elections have made a report against White's eligibility. He is a native of Scotland, and began his residence in Indiana many years ago. He legally declared his intention to be naturalized and to become a citizen of the United States in 1858.

The majority of the committee report that he never did complete that intention and never was naturalized until a few days prior to his election; and that under the Constitution of the United States he, not having been a citizen for seven years, was ineligible to the office of Representative in Congress. The minority of the committee, composed entirely of Republicans, report that he was naturalized in 1865 and received a certificate thereof, which has since been lost or destroyed; that, although no judgment can be found upon the records of the court, nevertheless his naturalization can legally be and has been proven by parol evidence.

This statement sets forth the legal phase of the controversy in this case, to which alone I shall speak. I do not care whether the determination of this case will have any effect upon the voters of foreign birth in favor of the one party or the other. It is our duty to put on our manhood, leave demagogy and policy in the rear, and assert here what the law, the Constitution, and our oaths of office require of us.

Mr. Speaker, the limited time which I have had for the investigation of this case has been devoted to its legal aspects. I congratulate the minority of the Committee on Elections upon their well-conducted battle on this floor. I confess that there is some demoralization on this side of the Chamber, produced by the well-directed fire of gentlemen on the other side in favor of the contestee. I felt this on Saturday, because I had not then had time to investigate this case as I desired. But I have since considered the question in its legal aspect—which is the important one—and not with any partisan bias whatever, because I believe that partisan considerations should have no place in determining a question of this kind.

This case is important, sir, as a precedent. It must be conceded that the sitting member was overwhelmingly elected; and the only question is as to his eligibility under the Constitution to a seat on this floor. If he is eligible, no one would vote more unhesitatingly in favor of his retention of the seat than I would, without regard to his political opinions.

But, sir, upon such investigation as I have had the opportunity to make, I totally dissent from the views which some gentlemen have so freely expressed on this floor, and which have been greeted by the applause of gentlemen in sympathy with them—gentlemen whose judgments were, perhaps, warped by that sympathy, and who, not having thoroughly examined the real question at issue, were influenced by a very natural inclination in favor of a member who is acknowledged to have been elected by a large majority.

Now, the first fact in this case which is misleading is that under the constitution and laws of the State of Indiana, as in my own State, an alien who has legally declared his intention to become a citizen can vote and hold office. This circumstance presents an anomaly when you come to test the qualification of a person for a seat as a member of Congress, for under the law and constitution of my own State—and I presume it is so in the State of Indiana—a man may be eligible in one sense, as a member of Congress, and yet not in another. By section 2, of Article I, of the Constitution, it is provided:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

But the Constitution further provides:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

An alien may, by declaring his intention to become a citizen, under the constitution of many of the States, my own included, be a voter and eligible as a member to the most numerous branch of the Legislature, and yet not eligible to the office of Representative in Congress. I regard such a provision in a State constitution as unfortunate and mischievous. No doubt the sitting member's constituents, not aware of the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, believed Captain White to be eligible when they voted for him.

The question of fact which presents any difficulty is as to the sufficiency of the evidence, if competent to show that the sitting member completed his naturalization more than seven years before his election. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, its sufficiency, the question arises, is it presented here in legal and admissible form?

Just at this point there is a wide divergence of opinion among members. I, sir, agree with the majority of the committee. If Captain White, the sitting member, has failed to show by legal evidence that he was naturalized by a court of competent jurisdiction at least seven years before his election, he is not entitled to a seat in this House, I care not by what majority he was elected. Let us examine the question.

It is, I believe, conceded by all that naturalization requires judicial action—a proceeding, proof, the oath, the order of court, and the judgment. What, then, is a judgment? A judgment is—

The final determination of the rights of the parties in the action. (New York Code of Procedure.)

Judgment:

The decision or sentence of a court on the main question in a proceeding, or on one of the questions, if there are several. (Rapalje and Lawrence's Law Dictionary.)

Judgment:

The authenticated decision of the court, obtained in a suit, upon the relative claims of the parties therein submitted; the sentence of the law pronounced by the court upon the matters presented by the record of proceedings in a suit. (Abbott's Law Dictionary.)

Whenever the proofs are submitted, the oath taken, and the judicial mind passes upon it, and thus gives voice to the law declaring in favor of the applicant's right to become a citizen of the United States, this is the judgment. It is perfect up to this point, but stopping here it can neither be proven nor enforced. It must be enrolled or recorded, or some record made thereof.

Judgments do not and can not rest in parol. Where the judicial mind has passed upon a question within its jurisdiction and an imperfect record has been made thereof, it may be amended subsequently nunc pro tunc; or if a judgment be perfectly enrolled or entered of record and the record is destroyed, it may be re-established in the court where rendered, and in some cases, where it comes in collaterally, it may be proved by parol. But in no case can it be thus proven where the beneficiary founds a right upon it or where the right he claims depends upon its existence.

The judgment itself, or a certified copy thereof, is the highest, best, and only competent evidence to prove its existence and contents. The judgment of the court admitting the contestee to citizenship is one thing, the proof of it is quite another. The friends of the contestee confound the two, which produces all the fog and misunderstanding in this case. I say it is not a judgment complete until a record is made of it; and the friends of contestee do not claim that any record ever was made of the proceedings of the court by which he claims to have been naturalized, except a certificate which he says that he had, but can not produce it.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] and others rely on the case in 6 Cranch, which is about the strongest on their side of the question; therefore I will invite the attention of the House to it, as an examination of it fails to bear out their assertions. The certificate in that case is as follows:

At a district court held at Suffolk, October the 14th, 1795, William Currie, late of Scotland, merchant, who hath migrated into this Commonwealth, this day in open court, in order to entitle himself to the rights and privileges of a citizen, made oath that for two years last past he hath resided in and under the jurisdiction of the United States, and for one year within this Commonwealth, and also that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, or other state whatsoever, particularly to the King of Great Britain.

A copy.
Teste: JOHN C. LITTLEPAGE.

The original memorandum made upon the minutes of the court was as follows:

At a district court held at Suffolk, October the 14th, 1795, William Currie, native of Scotland, migrated into the Commonwealth, took the oath, etc.

Now, sir, while that was defective in not containing all the recitals which the law required, yet it contained enough, with that which was stated and entered upon the record, that when it came to be dealt with collaterally the court held it to be sufficient.

The daughter of Currie after his death brought a suit for the land of which he died seized, and the plea was that she was an alien and could not recover it. She replied that she was the daughter of an alien who had been naturalized. After this proof was brought in there was no response from any one—no contradictory evidence offered—and the court held that this, while a defective record, was sufficient. Under the law which permits certain defective records to be explained by parol, that evidence was competent and sufficient, no contrary testimony appearing. Now, sir, that decision does not sustain gentlemen in this case at all.

What is the case here? It is not that a record was made. It is not that there is a certificate and defective record, but of no record at all.

I do not profess to be familiar with the evidence in the record of this case; but whether the sitting member has produced here evidence sufficient to have entitled him to a record of naturalization and certificate in the court where he says he obtained it, is unimportant, because wholly inadmissible in the form it is here presented.

Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a certificate, and I may concede for the purpose of my argument that there was, the sitting member has not done that which it was his duty to do to entitle him to the benefit of it and the judgment, which he does not even allege was ever entered of record. I dissent from the proposition that a man in whose favor a judgment of a competent court has been rendered and never entered can go on in a case like this, take the oath, and become entitled to all the privileges and rights of a citizen without doing something more.

Why, sir, the judgment in such a case confers no higher right or privilege, that makes a different case from judgments rendered in other proceedings, than those, for instance, where a citizen sues and obtains a judgment for property or money, which judgment has never been entered. Can any one maintain an action upon a judgment which is never entered or enrolled?

I appeal to every lawyer in this House to answer this point. If A sues, and the judicial mind passes upon the question and awards him $50,000, yet the clerk has never entered it, A does not look into the fact and ascertain whether there has been a compliance on the part of the clerk, or does not compel the performance of this ministerial duty.

The clerk of course fails to issue an execution upon the judgment because it was never entered of record, and when A sues upon that judgment or pursues the defendant into another jurisdiction and sues upon it to obtain his money, as he would or might have to do, and the defendant pleads nul tiel record, can the plaintiff sustain his claim by setting up the fact that the judicial mind has passed upon his claim and adjudged him to be entitled to the award of $50,000 without showing that judgment? Would the court receive any other evidence of that judgment than the record itself or a certified copy thereof?

I apprehend that there is no lawyer here who will risk his reputation by asserting the contrary. In the present case the contestee asserts his right to retain his seat upon the floor of the House by virtue of a judgment which rests alone in the judicial mind—an intangible thing, like an immaterial substance, and with no legal or competent proof to establish it He asks this House to trust to the slippery memory of man rather than to the solemn record of a court, which imports absolute verity.

If the contestee had a judgment against me for money or property, and there was no record evidence of it, as in this case, and he were to sue me upon his judgment, and I should reply nul tiel record, no court would receive parol evidence of his judgment to overturn my plea. He who founds a right upon a judgment must produce that judgment or show that it once existed of record in due form and has been destroyed. The contestee's proof utterly fails to come up to either of these requirements.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the necessity of entering of record judgments, I will claim the attention of gentlemen for a few moments while I read an extract from Freeman on Judgments:

The promptings of the most ordinary prudence suggest that whatever, in the affairs of men, has been so involved in doubt and controversy as to require judicial investigation, ought, when made certain by a final determination, to be preserved so by some permanent and easily understood memorial. Hence all courts, and all tribunals possessing judicial functions, are required by the written or unwritten law, and often by both, to reduce their decisions to writing in some book or record required to be kept for that purpose. The requirement is believed to be of universal application.

Several decisions covering the point are referred to, and the text proceeds:

So that if any judgment or decree of any court, whether of record or not of record, whether subordinate or appellate, fails to be entered upon its record, the failure is attributable to the negligence or inadvertence of its officers and not to the countenance and support of the law.

Then again:

That which the court performs judicially, or orders to be performed, is not to be avoided by the action or want of action of the judges or other officers of the court in their ministerial capacity. In the case of judgments they must first be entered upon the record before they are admissible as evidence in other courts.

Mark the language—

Must first be entered upon the record before they are admissible in evidence in other courts. For this purpose they are not otherwise perfect. The record, if not made up, or if lost or destroyed, should be perfected or replaced by appropriate proceedings in the court where the judgment was pronounced.

Mr. Speaker, if there was a judgment which was never entered, or if there was a judgment which was evidenced only by the certificate issued to Captain White, and that certificate, as he says, is lost or destroyed, it was incumbent upon him to avail himself of the unrecorded judgment, and to have taken affirmative action in the court where it was obtained, to first establish it, and then he could have brought a certified transcript of it and his certificate here, and have met the plea or objection that he is not a naturalized citizen of the United States and the proof would not have been questionable. But as it is, he is here asserting his naturalization without any legal proof to establish it. It is no hardship to require this. Our too liberal naturalization laws are easily complied with. What hardship is there in requiring him to produce legal evidence that he is entitled under the Constitution of the United States to be a member of this Congress? I can see none, and I fear none of the dire consequences predicted by some gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Chamber in the event of the contestee being unseated for the want of such proof.

Why, sir, the wisdom of ages has decreed against tracing the judicial determinations of the courts of the country through the slippery memory of men, which is full of uncertainty, and fades with time. The position of gentlemen upon the other side of this question, when stripped of its fustian, gaudy rhetoric, and misleading eloquence, which pronounces any man who ever served in the Union Army incapable of telling a lie, exhibits the nude deformity of an assertion that the solemn judgment of a court can rest in parol, which is an absolute absurdity in the estimation of every gentleman who has ever become familiar with the mere horn-books of the law.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. OATES. I am unable to do so, I regret to say, as my time is limited.

Mr. Speaker, the position I have assumed here has not been taken recklessly, for I have the authorities to sustain me.

In a recent case in North Carolina, sixty-fourth volume Supreme Court Reports, that court held that parol evidence was in no case admissible to prove a judgment; that it must be first re-established under the law for that purpose in the court that rendered it.

Why, sir, if it were permissible to come here into this forum and prove by parol what the judicial authority in Indiana passed upon, how uncertain would be the proceeding. It would utterly destroy the safeguards of the law, which require these proceedings before a court to naturalize an alien and entitle him to the rights of citizenship. Let him go to the court where the proceedings are had, and if there is any fault in that court, any defect in the judgment there, any failure to enter it there, he may institute the proper proceedings, which the law provides for, re-establish his judgment, and bring here a certified record of it, which would be conclusive.

Then, again, in the State of Vermont, in a case involving the very question of naturalization, the supreme court of that State held this language:

The only other legal question which it is necessary for us to pass upon is whether parol evidence was admissible to prove the naturalization of a foreigner. A certified copy of the record of the court in which one is naturalized is the legitimate evidence of the fact. Parol evidence to prove naturalization is inadmissible.

What is plainer than that? I will next invite the attention of gentlemen to an adjudication by the supreme court of my own State, Hall vs. Hudson, twentieth volume Alabama Reports. It is there held—that a paper purporting to be a decree on the final settlement of an estate by the judge of the orphans' court and filed among the papers of the case with the indorsement thereon: "Decree in the estate of James Hudson, deceased, filed second Monday April, 1847;" also signed by the judge, is not the judgment of the court until entered on the record.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OATES. I should like two minutes more.

Mr. CRISP. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. OATES. In the case of Hinson against Wall the same court—I have but time to read the syllabus—held—that a mere memorandum of the clerk stating the amount of damages assessed by the jury with the words "this judgment for the sum so found added" does not constitute a judgment on which an action of debt can be maintained, although the clerk certifies in proper form that it is "a true and perfect transcript and exemplification of the record." And the proceedings of the courts of the several States composing the Union will be presumed to be governed by the common law until the contrary is shown.

Just one authority more, and that is a very ancient but a good one. I refer to Blackstone's Commentaries, which, like the Constitution of the United States in the estimation of some gentlemen, is well-nigh obsolete.

Blackstone says:

A court of record is that where the acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled on parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony, which rolls are called the records of the court, and are of such high and supereminent authority that their truth is not called in question. For it is a settled rule and maxim that nothing shall be avered against a record. Nor shall any plea or even proof be admitted to the contrary. If the existence of a record be denied it shall be tried by nothing but itself; that is, upon bare inspection whether there be any such record or no, else there would be no end of disputes.

And yet gentlemen assert that where no judgment was ever entered it is competent for them to come here and prove by parol that such judgment was rendered. I utterly deny the proposition, and to my mind if this House allows this gentleman to retain his seat in direct violation of the well-established rules of evidence, they will violate that clause of the Constitution which declares an alien ineligible until he is naturalized. [Applause.]

Mr. ROWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS], and the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague on the committee [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, as a layman I have listened during two Congresses to the consideration of election questions—always, I hope, with a due feeling of responsibility, but often with impatience, and often with a feeling of utter helplessness in view of the strictly technical character of the arguments advanced on each side—arguments of such a character that the members of this body who are not lawyers can not be expected to apprehend their full force or precise bearing upon the facts in issue. Precedents are cited and judicial opinions and dicta are accumulated on each side which usually to the unprofessional mind appear to balance each other, and consequently confuse the judgment and prove nothing. Now I submit that there has been something too much of this, when it must be admitted that Congress is not a body which can safely or intelligently decide such questions in this manner.

This is not a judicial body, and there is no member who can speak with authority upon the questions of law which are involved. We have counsel learned in the law, and who expound it abundantly, but we have no judge to determine the law in its relation to the given case. This is not a judicial proceeding under the law requiring close and technical construction of statutes, and in which judicial opinions previously rendered in similar cases have more or less force, and often commanding authority.

No, sir; this is a strictly parliamentary procedure, in which a body of men, many of whom are not learned in the law, are called upon to determine, in the exercise of their best judgment, and acting under a very solemn obligation, a fact, to wit, whether the sitting member is entitled to his seat, or if not, whether the contestant is so entitled. And when that fact is determined no court, no process, no authority can contravene or challenge it. The decision is unassailable and final. I of course admit that in many cases the laws relating to the conduct of elections must control the decision of this body, and that the legal rules of evidence must be our guide—our guide, I say, but not our master.

Our purpose is, above all things, to ascertain the truth, and if by blindly obeying a given rule with regard to parol testimony, or written testimony, we are compelled to do violence to our convictions regarding any essential fact, we are bound in the discharge of our parliamentary duty to disregard that rule, no matter how ancient or honored. It is the letter that killeth, it is the spirit that maketh alive. In the case before us there is but one fact to be ascertained: Was this man naturalized at a certain time and place, as he alleges? If so, he is entitled to his seat. There is no question as to any legal defect in the process, any error in the judgment of the court—if naturalized at all, he was duly and properly naturalized.

The sitting member presents to me satisfactory and ample evidence of this fact—his own sworn testimony, fortified and made impregnable by other testimony. There is no attempt made to impeach his character—that is unimpeachable. Indeed, the gentlemen who defend the majority report express their respect and sympathy for him. But there is a defective record, and they claim that it is a rule of law that parol testimony can not cure that defect. Suppose this to be so in an ordinary judicial proceeding, does that control this parliamentary proceeding? Should it control me if the evidence presented has convinced me that the sitting member was duly naturalized? I say no, because I am bound by the obligation I have taken to decide this question in accordance with my judgment whether that does or does not coincide with the rules adopted or the opinions expressed in other cases by another tribunal.

The application of an arbitrary rite of law upon a question of mere fact in an issue so important as this is simply absurd. A case might easily be supposed where the record would be defective and the certificate lost, and where sworn testimony could be produced to prove the naturalization beyond the shadow of a doubt. Would the chairman of this committee vote to unseat this member in obedience to this arbitrary rule, although he knew that he was eligible and admits that he was elected? Sir, the majority report of your committee strikes at every naturalized citizen. It makes that precious right which the policy of a beneficent Government has conferred upon him dependent upon the existence of a record which may never have been made, or which may be lost or destroyed. And if he have acquired the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens sufficiently to be placed by their suffrages in a position of honor and responsibility, it places it in the power of a mean and mousing opponent, whom he had defeated, to drive him with disgrace from his seat.

This is a simple question of fact to be determined upon our confidence in the veracity, under oath, of the sitting member. He is a Scotch emigrant who came to this country in boyhood, and for more than thirty years has gone in and out among the citizens of the Twelfth district of Indiana. He has acquired their respect, their affection, and their boundless confidence, and finally the party with which he had always been associated determined to testify their regard for this adopted citizen by selecting him as their candidate for Congress; and then a strange thing happened.

He not only received the unanimous vote of his own party, but 3,000 men stepped from the ranks of his opponents and declared by their votes that although they did not believe in his political views they did believe in him. [Applause.]

Added to this, Mr. Speaker, there is a crowning fact in his personal history. When in the flush of his early manhood the country which he loved and to which he came across the seas, was in mortal peril, he volunteered in her defense, he shouldered his musket, and with uncounted thousands of brave men marched to the battle-field to prove his devotion to her interests and institutions, if need be, by the severest of all tests—the offering of his life.

Mr. Speaker, my eyes are not as clear as they once were, but I can see on that modest brow the laurel wreath which the genius of his country placed there as he lay bleeding and unconscious upon the immortal field of Shiloh. [Applause.]

Shall we drive this true, this honest and brave man, bearing honorable and glorious scars, from this Hall with the brand of falsehood and perjury upon his brow? God forbid! [Applause.]

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this hour of the debate to enter into any protracted argument. I merely wish, in closing, to restate as simply as possible those points on which the minority have relied in the position which they have taken.

It must have been observed in this case, as the testimony has proceeded, that we have drifted far from that simple legal question on which it appeared at the outset the statement of the case was to turn. But the arguments on the legal point which seemed pretty solid and effective in the committee-room have become somewhat attenuated when they have been brought into this Hall and into the presence of the larger audience beyond these walls. Therefore to sustain the legal question the question of fact has been brought in and forced to great prominence. From this, sir, there was no escape, and it appears as it did in the beginning to me, that it is on that question of fact that the decision in this case must finally turn. The legal argument was weak; it was sought to prop it with the argument on fact. The argument on fact is weak on the side of the majority. The two broken reeds can not sustain each other.

If you accept the doctrine of the majority, we have got to assume that a man's citizenship, which is to him of priceless value, depends not upon his own act, done in good faith, but upon the act and upon the performances of some one else. Into the legal discussion of the question, which has been so ably presented by my colleague [Mr. COLLINS] this afternoon, I do not propose to enter; but I wish to call the attention of the House for just one moment to the result of intrusting a man's citizenship to the ministerial act of anybody else. Carelessness may intervene in an act of a clerk. There may be destruction of the records by fire, by accident, by a thousand causes.

If gentlemen will turn to a single piece of testimony, on page 223 of the record, they will find that one Templar testifies that he appeared before the clerk to procure a copy of the record of his naturalization, he having taken the oath of citizenship, and that after hunting for the record the clerk failed to find it, and "told me that he would give the matter a more careful and thorough search, and that I should call again in a few days, or at my convenience, and that he would then have it ready for me. I have repeatedly, during the last ten years, called at the clerk's office for a certified copy, and have never been able to procure it."

That is the court on the performances of which it is proposed to take away the citizenship of Captain White, a court in which a man who had taken the oath of citizenship applied vainly for ten years for the certificate to which he was entitled. In another case, that of a German-born citizen, the judge of the court, the ingenious jurist who is before this House now as the contestant, had had a slight difference with this gentleman, Mr. Sardinghausen. The contestant was a candidate for Congress; Mr. Sardinghausen thought he ought not to be; the contestant naturally did not agree with Mr. Sardinghausen's views of the case. They differed as good men will differ, and the contestant said to Sardinghausen, who was then and had been for a long time a State senator in Indiana and a member of the Democratic party, "You had better look to your own citizenship." Sardinghausen's reply was, as it appears in his sworn testimony, that he had gone into that court and been naturalized before the contestant himself, to which the contestant replied, 'There is no record of it." We see, therefore, that it is no new thing for the records of this particular court to be brought into politics to affect the citizenship of candidates for office. That record is defective throughout. There are one hundred and fifty names of naturalized citizens with nothing but bare memoranda of them.

There are others without one line of memorandum in that court. Citizens applied for certificates in order that they might go out and take up land in the Territories, but no record of their naturalization could be found. There are cases where men had certificates and where there was not even a scratch of a pen to show it. There are the cases of two men whose names had afterwards been entered in that record, forgeries, as appears by the testimony in this case; and it is on that disfigured, imperfect record, tainted with forgery, that it is proposed to deprive the contestee of his seat in this House. So much for the record, as to which it is argued by the other side that we can not bring any parol testimony to cure its defects.

The other single point in this case is the fact of naturalization. To that fact we have the testimony of Mr. Jenkinson, which is entirely unimpeached. He swears to two conclusive facts—that he was present when Captain White was naturalized, and that it was after the war, and after he (Jenkinson) had given up the practice of the law. That testimony has not been impugned in the slightest degree. We then have the testimony of Pratt, the sheriff, who was in court at the time of the naturalization, and the only attempt to impugn his testimony is by saying that he was hostile to the contestant. If the veracity of men in that Indiana district is to be impugned on that ground—I say it with entire respect—there will be a very large number of persons, reaching into many thousands, who can not be received as credible witnesses. That testimony stands to the fact of naturalization and to the fact that the naturalization occurred subsequent to the war, defeating the attempt made by the other side to show that the declaration of intention was in 1858.

Last of all, we have Captain White's own testimony. It is admitted that in the confusion and excitement of the election he made contradictory statements, but from the beginning he said, "I have been naturalized." From that he never swerved. His testimony on that point is direct, and until this afternoon, in the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. O'NEALL], there has not been a single attempt to impeach his character for veracity.

I wish to say a word, sir, as to the general policy of proving lost records. We know that provisions are made by the States for the proof of lost records. We know that that is the policy of the States. In the case of a great destruction of records like that of Chicago, provision is made for the proof of those records. It is a matter of general policy. Now, here is a case in which the record was practically destroyed, and it is proposed to say to this man, "You can not prove your citizenship, the dearest thing you have, though we make provision in every State to allow proof of lost records."

The doctrine of citizenship has always in this country received a liberal interpretation; and I wish to call attention to a case which happened some years ago involving the protection of a citizen in a foreign country—a case showing how far the Government of the United States has been willing to carry this doctrine. It is the case of Martin Koszta, who was one of Kossuth's staff. He was seized in Smyrna by the Austrians with the intention of carrying him to Austria and consigning him to an Austrian prison. Captain Ingraham, in command of an American man-of-war, lay alongside the Austrian brig and threatened to fire upon her if Koszta was not given up. He was given up to the French consul, and was finally returned to the United States. Our Government took that extreme ground—on what? On a mere declaration of intention—on absolutely nothing else.

Mr. Marcy, then Secretary of State, said that though Martin Koszta was not vested with all the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States, he was, at the time the outrage was committed upon him, entitled to the protection extended to him by the American functionaries at Smyrna. A declaration of intention was thought sufficient then to entitle a man to the protection of the American flag. Yet it is argued to-day that a man who has not only declared his intention, but has served in the armies of the United States, is not a citizen of the country.

One word, in closing, as to the personal aspect of this question. I am aware that ordinarily no argument based upon any personal consideration should find place here. But this, I submit, is a peculiar case. In most election cases the unsuccessful party, whether unseated justly or unjustly, can go back to the final tribunal, the constituency of his district, and appeal to them against the verdict which has been rendered here. But if you unseat Captain White, you leave him no such appeal. You will have declared that he is not a citizen of the United States, and can not be eligible to a seat in this body for seven years. The verdict which we shall give here to-day on this case is, so far as Captain White is concerned, final and irreversible.

Captain White came to this country in 1853. In 1858 he declared his intention to become a citizen. A few years later he entered the armies of the United States. He was badly wounded at Shiloh. Coming back to Fort Wayne, he has built up there a prosperous business. He enjoys the respect of the people among whom he has lived. He has reared his family there. He has accumulated property. And now you are asked to say that he has come into this House by means of perjury. I am aware that members of the majority disclaim, as they naturally would, any intention to fix such a brand as that upon Captain White, yet the attempt is useless. There can be no escape from this result—that if Captain White is now turned out, you send him back to the community in which he has lived, to the people whose respect he has enjoyed, voters of both parties who have given him their personal confidence—you send him back with the declaration that, in the opinion of the American Congress, he is a perjurer. Beside the honorable scars that he bears on his front like a brave man, you propose to fix the burning stigma of "liar and perjurer!" There is the personal aspect of this case that cannot be escaped. Such a judgment as that would be a cruel injustice; and I do not believe that on the frail legal argument, or the still frailer argument upon the facts, this House will be guilty of such an injustice to any man who has been admitted as a member. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I know the House is somewhat fatigued and is anxious to dispose of this case. I have reserved for myself only a few moments in which to express, in conclusion, the views entertained by the majority of the committee on the merits of the contest.

During the progress of this debate we have had from gentlemen on this side of the Chamber—the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS], the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], and the distinguished ex-judge from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON]—some of the most marvelous expositions of law, I venture to say, that ever were heard in a legislative body. We are told by these gentlemen that the judgments of a court of record can exist in the air, can be hawked about in the pockets of individuals. We are told by these gentlemen that the certificate given to a naturalized citizen by the clerk of the court is a part of the record of the court, and that when it is proven that a man has once had such a certificate and has lost it, he can prove its contents by parol testimony. These propositions, Mr. Speaker, are absolutely startling to any one who is at all familiar with the elementary principles of the law. Blackstone's Commentaries, an inexhaustible source of information upon legal questions, tells us that a court of record is a court wherein the judgment is enrolled upon parchment as a perpetual memorial of the act of the court.

Neither of the distinguished gentlemen to whom I refer has produced, and I venture the assertion that neither of them can produce, the judgment of any respectable court sustaining the position which they urge upon the House. The leading case relied upon is the case from New York, decided by Justice Blatchford. In that case—and I ask the House to bear it in mind—there was in the office of the clerk of the court a statement of the oath taken before the court and of all the proceedings requisite for the naturalization of the citizen; and this was identified by the initials of the judge. The judge who sat in the case put on the papers his initials, and Judge Blatchford held this to be competent evidence of the judgment of the court. In the case from Virginia there was found upon the minutes of the court an entry stating that the applicant for citizenship appeared and was naturalized. Sir, there can not be produced a single case—I appeal to any man on this floor who has made an investigation of the question to produce a case—in which any respectable court has held that naturalization, the whole of it, can be proved by parol.

Why, Mr. Speaker, a citizen must be naturalized in a court of record having a clerk and having a seal. Why this requirement of the law, but that such judgment may be entered of record by the clerk and thus become a memorial for all time? If naturalization may be proven by parol, why does not the statute authorize courts not of record to hear such cases and give judgment? The conclusion is irresistible that jurisdiction was limited by Congress to such courts as had a clerk and seal in order that the judgment admitting a person of foreign birth to citizenship here might be enrolled for a perpetual memorial and testimony. The proceedings in cases of naturalization are strictly judicial; there must be, as in other judicial matters, that judgment which is the "end of the law." A court of record can speak only by its dockets, minutes, or records, and in the absence of any docket, minute, or record, its voice can not be heard.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition here is to prove by parol every single fact necessary to establish the naturalization of contestee.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. I have but twenty minutes, and I must therefore respectfully decline to yield.

Mr. MACDONALD rose.

Mr. CRISP. Others who are not so familiar with the records in this case as the members of the committee, who have labored over them for weeks, can not inform me of anything in the record which I do not already know.

Mr. MACDONALD again rose.

Mr. CRISP. I decline to be interrupted, and I give as a reason for so doing the shortness of the time I have allowed myself.

Now the proposition is, Mr. Speaker, in the face of the Constitution of the United States, in the face of the decision of the courts, in the face of the decisions of the executive department of the Government, to establish in the legislative department a rule which will open wide the door for fraud and make uncertain and unsatisfactory that which under the established rules of evidence can now, without hardship to any one, be made perfectly clear and plain. If I am right that the judicial department of the Government have a uniform rule on this subject, let us look for a moment to the executive department of the Government and see what their rule is.

If Mr. White should go to the State Department and say, "Mr. Secretary, I desire a passport to go to Europe; I am a foreign citizen," the Secretary would say to him, "Let me see your papers of naturalization." If Mr. White replied, "I have not got them; I have lost them," the Secretary would say, "Go back to the court of record where you got your naturalization papers and obtain a copy of them." Mr. White replies again that there is no copy of them there. "I propose to bring Mr. Jenkinson, Mr. Pratt, and others to prove that I am naturalized and am a citizen. They will prove that I did apply for naturalization, and that the paper was issued to me, but I have lost it." Does any gentleman here suppose for a moment the State Department, on such a showing as that, would grant to that individual the protection of that flag we all reverence and respect? Is that the practice of the executive department, to give to a citizen who proposes to prove by parol testimony only the fact of his naturalization the protection and safe conduct of that flag? No, the executive department would say to him, "We can not safely give you a passport under those circumstances."

Mr. Speaker, the executive department would refuse him. He now comes to this legislative department of the Government and asks this House to seat him on evidence on which no court would decide he was naturalized and on which the executive department would not decide that he was a citizen entitled to a passport. In the determination of this case, we are gravely asked to violate every principle of the law of evidence. The gentleman from Tennessee says we are bound by no rule of evidence or law. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] says this case should be decided on a different basis from ordinary contests between individuals; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] says in its determination we can be governed by such rules as we please. Are not these propositions astounding, when the House of Representatives is called upon by the Constitution, that we have all sworn to support, to judge of the qualifications of one of its returned members? If we do not judge and determine according to the established rules of evidence, how are we to judge and determine?

By looking to the effect the unseating of the contestee might have in some particular district, as some gentleman has suggested here—by looking to the fact there are a great many foreigners in your district, and they might be displeased. Is that the rule asked for? Is that the rule acted on by any member of the House? Is that what is meant by judging? I protest, Mr. Speaker, we will judge it by the rules of evidence established in all the courts of every civilized country in the world, the faithful observance of which is absolutely essential to the ascertainment of the truth.

Judging by that rule, Mr. Speaker, I say in this case there is no competent testimony to establish naturalization.

Now, I can not dwell upon this legal view, but want to say something upon the facts as presented. If there are those who really believe that naturalization can be proven by parol, I desire to demonstrate to them that there is no satisfactory evidence to justify a finding which would retain the contestee in his seat.

Satisfactory evidence, Mr. Speaker, is that character of evidence which satisfies the mind of the correctness of a proposition which has been asserted.

The gentleman from Indiana, the contestee, asserts that he became a naturalized citizen of the United States in 1865. Having admitted that he was foreign born the onus is upon him to establish his claim to citizenship. The presumption is not, as some gentleman has suggested in this debate, that he is a citizen, but the presumption is that he is not a citizen, that his original status remains until he shows the contrary. Accept that issue and view the case in that light for a moment.

Here is a foreign-born gentleman who says he is naturalized. Let us see his proof. It is admitted that in 1858 Mr. White filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen.

I ought to say just here, Mr. Speaker, that under the laws of Indiana the filing of such a declaration gives to the person filing it the right to vote, the right to hold property, the right to do everything in that State that a full citizen may do except the right to hold office. This gentleman tells us here that he filed the declaration and complied with every requirement in order to vote for Frémont. There is some confusion about the statement there, and I do not care to dwell upon that part of the testimony.

The declaration was filed in 1858. Now, then, let us come down to the year when Mr. White was a candidate for Congress and see what was done by him, and what was done by others, that may throw light upon his claim of citizenship.

It is true that the contestee did hold some little office in the State of Indiana; but he held no great number of distinguished offices. I think he was alderman of some little city, or something of that sort. Finally, he became a candidate for Congress. Just before the election the charge was made that he was not a naturalized citizen.

Two gentlemen, Mr. Bell and Mr. Moynihan, as the testimony shows, went to him and said, "The statement is made that you are not a naturalized citizen." His reply was, "I have got my papers." Did he stop there? No. He says, "I got my papers in 1857 or 1858." Upon the first blush of the moment, when distinctly charged with a want of naturalization, what does he say, and I call your attention to it again?

I got my papers in 1857 or 1858.

Did you get then all the papers that you got?

Answer. I did.

That night you find the contestee in consultation with certain friends of his in a printing-office in the town, the office being that of the paper that advocated his election. What do you find the next morning? There is a publication in that paper of a letter from the Adjutant-General of the Army—a mutilated letter. It seems that an inquiry was made of the Adjutant-General as to whether the honorable discharge of a soldier from the Army entitled him to the rights and privileges of citizenship. The Adjutant-General replied that it did not. That letter, on that night, in that town, in the printing-office was talked about, the contestee was that night in the office, and the letter was mutilated and appeared in a mutilated form in the newspaper on the next day, stating that the honorable discharge of a soldier from the Army does entitle him to citizenship. In the very same newspaper that contained the mutilated letter appeared this statement:

I was a soldier; I am a citizen.

J. B. WHITE.

On that day, Mr. Speaker, I ask the House, was the contestee standing upon any supposed naturalization in 1865? I deny it. The thought had never entered his mind, and he resorted to that kind of subterfuge because he had no real naturalization.

Mind you, that notice was kept standing in the paper, and on the next day you find him in consultation with his lawyers. He has gone and looked for his paper, the declaration of intention, the only paper he ever had, and the paper on which he voted and held property for thirty years. He was looking for that and fails to find it; and there is a meeting of his lawyers for consultation as to what is to be done in the emergency. Some of these attorneys have been sworn, and there is not one who tells you that White then claimed he had been naturalized in 1865. The first intimation that we receive of his having made that claim was after the service of notice of contest in this case. If he was naturalized in 1865, why did not he tell them so? But what did they do? They advised him to take out naturalization papers at once, that possibly it might relate back to something and help him. He went into another county and became naturalized. To do that he had to swear that he was a subject of Queen Victoria and renounced his allegiance to her; this was the day before the election in 1886, and yet contestee asks you now to determine that what he then stated was not true.

After getting his papers he hastens back to his home, and says, in response to questions by his constituents, "I have got my papers, my first papers, my second papers, and I have got my third papers; and if you vote for me I will show them to you."

Is that, I ask you, gentlemen, the conduct of an honest man, who is conscious he is a citizen and became so in 1865?

Gentlemen say Mr. White said he was a citizen. I say to the gentlemen, in reply, that Mr. White said he took out his papers in 1858. I say, in reply, that the actions of Mr. White were absolutely inconsistent with the statements he has since made. A man's actions sometimes speak louder than his words. You find the contestee shifting from pillar to post to establish his citizenship. First he says, "I became a citizen in 1857 or 1858." Then he says, "I am an honorably discharged soldier, and hence I am a citizen;" and then he says, in 1886, "I owe allegiance to Queen Victoria, but I now swear I will bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of the United States."

I ask you is such conduct consistent with the idea that he all the time knew he became a naturalized citizen in 1865?

It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, that I should go over this case in the time allotted. I am admonished that but three minutes of my time remain. I desire to call the attention of the House to the inconsistencies in the statements of the witnesses presented by Mr. White to prove his naturalization. One says it was in the common pleas court; the other says it was in the circuit court. One says a certain person was present; another says it was another person who was present. Mr. White says it was Mr. Chittenden; Mr. Jenkinson says it was Mr. Chittenden. The original declaration of intention was in Mr. Chittenden's handwriting and he went out of office in 1862 and went into another office.

All these things indicate to my mind conclusively that the only time contestee applied to the court was when he filed his declaration of intention, and that was when Mr. Jenkinson appeared and the other witnesses with him.

I might point to inconsistencies in other parts of the testimony. I might state to you that so far from his being the gallant and distinguished soldier his friends would have you believe, he resigned under fire, and that when he resigned from the service his superior officers stated that they fully agreed with him that the acceptance of his resignation would be for the benefit of the service.

I might state that he continued with the Army, not fighting for the Government, but in the capacity of a sutler, a man who for large profit furnishes supplies to the troops; that that was the position in which he rendered such distinguished service from the latter part of 1862 until he abandoned the business. All this would only be justifiable in rebuttal of the extraordinary claim made on behalf of the contestee. In this country no man can occupy a position so high that his claims are not to be tried by the common and established rules of evidence. I do not care how distinguished a man may be or what his character has been. It is the proud boast of this democracy that when it comes to a question before the courts all men stand alike; that nothing in the past history of a man raises him above the law, and that nothing in his past history shall deny him the right to justice.

It is claimed that because contestee was a soldier, therefore he shall be believed. I think if you will look to the evidence—my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] says he has not read it; my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] does not say whether he has read it or not—but if you will look at the evidence you will find that Mr. White absolutely fails to satisfy you that he ever became naturalized until 1886, on the day before the election.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Elections have tried this case, as they believe, according to the law and according to the evidence. They have not made inquiry as to how the finding might affect votes in their own or anybody else's district. That is perfectly immaterial to them. So far as I am concerned I shall decide each case according to my view of the law and the evidence. While I am a party man, I trust I am not so much a partisan as to violate the law and the evidence in any case, and I am very sure that I shall cast no vote contrary to my conviction of duty in order to pander to some element in my district or State.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRISP. I demand the previous question on the resolutions and the substitute.

Mr. ROWELL. I now offer the substitute, and move the previous question on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has demanded the previous question on the resolutions and the substitute which the Chair understands is admitted as pending.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the Chair to state, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that his substitute was pending. Did I correctly hear the statement of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demanded the previous question on the report; and thereupon the gentleman from Illinois moved the substitute reported by the minority of the committee, and the Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CRISP. I did.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to know whether a negative vote on the first proposition of the Committee on Elections does not in effect seat the sitting member, and after that no other vote is essential?

The SPEAKER. The first resolution reported from the committee declares that the sitting member is not entitled to his seat. If the House refuses to pass that resolution he retains his seat under his certificate and the oath of office he has taken.

Mr. RANDALL. So we need but one vote?

Mr. REED. The motion is made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] to substitute his resolution for another.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood; but the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, whether in a parliamentary sense more than one vote is necessary to retain the gentleman in his seat? The Chair merely answered the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Chair does not decide that the substitute is not pending.

Mr. REED. The substitute is pending, and the vote will have to be on the substitute first.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of course.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let us have the substitute read, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. It will be read. The Chair desires to understand whether the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. O'NEALL] for the substitute proposed by the minority of the committee is pending.

Mr. CRISP. The majority of the committee have submitted two resolutions. The resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] is a substitute for the first resolution, and the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. O'NEALL] is a substitute for the second resolution reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions proposed by the majority and the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, First. That James B. White not having been a citizen of the United States for seven years previous to the 4th of March, 1887, is not entitled to retain a seat in the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana.

Resolved, Second. That Robert Lowry not having received a majority of the votes cast for a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress for the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

The Clerk read the substitute proposed by Mr. ROWELL, as follows:

Resolved, That James B. White was duly elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana, and is entitled to retain his seat.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, this resolution is offered as a substitute of the first resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. And upon this report and substitute the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] demands the previous question.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Illinos [Mr. ROWELL] demands the previous question upon the substitute.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Georgia had the floor and yielded only for the amendment, as the Chair understood.

Several MEMBERS. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The effect is precisely the same.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of withdrawing the resolution which I reported.

Mr. RANDALL. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. O'NEALL] was that Mr. Lowry was entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to withdraw the resolution, no vote having been taken upon it.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon agreeing to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] for the first resolution reported by the Committee on Elections.

Mr. CRISP. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 105, not voting 32; as follows:

So the substitute of Mr. ROWELL was agreed to.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. MOORE said: On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARLINGTON], who, if present, would vote in the affirmative, while I should vote in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The rules require that pairs shall be announced in writing from the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will read the pairs.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions, until further notice:

Mr. SPINOLA with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. WILBER.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.

The following pairs were also announced:

Mr. BARNES with Mr. MCCORMICK, on all questions, until Saturday, February 11.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. BUTLER, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. FELTON, on all political questions for this day.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. BRUMM, on all political questions, for this day; and on the Indiana election case; if present, Mr. FORAN would vote for the majority report, and Mr. BRUMM against it.

Mr. COTHRAN with Mr. FITCH, on all political questions, for this day; also on the Indiana election contest; if present, Mr. COTHRAN would vote for the majority report, and Mr. FITCH against it.

Mr. MOORE with Mr. DARLINGTON, on the Indiana election contest. Mr. MOORE would vote for the majority report, and Mr. DARLINGTON, if present, would vote against it.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. HIRES, on the Indiana election contest. If present, Mr. DAVIDSON would vote for the majority report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HIRES, has been called home by serious illness in his family, and my colleague, Mr. LEHLBACH, is confined to his bed by sickness.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 186, the nays 105. The substitute is agreed to. [Applause.]

The question then recurring upon agreeing to the report of the Committee on Elections, as amended by the adoption of the substitute of Mr. ROWELL, it was agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the protest of the American, Atlantic and Pacific Ship Canal Company against the passage of the bill proposing to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua; and I ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. Copies of that memorial have been sent to every Senator, I believe, and it has been presented in the Senate before.

Mr. HARRIS. Then there is no necessity for presenting the copy which I have received. I withdraw the memorial, if a similar one has already gone to the proper committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a memorial of 200 merchants and planters of Montgomery County, Alabama, in opposition to measures now pending in the Senate to regulate the sale and use of cotton-seed oil, and setting forth their reasons why Congress should not interfere with the production, sale, or use of this wholesome and valuable product. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES OVER STREAMS WITHIN STATE LIMITS.

Mr. FRYE. I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the right and expediency of Congress assuming control of the erection of bridges over navigable waters or streams within State limits, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be regarded as agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. Is that referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. FRYE. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Maine to ask that the resolution might be agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I asked that it might be agreed to, but it simply refers the subject then to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understood. The resolution will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 120.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further resolutions, concurrent or other, under the rule, until 1 o'clock, the resolutions on the Calendar coming over from a former day must be considered, unless by unanimous consent the Senate should otherwise order.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw my motion if there are resolutions to come up.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senate now to consider the resolution to refer the President's message to the Committee on Finance, that I may conclude the remarks which were interrupted yesterday by a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution to refer the annual message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like simply to state that, inasmuch as I had given notice that I should call up a bill to-day for the purpose of submitting some remarks, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut I should like to detain the Senate a few minutes while I present the matter referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request made by the Senator from Connecticut.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN, December 19, 1887, to refer the annual message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, when I gave way yesterday to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, I was speaking to the following proposition, namely, that the method of reducing the income of the Government proposed by the President of the United States means the absolute and final destruction of the protective system; that it means practical and absolute free trade. I had shown that all free-traders claim the President as one of them; I had shown, as I think, that the tone, and spirit, and argument of the message were for free trade; and I wish to supplement those proofs of his opinion by showing that his recommendations for the reduction of income can result in nothing else but the entire downfall of the protective system of the country.

I can not but assume, Mr. President, that the Democratic party intends to follow the recommendations of its commander-in-chief. There have been, indeed, some straws which look as if there might be some question about it, as if there might be an attempt at some compromise, as if there might be a studied effort on the part of the Democratic party to do nothing in the line which the President has recommended at this session, and then go once more to the country upon this free-trade message as its platform; but I can not assume that the Democratic party and the Democratic leaders in Congress really intend that course of action.

I admit the necessity of some reduction in the income of the Government, but I am not to be frightened into an abandonment of the protective system in this country by the President's "rawhead and bloody-bones" figures. I deny the necessity for this accumulation in the Treasury.

Right here I wish to correct, if possible, what I believe to be a misunderstanding in the country with regard to this surplus. The country does not distinguish between accumulations in the Treasury and the surplus income—the money which the Government annually collects by law more than it can pay out by law; and the President in his message does not help us very much to make this distinction. If the free-trader juggles with words, the President, unintentionally of course, juggles with figures.

There has been some accumulation in the Treasury. There is now an accumulation of money in the Treasury. It is not the result of surplus taxation for the current year. It is an accumulation which has been growing for years. When the Republicans were in power they did not allow it to assume the proportions which it has been allowed to assume under Democratic administration. I will not refer to the changed system of book-keeping, which makes the surplus, according to Democratic calculations, about $30,000,000 less than the Republicans under their system of book-keeping were wont to acknowledge it. But when there was, under Republican administration, an accumulation of money in the Treasury, the Republicans always found some way to pay it out for the benefit of the people.

On the other hand, this Administration seems to insist in keeping it in the Treasury, and not paying it out for the benefit of the people; and no reduction in taxation, as the President and Secretary of the Treasury are pleased to call it, no reduction of the amount of our annual income will relieve the Treasury from this accumulation. You may reduce taxes, as the Secretary of the Treasury proposes, below the current needs of Government, so that our annual income will not be by some millions of dollars as much as we must annually pay out, and yet it will take a long time to empty the Treasury of its accumulation. So the question of reduction of taxation has very little to do with relieving the Treasury of what the President tells us is a "congested" condition. Some other means must be devised for that.

So the question of reducing income, whether it be by repeal of internal-revenue taxation or by the destruction of the protective system, so far as that is concerned it has nothing whatever to do with disposing of the money now in the Treasury.

We had in the Treasury, the President tells us, on the 1st day of December, $55,258,701.19. I will read what he says about it, because upon this single sentence of the message a false impression has gone forth to the country, and business men and statesmen alike suppose that the President recommends an annual reduction in income of $113,000,000, or at least of $100,000,000. The impression may well have gone forth from the President's language. It is this:

> While the expedients thus employed, to release to the people the money lying idle in the Treasury, served to avert immediate danger, our surplus revenues have continued to accumulate, the excess for the present year amounting on the 1st day of December to $55,258,701.19, and estimated to reach the sum of $113,000,000 on the 30th of June next, at which date it is expected that this sum, added to prior accumulations, will swell the surplus in the Treasury to $140,000,000.

I defy any member of the Finance Committee on either side of the Chamber to tell us what the President means by that passage in his message. He seems to mean that there was an accumulation in the Treasury over and above the $55,258,701.19 of about $27,000,000 of prior accumulations, when in fact the $55,258,701.19 was the entire accumulation in the Treasury.

There was in the Treasury on the 1st day of December, as I have stated and the President says, $55,258,701.19. On the 1st day of January it was $69,842,879.11. On the 1st day of February it was $85,230,746.09—a pretty rapid accumulation.

But, Mr. President, even that is misleading. That money is not all of it in the Treasury. That actual accumulation of money in the Treasury might afford some reason to suppose that the dangerous condition of things which the President says exists does indeed exist; but something over $50,000,000 is in the National Banks of the country, and not actually in the Treasury, only constructively in the Treasury, and it is being loaned out by the banks to the people. I think the amount is about $55,000,000, but I will call it $50,000,000—I had the figures—so that the actual accumulation of money in the Treasury on the 1st day of February was only $35,000,000, or thereabouts.

The President did not tell us in the message how much of this money had been deposited in National Banks. He told us how much was deposited in National Banks at one time, I think; I do not find it, however; but this is what he says about it:

> In addition to this the interest accruing during the current year upon the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the Government was to some extent anticipated, and banks selected as depositories of public money were permitted to somewhat increase their deposits.

I should think so. When this new policy of making unusual deposits in the banks was first adopted by this Administration the deposits amounted to between $17,000,000 and $18,000,000, speaking from recollection—I am not far from right—and when they have run up to $50,000,000 or $55,000,000 I should think they had been "somewhat" increased, as the President says. I allude to this fact because I propose to maintain pretty soon that this great talk about the surplus, it seems to me, could have been for no other purpose than as holding out an inducement by way of fear to the country and to Congress to break down the protective system of the country.

Why has this accumulation been permitted? Why has taxation not been reduced—the taxation which created from year to year this accumulation? Why has the Democratic party in power in that section of Congress which originates measures of this character not sent to this body some bill looking to the reduction of taxation? It stood pledged by its platform, by the professions of its leaders on every stump and at every hustings in the United States, immediately upon its accession to
